The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not— 2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy" —more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

OUR MORTAL FRIENDS.

BY MRS. MARIA MATHEWS WEAVER.

We laid the baby down,
The mother with it slept,
Both dreamless in the ground
While loving dear ones wept.

The friends of riper years
Have followed, one by one,
And 'mid our bitter tears
Their long last sleep begun.

Our hearts are desolate,
Our homes have cheerless grown,
For many a precious friend
Has left us here alone.

Low in the ground they rest,
Or in the ocean sleep;
Death claims them as his own
And boasts his power to keep.

Thanks be to God's dear Son,
He knows all of his fold
And soon will gather them
To heavenly joys untold.

O Christ, the way of Life,
Our trust is all in thee;
Come, bring death's captives home,
Let them thy glory see.

THE JUDGMENT NOT SIMULTANEOUS.

The following, on the above subject, we extract from an article we find in the Prophetic Times, and credited in that periodical to "Plain Papers on Prophetic Subjects." The author evidently saw "men as trees walking." The idea of a simultaneous judgment, in which all the race of Adam are gathered at once, is both inconsistent itself and contrary to the Scriptures of truth; and it seems a wonder how intelligent people can still be held to believe such an absurdity.

The writer of the following sees light on the subject; and we trust he will yet see all the truth clearly. While we do not indorse every expression contained in the following extract, we think it cannot fail to be interesting and instructive.—EDITOR.

Do not many passages of Scripture teach, that immediately upon Christ's coming, a simultaneous judgment will take place, embracing both the righteous and wicked of all ages?....

While there are many passages which affirm the judgment to be universal, there are others which unequivocally testify that in one sense—that of being called in question as to eternal life or eternal death—believers have already passed through judgment in the person of Christ, and, that in this sense no judgment remains for them. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into judgment, but is passed from death unto life." (John v. 24.) Accordingly, in the context of this passage, our Lord divides the resurrection itself into "the resurrection of life" and the "resurrection of judgment" (anastasis kriseos).... Evidently the possessor of everlasting life needs not to be judged, and cannot be, as to whether everlasting life is to be his or not. Heb. xi. 27, 28, gives expression to the same truth. "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Men, as such, in their natural state of sin and condemnation, have before them death and judgment. The believer has death and judgment behind him, substitutionally borne by Christ on the cross; and he has before him as his blessed hope the second appearing of Christ, for whom he looks. His appearing without sin unto salvation. Believers are, as to their persons, accepted in Christ; their security therefore can no more be called in question than that of Him in whom they are accepted.

The works of believers must all nevertheless be brought into judgment. 1 Cor. iii. shows us that there will be those who, because builded on the only foundation, will themselves be saved, whose works will, as unable to bear the test of the fire of that day, be burned up. Beyond question, we must, in this sense, "all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ." But, finally, the way in which believers are placed before that judgment-seat, demonstrates more than anything besides, that they are not there to be tried for life or death. How is it that the saints reach that solemn tribunal? By being changed or raised at the very moment of Christ's descent, and by being caught up to meet Him in the air! Whether the coming of Christ be pre- or post-millennial—all must agree that the very first, the immediate effect of His coming is the resurrection, the change, and the translation into the air of His own people. It is thus, and only thus, that they are placed before the judgment-seat of Christ. And shall they appear there, in bodies fashioned and made like unto Christ's own glorious body, to have the questioned tried whether they savingly belong to Christ? Impossible! Nay, more; where Christ is represented as being manifest, or as coming in judgment on the wicked, His saints are represented as coming with him. "When Christ who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all." Are these saints, who thus accompany the Lord, to take their place among those on whom judgment is to be executed, and only be afresh separated from among them, as the result of a judicial process? Incomprehensible as is such a thought, this, is necessarily involved in the doctrine of a simultaneous judgment of all mankind, from Adam downwards, immediately to ensue on the coming of Christ. But if there are passages supposed to support or to teach such a notion, let them by all means be examined.

Rev. xxi. 7, 8, is adduced in support of the theory of a simultaneous judgment of all mankind at Christ's coming. But a mere glance at the passage shows that it is a declaration of the final results of what all agree in admitting to be the last judgment—that of the great white throne—and therefore proves nothing for or against the doctrine in question. So of Rev. xxii. 12—15, "Behold I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work is." No one doubts that such is the object and result of Christ's coming; but as to proof that all men receive the reward of their works together, and that immediately upon the coming of Christ, the passage affords none. The same remark applies to Matt. xvi. 27. Doubtless it is at Christ's coming that the period commences in which He will "reward every man according to his works," and this the passage declares. But it declares nothing as to the order in which the rewards shall be distributed, and that is the question at issue.

Acts xvii. 31, assuredly testifies that God "hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained;" but it is a mere popular delusion, unsupported by Scripture and contradicted by it, to suppose that "the day" here spoken of is a day of twenty-four hours; and if it be allowed that the phrase expresses a lengthened, indefinite period, "in the which" the world is to be judged, it is impossible to prove by this, that all classes of mankind will be judged together.

It is sought to identify 2 Thess. i. 6–10, with Rev. xx. 11–15, and to prove, from the alledged coincidence, that the final judgment of the righteous and the wicked, at one and the same time, is the subject of which both passages treat. But 2 Thess. i. 6–10 so plainly and simply sets forth a revelation of the Lord in person to this very earth, and instantaneous execution of fearful vengeance upon the ungodly persecutors of His people, alive and in the flesh, that it is astonishing how any should suppose it to set forth a judicial process at all. It is indeed an awful solemn visitation of which 2 Thess. 1 treats; but it is not the slow solemnity of formal judgment, as in Rev. xx. Here the Lord is at once revealed in flaming fire; there there is no mention of fire till the judgment is over. Here it is bright consuming fire encircling the Lord; there it is the lake of fire. Here His appearing is for the instant destruction of his enemies, without any mention of trial at all; there it is to put them upon solemn trial before either sentence or punishment. Here there is not even an allusion to the dead; there there is as little allusion to the living; the only agreement between them being that in neither are the righteous said to be judged. 2 Thess. i. represents the Lord Jesus as coming to take signal vengeance upon ungodly living men—the troublers of His people; it does not represent him as coming to judge "at once all the human race"—the living and the dead—the righteous and the wicked. It speaks of a terrible judgment upon wicked men, but not of the judgment of the whole human family. It does witness of the Lord's coming "to be glorified in his saints and admired in all them that believe;" but that is surely not in being arraigned along with the wicked, before one common tribunal, but in their being manifested with Him, at his coming, in that glory to which they will have previously been received.

The great argument, however, in support of a simultaneous judgment of all men at Christ's coming, is supposed to be derived from a comparison of Matt. xxv. 31–46, with Rev. xx. 11–15. All being agreed that the judgment of the great white throne embraces all generations of men who have not been previously judged, and Matt. xxv. 31–46 confessedly treating of a judgment to take place at the coming of the Son of man, it is sought to identify these, and thus to show that both passages describe an absolutely universal and simultaneous judgment immediately ensuing on the coming of Christ. It requires, however, but a slight examination of the passages, to see that this argument is wholly without foundation. Neither passage describes an absolutely universal judgment; and so far from both passages describing the same scene, they have scarcely a circumstance or a feature in common with each other. The two scenes are entirely distinguished from each other, as to antecedent circumstances, time, sphere, subjects of judgment, and character of proceedings.

As to antecedent circumstances and time, it requires but a glance to perceive that neither passage can fairly be considered apart from the connection in which it stands. That in Matthew is the close of a conected discourse commencing with chapter xxiv.; that in Revelation is part of an equally connected strain of prophecy, commencing with chapter xix., and extending to chapter xxi. 8. Our Lord's words, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory," are not the introduction of a subject then mentioned for the first time, but intended to shed further light upon an event which is the prominent subject of the whole discourse. Read Matt. xxiv. and xxv. and say, if "the coming of the Son of man" be not the great, the main subject of the entire prophecy. The disciples hear of certain marks by which it was to be known that the end was not yet. They are next told of signs which would prove it to be at hand,—the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel, and the time of unequalled tribulation also foretold by him. They are cautioned against the idea of Christ's having come, and of his being concealed in the desert or in the secret chambers; and he tells them, "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Here is the first occurrence in this discourse of this all-important phrase. We then read, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory."

We next read of his sending forth his angels to gather his elect from the four winds of heaven; the coming of the Son of man is compared to that of the flood in the days of Noah; and a variety of illustrations and parables are employed, the moral repeated at the close of each being—"Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor hour wherein the Son of man cometh." It is after all these references to the event and in evident connection with them all, that our Lord says, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." That is, the scene which he begins to describe is one which will quickly ensue on that "coming of the Son of man" of which he had already so largely spoken.

Now, in Rev. xx. 11–15, there is no mention of Christ's coming at all; and for the best possible reason, namely, that the context of the passage proves it to have taken place upwards of a thousand years before........

As to the subjects of judgment, Matt. xxv. speaks only of the living—Rev. xx. only of the dead. "Before Him shall be gathered all nations," is the language of the one: "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God," is that of the other. Assiduous efforts are made to show that "all nations" includes the dead of all generations, and that "the dead, small and great," absolutely means all mankind. But the expression rendered "all nations," literally rendered, is "all the Gentiles. The word rendered "nations," [Ta ethnee] with the article, occurs, if we mistake not, one hundred and thirty-two times in the New Testament. It is rendered "the Gentiles" ninety-two times—"the nations" ten times—"the heathen" five times—and simply "nations" twenty-five times only; but it is never, in any instance (unless it be this), applied either to the dead or the raised. The very expression indicates a present existence upon earth. Nor is there any mention in the passage of "the opening of the graves," or "the sea giving up its dead," or any reference whatever to resurrection. It is the judgment of the Gentiles at the coming of Christ. Nor could any thing be in more perfect keeping with the whole discourse. Chap. xxiv. 15–41, gives the judgment of Israel; xxiv. 42, to xxv. 30, the judgment of Christendom; xxv. 31—46, the judgment of the Gentiles.

Rev. xx. 11–15, is the judgment of "the dead," or what our Lord terms, in John v. 29, "the resurrection of judgment." There is not a word in the passage of any but "the dead." "I saw the dead small and great, stand before God." "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works."....

With regard to the character of the judgment, the passages differ just as widely. That in Matt. xxv. is not, strickly speaking, so much a trial by a judge, as a calling up for sentence, and an award of punishment or reward by a King, to rebellious or obedient subjects. It is as King that Christ speaks and acts; and His very first act, after taking his seat upon "the throne of his glory," is a division of the gathered ones into classes, in a way which supposes their previous guilt or innocence. His first words are the sentence of the righteous, which, as well as that subsequently pronounced on the wicked, assumes, without any process of trial or opening of books, the obedience or rebellion of the sentenced ones. How different from the judgment of the great white throne, where the books are opened, and another book, which is the book of life; the dead being judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. Could two scenes of judgment be well described in more dissimilar terms?

WAS THE FLOOD UNIVERSAL?

We propose to make a very important application of our previous remarks on this question.

It is evident that the apostle Peter makes use of the flood as an illustration of the destruction of the Jewish polity, which is the subject of discussion in 2 Peter iii.

Our object has been to show, that the flood, which was the illustration of Peter, was limited to an extent of territory, called "the world of the ungodly." And that "the heavens and the earth," spoken of by this Apostle, are to be understood in the same limited sense and not as applicable to the whole globe.

The reader may think the language of Peter is too strong to apply to the dissolution of the Jewish political and ecclesiastical heaven and earth. To all such, however, we must, with the apostle Peter, present the exhortation to "be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets." To them we shall appeal in illustration and confirmation of our position. But before proceeding to the prophets permit us to inquire, what heaven, in the popular acceptation, and according to the orthodox view, are to be set on fire? and what elements are to melt with fervent heat? The firmament is called heaven in Genesis. Is this the heaven? Is it the etherial or atmospheric expanse, that is set on fire? Is it the atmospheric compound, called elements, which is to melt? Or is it the whole solar system, which is to be destroyed? Will some one tell us? And may we be permitted to ask, what have the sun, moon, and stars to do with the moral destiny of the earth?

But to the prophets. The reader will see, before we get through, that our views of the flood, as also the language of Peter, is fully sustained.

Turn now to Isaiah xxiv., and read a prediction concerning the land of Israel, "Behold the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad its inhabitants." Again, he says, "The land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled; for the Lord hath spoken this word."

What is termed the earth in the first verse, is, in the third verse called the land. Let the reader remember this.

"The earth, (4th v.) mourneth and fadeth away, the haughty people of the earth do languish." Here the sentence, the world languisheth, is explained by the haughty people of the earth do languish.

"The earth (5th v.) also is defiled under its inhabitants; because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant. Therefore hath the curse devoured (eaten up) the earth, and they that dwell in it are desolate: therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left."

Thus we have a devoured earth, and its inhabitants burned. Compare that with Peter.

The prophet then hints at the restoration of Israel, and passes on to the destruction of their enemies. "The earth is entirely broken down, the earth is entirely dissolved, the earth is exceedingly moved. The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard; and shall be removed like a cottage; and the transgression of it shall be heavy upon it; and it shall fall and not rise again." The language here in reference to "the great day of battle of God almighty," is much stronger, if any thing, than the language of Peter. And yet it bears internal evidence of being figurative. The earth is first spoken of as being utterly broken down; then as entirely dissolved, and finally, as exceedingly moved. Now, if it were literally dissolved it could not be subsequently moved. And furthermore, after being dissolved, it is represented as reeling to and fro, and as falling and not rising again. The whole, therefore, is but a highly wrought description of the dissolution of the political earth and ecclesiastical heavens, which shall be contemporaneous with the Lord's coming. Hence the prophet adds, "and it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall punish the host of the high ones that are on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth." It is needless to add that this could not be done, if the previous description is understood literally.

"And they shall be gathered as prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up in prison, and after many days shall they be visited. Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed when the Lord of hosts shall reign on Mount Zion, and in Jeusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Of course, then, the earth is not really to be dissolved, because, if so, Mount Zion and Jerusalem would be dissolved with it, and the Lord could not reign there.

You will now read Jeremiah iv. in which we have another prediction concerning the desolations of Zion. We quote from the 20th verse: "Destruction upon destruction is cried; for the whole land is laid waste; suddenly are my tents ruined, and my curtains in a moment. How long shall I see the standard and hear the sound of the trumpet? For my people are foolish, they have not known me; they are sottish children, and they have no understanding, they are wise to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge."

"I beheld the earth, and lo, it was without form and void; and the heavens, and they had no light. I beheld the mountains, and lo, they trembled, and all the hills moved lightly. I beheld, and lo, there was no man, and all the fowls of the heavens had fled. I beheld, and lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all its cities were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger. For thus saith the Lord, The whole land shall be desolate; yet will I not make a full end. For this shall the earth mourn, and the heavens above be black: because I have spoken it, I have purposed it, and will not repent, neither will I turn back from it."

The attentive reader must see in this quotation, as strong language as that used by Peter, or that used by our Lord in Matthew xxiv. And if we take heed to "the words of the Prophets," concerning the desolations of Zion, we must be convinced that Peter was describing nothing more than the passing away of the Jewish heavens and earth; the same heavens and earth of which Jeremiah speaks, when he says: "I beheld the earth, and lo, it was without form, and the heavens, and they had no light."

Again, Peter speaks of the elements melting with fervent heat; and in Jeremiah vii. 20, we read: "Therefore, thus saith the Lord God; behold my anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place, upon man and upon beast, and upon the trees of the field, and upon the fruit of the ground; and it shall burn, and shall not be quenched."

Again, in chapter ix. the Prophet says: "For the mountains will I take up a weeping and wailing, and for the habitations of the wilderness a lamentation, because they are burned up so that none can pass through them;" &c. In chapter xvii. 27, we find the following: "But if ye will not hearken to me to hallow the Sabbath day, and not to bear a burden, even entering at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day; then will I kindle a fire in its gates, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched."

In chapter xxi. the Prophet, speaking of Israel's land, says—"I will kindle a fire in the forest thereof, and it shall devour all things around it."

In Joel ii. we have an extended description of the destruction of Jerusalem; but it is too lengthy for an entire insertion; we will only refer to some parts of it, and request the reader to peruse the whole.

The Prophet Joel, speaking of the mighty army which shall come against Jerusalem, says: "A fire devoureth before them; and behind them a flame burneth: the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness; and nothing shall escape them." Again, at the tenth verse, he says: "The earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble: the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining."

We conceive that we have presented sufficient testimony to sustain our position; but we will refer to a few passages for the purpose of illustrating the subject.

In Nahum i. 5, where the prophet is predicting the destruction of Nineveh, he says: "The mountains quake at him, (the Lord,) and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence, even the world, and all that dwell therein."

This language is equally strong with that of Peter, and yet it is undeniably applicable to the destruction of Nineveh. The hills are represented as melting, and the world as being burned up.

Zephaniah i. God says, "I will utterly consume all things from off the earth." Again, He says, "but the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy."

As a final quotation, on this subject, in this article, we refer to Malach i. iv. "For behold the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."

Now, we appeal to the reader, whether or not we have sustained our exposition of Peter.

THE PREACHING THAT CONVERTS.

"I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." John xii. 32. Other preaching may please, amuse, and entertain; but the love of Christ attracts, astonishes, draws, breaks, melts, subdues, and changes the heart. St. Paul knew this, and determined to preach "Jesus and him crucified."

In the light of his dying Saviour's cross, the sinner sees and feels the exceeding sinfulness of sin, the height and depth of the love of Christ. There, and only there, he beholds his sin atoned for, his guilt cancelled, the law magnified, justice satisfied, God glorified—just in justifying the ungodly who believe in Jesus. There, he is conquered, disarmed, won by the love of Christ. In a moment the prayer of faith ascends, the tears of penitence fall, regeneration of heart is effected, consecration of himself to God is made: "I am the Lord's"—he becomes a new creature in Christ Jesus.

What made the preaching of Berridge, and Hill, and Whitefield, and Wesley so efficient to the conversion of men, but that the love of Christ was the burden of their theme? They glorified Christ in their preaching, and the Holy Spirit glorified their preaching in the conversion of multitudes.

Never shall I forget seeing the late great and good Rowland Hill, of London, preaching in a market town in England on its market day. Like the Apostle Paul standing on the steps at Athens, Mr. Hill was mounted, in the midst of the market-place, in a lumber wagon of a farmer from the country, a man standing at his back holding up an umbrella to protect his head from the rays of the summer sun. I can yet see him as he then and there stood and preached, for upwards of an hour, the love of Christ to the thousands gathered around him. What volume of voice, what vehemence, what emotion of heart, what earnestness, what tears were his! Not an inch of the high-born gentlemen, his ripe scholarship, his far spread fame, or any one thing that was Rowland Hill's, could be seen, but only the radiant glories of the Cricified One," in the "greatness of his love to man."

To see such another sight and hear such another sermon I would go far. Oh that our pulpits all may be filled by men possessing the spirit of Hill and his mantle fall on the ministry of the Gospel throughout the land and world.—Selected.

Children's Department.

"I will tell you how I came to write them. One night I wanted to attend church very much; but father and mother thought it my duty to remain at home. So I remained, and at that time these lines came to my mind. Though they are very simple they were just my feelings at that time."

DUTY.

This a little word, and homely,
Slighted by the rich and comely,
For it leads to rugged ways,
And with ease it seldom stays;
Never sparing the faint hearted
Nor the ones in error started,
But it sends you on your way,
Never giving time for play.

Though you some times halt, and wonder
Why, you can't have time to ponder,
Duty says, be up and doing
While the Spirit now is wooing.

Life was not made for snoozing,
Or our talents giv'n for loosing;
Duty says, be working bravely
And not idle your time knavely,

Ah! yes, duty we will love you,
For you lead to one above you,
Though you seem so rough and rare,
We will try and treat you fair.

Take you right within our heart
Till you do the truth impart,
If the way of joy we'd know,
Never be to duty slow.

"NO JESUS"!

The following letter reached me in New York during my last visit to that city. It is from one of the lambs of the "little flock" in New Haven. The account of the "little Jew girl" is well calculated to touch the hearts of those who know there is a "Jesus." May the good Lord so water the "seed sown in that little girl's heart" that it may bear fruit unto life everlasting. And may He continue to bless the precious youth in the church in N. Haven. The example of this "little Jew girl," in daily reading the Holy Scriptures, should be followed by all the dear children who read the HERALD OF LIFE. This is the way to be made "wise unto salvation." A little girl here in Salem—who, for nearly eight years and a half, has filled a very big place in my heart—began three years ago last New-Year's Day to read one chapter every day in the New Testament, and she has steadily kept up the practice from that time. On the 20th day of October, 1863, the same little girl began to devote a portion of every twenty-four hours read two chapters everp day in the Old Testament, which she has regularly done ever since. This makes three chapters a day—1095 chapters in a year. The Bible (including Psalms) contains 1189 chapters. These figures will show the children who read this "Department" of our paper, that the little boy or girl who reads only three chapters a day, will get almost through the Precious Volume in one year! Who that peruses these lines, and has not yet become a daily Bible reader, will begin at once to to the perusal of the Sacred Word?

But I am detaining the children from Addie's letter. As I was summoned from New York by telegraph, to attend a funeral, and came through New Haven in the night, Addie will understand why I could not see any of them on my way home.

Salem, Mass, March 9, 1865.

DEAR FRIEND:—I now hasten to write you a few lines. I think I promised to write to you, but I have had so much to do that I have not had time; I go to school every day. We have our prayer meetings yet; and if you will come this way when you go home, perhaps you might be in time to be to our prayer meeting. We have them Tuesday evenings instead of Saturday. Last Saturday there were thirteen out to meeting; four of them were never there before. Br. Hotchkiss's youngest girl has been talking to a little Jew girl about Jesus. She gave her a little Testament and told her to read it. She took it home and asked her father if she could read it, and he told her she could not, and that there was no Jesus. But she knew better, and she reads it every day and prays. She goes to our prayer meetings. She always speaks and prays. There is a seed sown in that little girl's heart that her father cannot root out. I think that Jesus has got her in his fold, and I hope that by the grace of God she may stand the storm, and at last be saved when Jesus comes to make up his jewels. Remember me in your prayers that I may prove faithful and be saved when He comes. Please come this way when you go home. I am going to meeting to-night over to Fair Haven. Answer soon. From Your Friend, ADDIE.

AND OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

TERMS:—Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar FOR SIX MONTHS; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York city, 48 cents additional. Persons sending five new subscribers, with advance pay, will be entitled to a sixth copy for their services.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces, is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York, for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, any where out of the United States. Anywhere in the United States, the subscriber may just as well pay the postage at his own Post Office, as to send the amount to us, and subject us to the trouble of doing it here. It is far less trouble to the subscriber than to us, and we must absolutely decline doing it for any within the States. Let this be remembered.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed—

"GEO. STORRS,
BOX 4658,
NEW YORK."

Where a letter contains business matter and matter for the paper, or for private use, let it be so written, that we can separate the two without infringing on either. This is essential to the business of the Office, and let none neglect it.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written with care, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also, in ordering papers sent, the name of the Post Office, County, and State must be given, and written plainly; and [illegible] these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

Poetry.

OUR MORTAL FRIENDS.

BY MRS. MARIA MATHEWS WEAVER.

We laid the baby down,
The mother with it slept,
Both dreamless in the ground
While loving dear ones wept.

The friends of riper years
Have followed, one by one,
And 'mid our bitter tears
Their long last sleep begun.

Our hearts are desolate,
Our homes have cheerless grown,
For many a precious friend
Has left us here alone.

Low in the ground they rest,
Or in the ocean sleep;
Death claims them as his own
And boasts his power to keep.

Thanks be to God's dear Son,
He knows all of his fold
And soon will gather them
To heavenly joys untold.

O Christ, the way of Life,
Our trust is all in thee;
Come, bring death's captives home,
Let them thy glory see.

THE JUDGMENT NOT SIMULTANEOUS.

The following, on the above subject, we extract from an article we find in the Prophetic Times, and credited in that periodical to "Plain Papers on Prophetic Subjects." The author evidently saw "men as trees walking." The idea of a simultaneous judgment, in which all the race of Adam are gathered at once, is both inconsistent itself and contrary to the Scriptures of truth; and it seems a wonder how intelligent people can still be held to believe such an absurdity.

The writer of the following sees light on the subject; and we trust he will yet see all the truth clearly. While we do not indorse every expression contained in the following extract, we think it cannot fail to be interesting and instructive.—EDITOR.

Do not many passages of Scripture teach, that immediately upon Christ's coming, a simultaneous judgment will take place, embracing both the righteous and wicked of all ages? . . .

While there are many passages which affirm the judgment to be universal, there are others which unequivocally testify that in one sense—that of being called in question as to eternal life or eternal death—believers have already passed through judgment in the person of Christ, and, that in this sense no judgment remains for them. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into judgment, but is passed from death unto life." (John v. 24.) Accordingly, in the context of this passage, our Lord divides the resurrection itself into "the resurrection of life" and the "resurrection of judgment" (anastasis kriseos). . . . Evidently the possessor of everlasting life needs not to be judged, and cannot be, as to whether everlasting life is to be his or not. Heb. xi. 27, 28, gives expression to the same truth. "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Men, as such, in their natural state of sin and condemnation, have before them death and judgment. The believer has death and judgment behind him, substitutionally borne by Christ on the cross; and he has before him as his blessed hope the second appearing of Christ, for whom he looks. His appearing without sin unto salvation. Believers are, as to their persons, accepted in Christ; their security therefore can no more be called in question than that of Him in whom they are accepted.

The works of believers must all nevertheless be brought into judgment. 1 Cor. iii, shows us that there will be those who, because builded on the only foundation, will themselves be saved, whose works will, as unable to bear the test of the fire of that day, be burned up. Beyond question, we must, in this sense, "all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ." But, finally, the way in which believers are placed before that judgment-seat, demonstrates more than anything besides, that they are not there to be tried for life or death. How is it that the saints reach that solemn tribunal? By being changed or raised at the very moment of Christ's descent, and by being caught up to meet Him in the air! Whether the coming of Christ be pre- or post-millennial—all must agree that the very first, the immediate effect of His coming is the resurrection, the change, and the translation into the air of His own people. It is thus, and only thus, that they are placed before the judgment-seat of Christ. And shall they appear there, in bodies fashioned and made like unto Christ's own glorious body, to have the questioned tried whether they savingly belong to Christ? Impossible! Nay, more; where Christ is represented as being manifest, or as coming in judgment on the wicked, His saints are represented as coming with him. "When Christ who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all." Are these saints, who thus accompany the Lord, to take their place among those on whom judgment is to be executed, and only be afresh separated from among them, as the result of a judicial process? Incomprehensible as is such a thought, this, and much worse than this, is necessarily involved in the doctrine of a simultaneous judgment of all mankind, from Adam downwards, immediately to ensue on the coming of Christ. But if there are passages supposed to support or to teach such a notion, let them by all means be examined.

Rev. xxi. 7, 8, is adduced in support of the theory of a simultaneous judgment of all mankind at Christ's coming. But a mere glance at the passage shows that it is a declaration of the final results of what all agree in admitting to be the last judgment—that of the great white throne—and therefore proves nothing for or against the doctrine in question. So of Rev. xxii. 12—15, "Behold I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work is." No one doubts that such is the object and result of Christ's coming; but as to proof that all men receive the reward of their works together, and that immediately upon the coming of Christ, the passage affords none. The same remark applies to Matt. xvi. 27. Doubtless it is at Christ's coming that the period commences in which He will "reward every man according to his works," and this the passage declares. But it declares nothing as to the order in which the rewards shall be distributed, and that is the question at issue.

Acts xvii. 31, assuredly testifies that God "hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained;" but it is a mere popular delusion, unsupported by Scripture and contradicted by it, to suppose that "the day" here spoken of is a day of twenty-four hours; and if it be allowed that the phrase expresses a lengthened, indefinite period, "in the which" the world is to be judged, it is impossible to prove by this, that all classes of mankind will be judged together.

It is sought to identify 2 Thess. i. 6–10, with Rev. xx. 11–15, and to prove, from the alledged coincidence, that the final judgment of the righteous and the wicked, at one and the same time, is the subject of which both passages treat. But 2 Thess. i. 6–10 so plainly and simply sets forth a revelation of the Lord in person to this very earth, and instantaneous execution of fearful vengeance upon the ungodly persecutors of His people, alive and in the flesh, that it is astonishing how any should suppose it to set forth a judicial process at all. It is indeed an awful solemn visitation of which 2 Thess. 1 treats; but it is not the slow solemnity of formal judgment, as in Rev. xx. Here the Lord is at once revealed in flaming fire; there there is no mention of fire till the judgment is over. Here it is bright consuming fire encircling the Lord; there it is the lake of fire. Here His appearing is for the instant destruction of his enemies, without any mention of trial at all; there it is to put them upon solemn trial before either sentence or punishment. Here there is not even an allusion to the dead; there there is as little allusion to the living; the only agreement between them being that in neither are the righteous said to be judged. 2 Thess. i. represents the Lord Jesus as coming to take signal vengeance upon ungodly living men—the troublers of His people; it does not represent him as coming to judge "at once all the human race"—the living and the dead—the righteous and the wicked. It speaks of a terrible judgment upon wicked men, but not of the judgment of the whole human family. It does witness of the Lord's coming "to be glorified in his saints and admired in all them that believe;" but that is surely not in being arraigned along with the wicked, before one common tribunal, but in their being manifested with Him, at his coming, in that glory to which they will have previously been received.

The great argument, however, in support of a simultaneous judgment of all men at Christ's coming, is supposed to be derived from a comparison of Matt. xxv. 31–46, with Rev. xx. 11–15. All being agreed that the judgment of the great white throne embraces all generations of men who have not been previously judged, and Matt. xxv. 31–46 confessedly treating of a judgment to take place at the coming of the Son of man, it is sought to identify these, and thus to show that both passages describe an absolutely universal and simultaneous judgment immediately ensuing on the coming of Christ. It requires, however, but a slight examination of the passages, to see that this argument is wholly without foundation. Neither passage describes an absolutely universal judgment; and so far from both passages describing the same scene, they have scarcely a circumstance or a feature in common with each other. The two scenes are entirely distinguished from each other, as to antecedent circumstances, time, sphere, subjects of judgment, and character of proceedings.

As to antecedent circumstances and time, it requires but a glance to perceive that neither passage can fairly be considered apart from the connection in which it stands. That in Matthew is the close of a conected discourse commencing with chapter xxiv.; that in Revelation is part of an equally connected strain of prophecy, commencing with chapter xix., and extending to chapter xxi. 8. Our Lord's words, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory," are not the introduction of a subject then mentioned for the first time, but intended to shed further light upon an event which is the prominent subject of the whole discourse. Read Matt. xxiv. and xxv. and say if "the coming of the Son of man" be not the great, the main subject of the entire prophecy. The disciples hear of certain marks by which it was to be known that the end was not yet. They are next told of signs which would prove it to be at hand,—the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel, and the time of unequalled tribulation also foretold by him. They are cautioned against the idea of Christ's having come, and of his being concealed in the desert or in the secret chambers; and he tells them, "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Here is the first occurrence in this discourse of this all-important phrase. We then read, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory."

We next read of his sending forth his angels to gather his elect from the four winds of heaven; the coming of the Son of man is compared to that of the flood in the days of Noah; and a variety of illustrations and parables are employed, the moral repeated at the close of each being,—"Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor hour wherein the Son of man cometh." It is after all these references to the event and in evident connection with them all, that our Lord says, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." That is, the scene which he begins to describe is one which will quickly ensue on that "coming of the Son of man" of which he had already so largely spoken.

Now, in Rev. xx. 11–15, there is no mention of Christ's coming at all; and for the best possible reason, namely, that the context of the passage proves it to have taken place upwards of a thousand years before. . . . . .

As to the subjects of judgment, Matt. xxv. speaks only of the living—Rev. xx. only of the dead. "Before Him shall be gathered all nations," is the language of the one: "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God," is that of the other. Assiduous efforts are made to show that "all nations" includes the dead of all generations, and that "the dead, small and great," absolutely means all mankind. But the expression rendered "all nations," literally rendered, is "all the Gentiles. The word rendered "nations," [Ta ethnee] with the article, occurs, if we mistake not, one hundred and thirty-two times in the New Testament. It is rendered "the Gentiles" ninety-two times—"the nations" ten times—"the heathen" five times—and simply "nations" twenty-five times only; but it is never, in any instance (unless it be this), applied either to the dead or the raised. The very expression indicates a present existence upon earth. Nor is there any mention in the passage of "the opening of the graves," or "the sea giving up its dead," or any reference whatever to resurrection. It is the judgment of the Gentiles at the coming of Christ. Nor could any thing be in more perfect keeping with the whole discourse. Chap. xxiv. 15–41, gives the judgment of Israel; xxiv. 42, to xxv. 30, the judgment of Christendom; xxv. 31—46, the judgment of the Gentiles.

Rev. xx. 11–15, is the judgment of "the dead," or what our Lord terms, in John v. 29, "the resurrection of judgment." There is not a word in the passage of any but "the dead." "I saw the dead small and great, stand before God." "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works." . . .

With regard to the character of the judgment, the passages differ just as widely. That in Matt. xxv. is not, strickly speaking, so much a trial by a judge, as a calling up for sentence, and an award of punishment or reward by a King, to rebellious or obedient subjects. It is as King that Christ speaks and acts; and His very first act, after taking his seat upon "the throne of his glory," is a division of the gathered ones into classes, in a way which supposes their previous guilt or innocence. His first words are the sentence of the righteous, which, as well as that subsequently pronounced on the wicked, assumes, without any process of trial or opening of books, the obedience or rebellion of the sentenced ones. How different from the judgment of the great white throne, where the books are opened, and another book, which is the book of life; the dead being judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. Could two scenes of judgment be well described in more dissimilar terms?

WAS THE FLOOD UNIVERSAL?

We propose to make a very important application of our previous remarks on this question.

It is evident that the apostle Peter makes use of the flood as an illustration of the destruction of the Jewish polity, which is the subject of discussion in 2 Peter iii.

Our object has been to show, that the flood, which was the illustration of Peter, was limited to an extent of territory, called "the world of the ungodly." And that "the heavens and the earth," spoken of by this Apostle, are to be understood in the same limited sense, and not as applicable to the whole globe.

The reader may think the language of Peter is too strong to apply to the dissolution of the Jewish political and ecclesiastical heaven and earth. To all such, however, we must, with the apostle Peter, present the exhortation to "be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets." To them we shall appeal in illustration and confirmation of our position. But before proceeding to the prophets, permit us to inquire, what heaven, in the popular acceptation, and according to the orthodox view, are to be set on fire? and what elements are to melt with fervent heat? The firmament is called heaven in Genesis. Is this the heaven? Is it the etherial or atmospheric expanse, that is set on fire? Is it the atmospheric compound, called elements, which is to melt? Or is it the whole solar system, which is to be destroyed? Will some one tell us? And may we be permitted to ask, what have the sun, moon, and stars to do with the moral destiny of the earth?

But to the prophets. The reader will see, before we get through, that our views of the flood, as also the language of Peter, is fully sustained.

Turn now to Isaiah xxiv, and read a prediction concerning the land of Israel, "Behold the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad its inhabitants." Again, he says, "The land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled; for the Lord hath spoken this word."

What is termed the earth in the first verse, is, in the third verse called the land. Let the reader remember this.

"The earth, (4th v.) mourneth and fadeth away, the haughty people of the earth do languish." Here the sentence, the world languisheth, is explained by the haughty people of the earth do languish.

"The earth (5th v.) also is defiled under its inhabitants; because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant. Therefore hath the curse devoured (eaten up) the earth, and they that dwell in it are desolate: therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left."

Thus we have a devoured earth, and its inhabitants burned. Compare that with Peter.

The prophet then hints at the restoration of Israel, and passes on to the destruction of their enemies. "The earth is entirely broken down, the earth is entirely dissolved, the earth is exceedingly moved. The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard; and shall be removed like a cottage; and the transgression of it shall be heavy upon it; and it shall fall and not rise again." The language here in reference to "the great day of battle of God almighty," is much stronger, if any thing, than the language of Peter. And yet it bears internal evidence of being figurative. The earth is first spoken of as being utterly broken down; then as entirely dissolved, and finally, as exceedingly moved. Now, if it were literally dissolved it could not be subsequently moved. And furthermore, after being dissolved, it is represented as reeling to and fro, and as falling and not rising again. The whole, therefore, is but a highly wrought description of the dissolution of the political earth and ecclesiastical heavens, which shall be contemporaneous with the Lord's coming. Hence the prophet adds, "and it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall punish the host of the high ones that are on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth." It is needless to add that this could not be done, if the previous description is understood literally.

"And they shall be gathered as prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up in prison, and after many days shall they be visited. Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed when the Lord of hosts shall reign on Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Of course, then, the earth is not really to be dissolved, because, if so, Mount Zion and Jerusalem would be dissolved with it, and the Lord could not reign there.

You will now read Jeremiah iv. in which we have another prediction concerning the desolations of Zion. We quote from the 20th verse: "Destruction upon destruction is cried; for the whole land is laid waste; suddenly are my tents ruined, and my curtains in a moment. How long shall I see the standard and hear the sound of the trumpet? For my people are foolish, they have not known me; they are sottish children, and they have no understanding, they are wise to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge."

"I beheld the earth, and lo, it was without form and void; and the heavens, and they had no light. I beheld the mountains, and lo, they trembled, and all the hills moved lightly. I beheld, and lo, there was no man, and all the fowls of the heavens had fled. I beheld, and lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all its cities were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by his fierce anger. For thus saith the Lord, The whole land shall be desolate; yet will I not make a full end. For this shall the earth mourn, and the heavens above be black: because I have spoken it, I have purposed it, and will not repent, neither will I turn back from it."

The attentive reader must see in this quotation, as strong language as that used by Peter, or that used by our Lord in Matthew xxiv. And if we take heed to "the words of the Prophets," concerning the desolations of Zion, we must be convinced that Peter was describing nothing more than the passing away of the Jewish heavens and earth, the same heavens and earth of which Jeremiah speaks, when he says: "I beheld the earth, and lo, it was without form, and the heavens, and they had no light."

Again, Peter speaks of the elements melting with fervent heat, and in Jeremiah vii. 20, we read: "Therefore, thus saith the Lord God, behold my anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place, upon man and upon beast, and upon the trees of the field, and upon the fruit of the ground; and it shall burn, and shall not be quenched."

Again, in chapter ix. the Prophet says: "For the mountains will I take up a weeping and wailing, and for the inhabitants of the wilderness a lamentation, because they are burned up, so that none can pass through them;" &c. In chapter xvii. 27, we find the following: "But if ye will not hearken to me to hallow the Sabbath day, and not to bear a burden, even entering at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day; then will I kindle a fire in its gates, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched."

In chapter xxi. the Prophet, speaking of Israel's land, says—"I will kindle a fire in the forest thereof, and it shall devour all things around it."

In Joel ii. we have an extended description of the destruction of Jerusalem; but it is too lengthy for an entire insertion: we will only refer to some parts of it, and request the reader to peruse the whole.

The Prophet Joel, speaking of the mighty army which shall come against Jerusalem, says: "A fire devoureth before them; and behind them a flame burneth; the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness; and nothing shall escape them." Again, at the tenth verse, he says: "The earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble: the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining."

We conceive that we have presented sufficient testimony to sustain our position; but we will refer to a few passages for the purpose of illustrating the subject.

In Nahum i. 5, where the prophet is predicting the destruction of Nineveh, he says: "The mountains quake at him, (the Lord,) and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence, even the world, and all that dwell therein."

This language is equally strong with that of Peter, and yet it is undeniably applicable to the destruction of Nineveh. The hills are represented as melting, and the world as being burned up.

Zephaniah i. God says, "I will utterly consume all things from off the earth." Again, He says, "but the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy."

As a final quotation, on this subject, in this article, we refer to Malachi i. iv. "For behold the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."

Now, we appeal to the reader, whether or not we have sustained our exposition of Peter.

H. O.

THE PREACHING THAT CONVERTS.

"I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." John xii. 32. Other preaching may please, amuse, and entertain; but the love of Christ attracts, astonishes, draws, breaks, melts, subdues, and changes the heart. St. Paul knew this, and determined to preach "Jesus and him crucified."

In the light of his dying Saviour's cross, the sinner sees and feels the exceeding sinfulness of sin, the height and depth of the love of Christ. There, and only there, he beholds his sin atoned for, his guilt cancelled, the law magnified, justice satisfied, God glorified—just in justifying the ungodly who believe in Jesus. There, he is conquered, disarmed, won by the love of Christ. In a moment the prayer of faith ascends, the tears of penitence fall, regeneration of heart is effected, consecration of himself to God is made: "I am the Lord's"—he becomes a new creature in Christ Jesus.

What made the preaching of Berridge, and Hill, and Whitefield, and Wesley so efficient to the conversion of men, but that the love of Christ was the burden of their theme? They glorified Christ in their preaching, and the Holy Spirit glorified their preaching in the conversion of multitudes.

Never shall I forget seeing the late great and good Rowland Hill, of London, preaching in a market town in England on its market day. Like the Apostle Paul standing on the steps at Athens, Mr. Hill was mounted, in the midst of the market-place, in a lumber wagon of a farmer from the country, a man standing at his back holding up an umbrella to protect his head from the rays of the summer sun. I can yet see him as he then and there stood and preached, for upwards of an hour, the love of Christ to the thousands gathered around him. What volume of voice, what vehemence, what emotion of heart, what earnestness, what tears were his! Not an inch of the high-born gentleman, his ripe scholarship, his far spread fame, or any one thing that was Rowland Hill's, could be seen, but only the radiant glories of the Crucified One," in the "greatness of his love to man."

To see such another sight and hear such another sermon I would go far. Oh that our pulpits all may be filled by men possessing the spirit of Hill and his mantle fall on the ministry of the Gospel throughout the land and world.—Selected.

Children's Department.

"I will tell you how I came to write them. One night I wanted to attend church very much; but father and mother thought it my duty to remain at home. So I remained, and at that time these lines came to my mind. Though they are very simple they were just my feelings at that time."

DUTY.

This a little word, and homely,
Slighted by the rich and comely,
For it leads to rugged ways,
And with ease it seldom stays;
Never sparing the faint hearted,
Nor the ones in error started,
But it sends you on your way,
Never giving time for play.

Though you some times halt, and wonder
Why, you can't have time to ponder,
Duty says, be up and doing
While the Spirit now is wooing.

Life was not made for snoozing,
Or our talents giv'n for loosing;
Duty says, be working bravely
And not idle your time knavely,

Ah! yes, duty we will love you,
For you lead to one above you,
Though you seem so rough and rare,
We will try and treat you fair.

Take you right within our heart
Till you do the truth impart,
If the way of joy we'd know,
Never be to duty slow.

"NO JESUS"!

The following letter reached me in New York during my last visit to that city. It is from one of the lambs of the "little flock" in New Haven. The account of the "little Jew girl" is well calculated to touch the hearts of those who know there is a "Jesus." May the good Lord so water the "seed sown in that little girl's heart" that it may bear fruit unto life everlasting. And may He continue to bless the precious youth in the church in N. Haven. The example of this "little Jew girl," in daily reading the Holy Scriptures, should be followed by all the dear children who read the HERALD OF LIFE. This is the way to be made "wise unto salvation." A little girl here in Salem—who, for nearly eight years and a half, has filled a very big place in my heart—began three years ago last New-Year's Day to read one chapter every day in the New Testament, and she has steadily kept up the practice from that time. On the 20th day of October, 1863, the same little girl began to devote a portion of every twenty-four hours read two chapters everp day in the Old Testament, which she has regularly done ever since. This makes three chapters a day—1095 chapters in a year. The Bible (including Psalms) contains 1189 chapters. These figures will show the children who read this "Department" of our paper, that the little boy or girl who reads only three chapters a day, will get almost through the Precious Volume in one year! Who that peruses these lines, and has not yet become a daily Bible reader, will begin at once to the perusal of the Sacred Word?

But I am detaining the children from Addie's letter. As I was summoned from New York by telegraph, to attend a funeral, and came through New Haven in the night, Addie will understand why I could not see any of them on my way home. R. W.

Salem, Mass, March 9, 1865.

DEAR FRIEND:—I now hasten to write you a few lines. I think I promised to write to you, but I have had so much to do that I have not had time; I go to school every day. We have our prayer meetings yet; and if you will come this way when you go home, perhaps you might be in time to be to our prayer meeting. We have them Tuesday evenings instead of Saturday. Last Saturday there were thirteen out to meeting; four of them were never there before. Br. Hotchkiss's youngest girl has been talking to a little Jew girl about Jesus. She gave her a little Testament and told her to read it. She took it home and asked her father if she could read it, and he told her she could not, and that there was no Jesus. But she knew better, and she reads it every day and prays. She goes to our prayer meetings. She always speaks and prays. There is a seed sown in that little girl's heart that her father cannot root out. I think that Jesus has got her in his fold, and I hope that by the grace of God she may stand the storm, and at last be saved when Jesus comes to make up his jewels. Remember me in your prayers that I may prove faithful and be saved when He comes. Please come this way when you go home. I am going to meeting to-night over to Fair Haven. Answer soon. From Your Friend, ADDIE.

THE LIGHT OF LIFE.

"The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light: they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined. . . . For unto us a child is born; unto us a Son is given."—Isa. ix. 2, 6.

To understand the rapt utterances of the Hebrew, prophets more particularly of Isaiah, we must, as it were, appropriate their peculiar consciousness—pass into that mental state in which they were when their lips poured forth the inspired thoughts which the Spirit of God kindled within them. The mood, if not the mode, of inspiration may be partially understood by the form which the prophetic utterances sometimes take. Before the mental eye of the seer, when under the divine afflatus or impulse, a vision seems to have been presented of the nature sometimes of a scenic representation. Its diversified imagery are foreshadows of the future, and as the prophet gazes on these apparent realities, he proclaims what he sees, as events then occurring, with that graphic grandeur of speech which the peculiarity of the revelation naturally inspires. It seems necessary to imagine the prophet Isaiah in this particular mental mood when he uttered or penned our text. His eye rests upon a vision of Northern Palestine—"Galilee of the nations." But it is a vision of darkness. In the deep recesses of a bleak barren valley, over which darkness broods, he sees Galilee of the nations, and this darkness is described as the shadow of death, fit emblem of the darkness, the still deeper darkness of death itself.

Death claims that gloomy valley as his own—it is the grim border land of the dark demon's territory. It is called, "the land of the shadow of death," and "the valley of the shadow of death," because it is in the near neighborhood of the dark and dreadful capital where death himself reigns in absolute and eternal sway. There people dwell and walk in darkness, for even the shadow of death is darkness, though a darkness which may be dispersed. This valley, though under the dominion of death, is not so fully incorporated with his empire as to be unredeemable. As border land it is not so completely under his ebon rule. The shadow, not the absolute substance of death, is there, hence there is redemption from the land of the shadow of death. While penetrating with more than human vision this thick darkness—this shade of grim death—and marking the wretchedness and horrible gloom of that dwelling place of the people, suddenly the darkness begins to fold itself up like a thick black pall, and roll off the face of these gloomy homes. A light has broken upon the dreary solitudes of Galilee, and the upward turned faces of the people express their common and heartfelt joy. It is at this moment of time that the prophet speaks,—"The people that walk in darkness have seen a great light," or as Luther has it—"See a great light, &c., ... for unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given."

Under the image of a light, a great light, breaking upon darkness spread over Galilee, does the prophet describe the birth of Christ—the child born—the son given. This child, this son, or Christ, is the great light.

The prophet speaks of Galilee, not because Galilee was exclusively "the land of darkness and the shadow of death;" but because it was in that particular spot of the world's universal darkness that the light first dawned. Galilee was the home of Christ, and the scene of his first and principal public labors. (Matt. iv. 13–17.) And while we are not to restrict the darkness to Galilee, although this particular province of Palestine is specially mentioned, neither are we to conclude that Christ was a light exclusively to the Galileeans. Others sat in darkness besides "Galilee of the nations;"—"darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness the people," and the unspeakable goodness of God provided a light whose beneficent beams chould penetrate to the uttermost ends of the earth. The apostle John says of Christ,—"That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." It will be apparent then that our text has no partial, but a world-wide application. Christ, as the light of men, is the light of "every man that cometh into the world." "I am come," he said, "a light into the world that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness." "As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world."

But what are we to understand by this light? In what special sense is the Lord Jesus Christ the Light of the world? Let us glance again at the prophetic imagery in our text. We have, in this verse, an example of the poetic parallelism, a construction very common in Hebrew poetry. The idea of the first member of this parallism is repeated and explained in the second member thus—

"They that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined."

Thus the darkness of the first member is represented and explained by the land of the shadow of death in the second member. The darkness then, is poetically death's gloomy shadow, and actually the representation of a people living under the dominion of death, a mortal people, a people having no inherent or constitutional deathlessness, no essential life beyond the narrow limits of the present brief span of earthly existence. The poet-prophet repeats in our text the humiliating and affecting truth that man—intellectual and moral man, as well as physical man,—is of the earth, earthy—that the conscious being descends into the dust of death,—that all that characterizes and constitutes the creature man is absolutely mortal. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

When, therefore, we hear the prophet say that upon such a people a light has shined, and that they have seen a great light, consistency of interpretation requires us to understand the light as the poetical image of life. If the darkness is the poetical image of death in our text, then the light must necessarily be the poetical image of life. And as this great light is the child born, and the son given, who is Jesus Christ, then we obtain the glorious truth that our Lord Jesus Christ is the Light of men in the sense of being the life of men. And so writes the apostle John:—"In him was Life and the Life was the Light of men." And says our Lord himself, "I am the Light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."

Glorious fact! but, alas! how little understood. This Great Light which has dawned upon our dark world, has not even yet, in the decline of the nineteenth century, been comprehended by the professing church. "The Light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended (or embraced) it not." This lament of the devoted John is true to this hour. The false theology of the churches on the subject of man's constitutional immortality is a dense and impenetrable darkness, through which the rays of this scriptural truth cannot penetrate. The churches, one and all, have comprehended theheathen philosophy of Plato concerning the immortality and separate state of the soul, hence they have not comprehended the Light which shineth in the darkness of this earthly theology. Nor will they until they turn away from their false teaching to the Scriptures of truth—and loosing all confidence in popular creeds, however venerable, shall betake themselves to the true spirit of Christian fidelity to the law and to the testimony, as the surest lamp to their feet and light to their path. We have in the Scriptures a more sure word of prophecy than the theology of the churches, whereunto, reader, ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn (the day of Christ's reappearing as the Resurrection and the Life,) and the Day-star arise in your hearts.

THE BOSTON DISCUSSION.

FIFTH EVENING.

March 22, 1865.

The discussion was resumed last evening. On the previous evening the negative had quoted Ex. xii. 38, xxiii. 2, Ezek. xxxi. 5, Ps. xcvii. 1, Num. xxxii. 1 to prove that "many" in Dan. xii. 2 might be rendered "multitudes." The affirmative took up each of these texts and showed that they do not sustain such a position.

The affirmative gave the following reading of some passages in 1 Cor. xv., as suited to the doctrine of the negative: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in coruprtion: it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in dishonor: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in weakness: it is sown a natural body; it is raised a natural body. . . . The dead shall be raised corruptible."

The affirmative argued from the phrase "first fruits" in 1 Cor. xv. 20—the non-resurrection of the wicked. The first-fruits represent the harvest. "If the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy." Rom. xi. 16. Hence the unholy dead are not in the resurrection harvest.

The affirmative referred to his argument on "the bread of life," and asked the negative to notice it. He put the following question—"Does the bread of life secure a resurrection of anybody, good or bad?" No reply was given.

The negative repeated his mis-quotation of 1 Tim. iv. 10—reading "Christ" instead of "the living God"—which only had the effect of bringing out a pungent retort from the affirmative. If the salvation to "all men" in the text implies the future life of all men, then to a great majority it will be an unmitigated curse. "If this is the common salvation, I beg to be excused from having any part in the special salvation".

The negative tried to prove the resurrection of the wicked by the phrase "free gift" of Romans v. The affirmative replied that the "free gift" is not "a curse."

The negative consumed the most of his time in referring to objections, but utterly failed to make the faintest reply to the strong reasons of his opponent. He talked about "the free gift" being "bought," and reiterated his assertion, that the righteous dead are "made incorruptible after they are raised." How a sane man can make a statement, and repeat it again and again, in the face of the plain declaration that "the dead shall be raised incorruptible," is a psychological mystery to us. His apprehension of "immortality" was evidenced by the following remark: "If Lazarus had lived on in his natural condition after his resurrection he would have been immortal." He defined "immortality"—"not susceptible of death," and hence Lazarus would have been immortal because he would not be "susceptible of death."

To the affirmative's appeal to John vi. 19—"Your fathers did eat mamnna in the wilderness, and are dead"—the negative answered—"Is'nt Abraham dead?" and quoted Paul's remark in Col. iii. 3—"Ye are dead." He also identified the "first fruits" of 1 Cor. xv. 20 with "the first resurrection" of Rev. xx. 5. He does not appear capable of understanding the simplest argument.

The affirmative brought out an additional argument on the import of "perish," showing beyond all doubt that John iii. 16 and 1 Cor. xv. 18 together establish the non-resurrection of the ungodly.

THE RESURRECTION: LIGHT WANTED.

In conversing with a friend on the resurrection of the dead, a query like the following arose: suppose a person were to have a limb, or limbs amputated, say in Europe, and should remove to this country and die and be buried here, the body thus separated returns to dust, enters into the vegetable, from that to the animal, and so on; now will that body be reunited in the resurrection? I think my friend believes there is no resurrection but what takes place at death. The body of course has no part in it. My friend says, "I must have more convincing argument than I have yet seen, to satisfy my mind to the contrary."

Will you please give what he considers a bible view in the Herald of Life? I find many, who claim that the resurrection will be to a mortal state, and the righteous changed to immortality; notwithstanding Paul, in 1 Cor. xv. says plainly, "It is raised a spiritual body: it is raised in incorruption: it is raised in power." I thank God for his word. I had rather have it than all the traditions and theories of man extant. "Though heaven and earth pass away [his] word shall not pass away."

Geo. U. Lewis.

RESPONSE BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

The scriptures plainly teach that there will be a resurrection of the body—which shall be a restoration of the subject of it to life. It must be the same body, in identity, for the man must be the same being: and the apostle settles this question by saying, "It is sown a natural body, It is raised a spiritual body." The same identity is here considered, but another character is given to the individual or identical existence referred to.

Paul who wished to remove forever the objection to the doctrine of the resurrection of man, as including the existence of the real bodily or physical nature, says, "that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die."

The argument is supposed to be involved in the question, "With what body do they come?" This is the import of our friend's question—"How can they have a body after such a destruction of it and appropriation of its material?" The objection that it is some other body (or may be) arises from a misconception of Paul's illustration. When he remarks, "thou sowest not the body that shall be," he only shows that the same kernel of wheat will cease to exist, but one of the same nature, qualified as new will appear; and that it must be wheat because the seed was. And God having given to every seed its own body, there can be no deviation. Now. it is as true of man as anything else, that God has made that being a body; an identical body belongs to him—to the race, and to the individual. If therefore, there is a recovery from death the body must be of the same identity as before. But do you not see that identity may exist with various new qualifications and characteristics which do not, and never will, alter the real nature of the existence? Our human being is the real existence. We have a physical, bodily nature which is marked and known by the peculiarities of the species. The great state, conditions, qualifications, or characteristics, of this existence, now show the effect of sin: they have been introduced since man's original creation. Salvation is a restoration. The resurrection is a part of this work. It completes it. Then the conditions and qualifications of this being will be new. It is now a natural body. It will be, in the resurrection, a spiritual body. But the same identity. Not the same as a corruptible body: not the body now, "that shall be"—not in the state it is now.

Much of the trouble on this subject comes from the lingering notion that man is dual, or a double being: that the body is only a shell out of which the man creeps at death; and into which he must creep back when the body is raised—the soul entity having been kept all the while—but this is a mistake altogether.

We believe that man is a being of one individuality, or identity. Hence when he is dead (when the body is dead, if you please) he has no actual conscious being. When therefore, he comes to life, he is the same man that he was before; consequently there must be, scripturally speaking, the same body.

As to the objection that the body has been left, in parts and pieces, in different parts of the world—the man dying in one land, while a foot or a hand had been left in another; it is of no weight, since the power of God can secure the result of the reunion and reanimation of this body, just as well as if it had been in the grave altogether; and if a complete decay must take place after death, then there must be a miracle of the same extent to produce the recovery; and so what matters it if there is no visible possibility of the recovery of the life of the parts? there is indeed none of the body even before the decomposition, (after death) so there should be nothing gained by putting the victim in so difficult a light. All natural law is violated by his resurrection, anyhow!

We do not conceive that the distribution of the body of the man throughout all nature or its uses or appropriations in nature, in whatever forms, lies against the view of a literal resurrection of the man,—including the same identity; for, first, the identity does not now consist in the presence and agregation of all parts or particles of the man. Nor should it of all the parts which may have composed him; for then he would have too much; he would be more than himself!

Secondly, there are certain elements, composing us, physically, and these may be all incorporated into the same man. Suppose that earth, air, and water, or solids fluids and gases, or that all the primary principles of nature entering into the composition of man go back to nature, at death, they can all come again to the same organism by the same power which organized man at first.

What difference should it make where the particles are, when God shall call for them? Nature has retained them safely, and will restore them, at his call. But it is objected especially that the vegetable and animal kingdoms have received and incorporated these particles. We do not claim the return of particles, but of forces, of agencies, of action. And with them, cannot God secure volume?

The same body does not always require the same particles; for we do not have the same particles now, yet we have the same identity; and we are supposed to have the same body.

Thirdly, the action is what gives knowledge of ourselves to ourselves and to others. If I know myself; I may be asked how I am aware of my own identity? I should answer I am conscious of it. What is consciousness? The knowledge which the mind takes of its own operations. Now this is mental action; and mental action is, to say the least, connected with physical organism, and we say that mentality is the result of the organism, which we receive from God; the action of the elements of which we are composed in their organized action. Of course, they are under the divine guidance and wisdom.

Now we claim that a man composed of the same materials of which he was composed, and made as he would be, if God should undertake to give him the same identity,—to look like the same being; in one word, with all conformations to answer to the man who had lived; with the action secured that shall give him consciousness of the same self, will be the same self; and this being true of all, why shall not all be formed in the same identical manhood, and in the same body as a legitimate consequence? but free from all the circumstances of mortality which attended the being before; so that, so far as a condition is concerned, it is not the same body—it is redeemed.

Let us now quote the testimony of St. Paul. "Not only so, but ourselves also which have the first fruits of the Spirit; we groan within ourselves waiting for the adoption, to wit the redemption of the body." Now if the body is redeemed, is it the same or another? What about the identity of a man who is redeemed from bondage? Is he the same man? is he himself, or some one else? We will take one of our returned soldiers, who has been starved to emaciation in a rebel prison, and now stands the same man, with the same bodily identity, but with not all the particles of matter, which he possessed if even he has not lost a hand or foot. He is redeemed—the same man. If now some Christian soldier died there, (and sixty thousand soldiers have died in rebel prisons—the great proportion of them starved to death) in the resurrection, will he have the same identity—the same body? He hardly had the half of his own body, in particles, before he died—will he have the same person? Yes. He lost the particles of matter before he died, yet he had the same identical body, because the same being when he died. Will he not have the same body notwithstanding particles have gone off into all nature?

To attempt to throw a philosophical difficulty in the way of a real identical body of the man, in the resurrection, when the resurrection is opposed to all natural law, is most certainly an attempt to throw discredit upon the doctrine altogether, if not to indirectly deny it. To suppose that Paul intends to illustrate the manner of rising by his figure of the germinating wheat, when there can be no indestructible part of the body that can be considered a germ, is absurd. No, Sir. Those who advocate a germ, really design, I think, to contend for the indestructibility of man—that is to say, his immortality. Paul says the body shall be redeemed. Would not it be the same body as really as this man has the same body, in his return—his redemption? Another quotation. "These vile bodies shall be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body."

I should really like to know, with this passage before us, how there should be any other body of which to make one, like unto Christ's, but the one we have? called, "our vile body."

This mortal body, and the glorified body must be the condition of existence which is called resurrection of life—to the believers in the world to come. The believer in the "sleep of the dead" must accord to the "dead in Christ" a condition of completeness and perfection, all secured by the miracle of the resurrection. There is to such a man's conceptions no quality in man which can in the least affect the condition of the believers hereafter, if the resurrection should fail. The whole of the future, to us, is brought to our view by that. It is all in Christ, by this power. If it is essential to the man, there as well as here, to be the same man, he will have the same body.

"With what body do they come?" Is it a mortal one, or immortal? The apostle does not intimate the resurrection of the wicked dead in 1 Cor. xv. If he does, I fail to see it; and certainly, not in the language of the quotation. "It is sown in corruption, raised in incorruption;" the raising of the dead is thus set forth and then they are to remain as they are brought up with no change. "How are the dead raised up?" "With what body?" Is it mortal, to be changed afterward? That would positively conflict with what the apostle says,—for he declares the "dead shall be raised incorruptible." Now, a mortal body, in the resurrection, is nowhere taught in the scriptures, or suggested. It is to be noticed that the raising of the dead saints in mortal bodies, is raising them to a mortal state. This is one of the most absurd and unscriptural positions which can possibly be taken upon the subject. If we believed that the soul were still alive, in death, and in the resurrection brought back to the body, it would not be so completely rediculous—but to pretend that the saints sleep in Jesus, and wake up out of him, literally (if they are really dead, till raised) implies more than weakness—insincerity!

BY T. GEORGE BELL, D. D.

These words sound forth from many thousand lips—alas! from far more lips than hearts. They stand connected in God's word with that sweetest of exclamations, "Our Father!" Vast assemblies of mere professors repeat them. Hundreds chant, to the peal of the organ, the words, "Thy kingdom come." Where the heart is not right with God, mere words cannot please him. Perhaps amid the sound one whisper of faith ascends; it has come from some heart filled with love to Jesus: it is the whisper of a babe in Christ, "Thy kingdom come." This is prayer; it is the voice of the child which enters the ear of the Father. What a contrast between this accepted voice and the lip-service of the ignorant multitude of formalists!

Whose kingdom is it for which we pray? Is it the kingdom of God as Creator?

That kingdom has always been since He spoke the world into being. Man's sin and rebellion did not, and could not, shake the throne of the Almighty, or alter his right to possess the thing which he had made. Is it the kingdom of God as supreme Governor and Director of all things? That kingdom has also come—could never cease to be. There have been men so foolish as to declare that God, having made the world and put man into it, left it to manage all its own affairs by the power of certain fixed principles, which He put into it. Others, equally deceived, have said that when man brought sin into the world God turned his back upon it, and, seated in some far-off glory, left man to work out his own evil designs. The word of God, and the daily experience of every enlightened man, declares the very opposite of all this. God exercises an all-prevading providence. There is no such thing as chance in the world. God's omniscient eye ranges through the universe—takes it all up at a glance, yet watches the very sparrow falling to the ground.

The words, "Our Father" give us the key to the meaning of the prayer, "Thy kingdom come." It is not the creature's prayer for the kingdom of the Creator, but the child's prayer for the kingdom of the Father. Still more correctly, it is the prayer of the disciple of the Lord Jesus for the kingdom of his one Master and Lord. The children of God are a new family, made up of individuals separated from the race of Adam. No outward rite avails anything, or any profession, neither work of human hands nor device of human hearts. It is a "new creation." The children are born of God, even by the regeneration of the Holy Spirit. Consequently they are a new race, being brought into union with the Lord Jesus Christ.

Man's religion never comes up to this. He cannot understand relationship to God. He only as the creature attempts to appease the Creator. It is only the man who has been born again who can cry, "My Father, God!" Vital Christianity is founded upon God's own revelation. This is a declaration of sovereign, distinguishing grace, calling out a family, and giving to each member of it a new life, quickening him—who had been up to that moment dead—into the risen life of the living Christ at God's right hand. Christ is the head of the family; it is by him that the family is gathered together, through him we receive the adoption of sons—we are joint-heirs with him—his kingdom is ours, and we shall possess it with him when He takes it to reign. The Father has given all power and dominion to the Son, and the petition we are considering is the cry of the joint-heir who longs to enter upon the possession of his inheritance.

Much that is written and spoken in these days about the universal fatherhood of God is most delusive, for it smooths down, in the deceived heart, the barrier which sin has made between the holy God and the fallen, degenerate, and guilty human family. We must meet God in Christ before we can call him "Our Father," and we must be thus heirs of the kingdom before we can truly desire that kingdom to come.

The prayer is in itself a proof that the kingdom has not come yet. Christ has the right to reign, and, in a certain sense, he is reigning, having now all power both in heaven and earth; but in another and most important sense he is not reigning, for he has not yet manifestly taken to himself the throne. He sits upon the Father's throne according to that we read, "Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool." The prophecy of Daniel remains yet to be accomplished: "The Son of Man, came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that shall not be destroyed." The fulfilment of that Scripture will be also the accomplishment of another Revelation: "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever."

We may think of the kingdom under two aspects; its internal and spiritual development, and its external and complete manifestation. The first is now in process of accomplishment by the power of the Holy Spirit; the latter will be hereafter accomplished by the presence and power of the Lord Jesus Christ at his coming. Jesus once said "My kingdom is not of this world." He evidently meant to declare that the power to establish it was not earthly. By no human power or worldly influence was it to be set up. If He had meant that his kingdom would never be set up in this world, he would have been contradicting many Scriptures. This He could never do. The two aspects of the kingdom are—

1. Internal or Spiritual. "The kingdom of God is not meat or drink," that is, mere external observances or works, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. This is the experience of the individual. Every sinner brought, through the new birth, into the new creation in Christ Jesus, makes a part of the kingdom. Every fresh step taken by a child of God in the way of obedience, of self-deniel, of holiness in conformity to the example of Christ, adds strength to the kingdom. May God lead us into self-judgment, for we often cry, "Thy kingdom come," whilst in the actions of our lives we are showing great indifference to its progress.

2. Outward Manifestations. This is at the appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ. He comes a second time without sin unto salvation. He comes for the full deliverance of his whole Church out of the tribulations of a Christ-rejecting age, and for their establishment with himself in that kingdom for which we pray. A Scripture in Luke xvii. is sometimes brought against our views of the outward manifestation of the kingdom: "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." The Lord certainly declares that his kingdom was not to come at that time with observation, but He as plainly points forward to another time when it should so come, for he says: "As the lightning that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, so shall the Son of Man be in His day." The lightning is visible and manifest to all, "so shall also the Son of Man be in his day." The present age is not the Son of Man's day. He is rejected. The world has cast him out. This is man's day. Man's day ends with the world's midnight. That will be in terror and dismay; men's hearts failing them for fear in looking on the things which are coming on the earth. Christ's day will then begin. For its dawning thousands are looking. Yes! though in God's sight the world is dead and the Church may be asleep, yet thousands of God's believing people are awakening to the solemn import of the times, and are waiting for their Lord from heaven. Thus, better far than the ignorant cry of the mere professing multitude, there is rising up, continually, the true prayer of many an earnest heart—"Thy kingdom come."—Prophetic Times.

LITTLE ONES AT PRAYER TIME.

More parents than one have felt perplexed in not being able to keep the little folks quiet during prayers. To them the following bit of experience may not be uninteresting. My little George, nearly six years old, has perhaps as much mercury in his composition as most lads of his age. Indeed, he has always been a noted character for restlessness, and this he has frequently displayed, much to my grief, at the family altar. He has often been punished in various ways, but has soon forgotten it.

A few weeks ago he had done about his best during the entire services, and when we arose from prayer I kissed him. He looked astonished (had his mother done it, that would have been no surprise) and said:—

"Pa, why did you kiss me?"

"Because you were a good boy while we were praying."

"Oh! well I'm glad," and his eyes fairly sparkled with satisfaction, and off he ran to play.

There has been no more trouble in that line, and every morning he comes for a kiss. A similar trial may have a good effect in other cases. A slight reward timely bestowed may prevent the necessity of heavy punishment. In the government of God over men he not only punishes for evil, but rewards for well doing. Surely it is safe to copy after the great Original.—Christian Guardian.

THE CHILD AT PLAY.

A little boy was running about in an apartment, amusing himself as children are accustomed to do. His money was potsherds, his house bits of wood, his horse a stick, and his child a doll. In the same apartment sat his father, at a table, occupied with important matters of business, which he noted and arranged for the future benefit of his young companion. The child frequently ran to him, asked many foolish questions, and begged one thing after another as necessary for his diversion. The father answered briefly, did not intermit his work, but all the time kept a watchful eye over the child, to save him from any serious fall or injury. Gotthold was a spectator of the scene, and thought within himself: How beautiful an adumbration of the fatherly care of God!—We, too, who are old children, course about in the world, and often play at games which are much more foolish than those of our little ones; we collect and scatter, build and demolish, plant and pluck up, ride and drive, eat and drink; sing and play, and fancy that we are performing great exploits, well worthy of God's special attention. Meanwhile, however, the Omniscent is sitting by and writing our days in His book. He orders and executes all that is to befall us, overruling it for our best interests in time and eternity; and yet his eye never ceases to watch over us, and the childish sports in which we are engaged, that we may meet with no deadly mischief.

My God, such knowledge is too wonderful for me. It is high, and I cannot attain unto it: but I shall thank and praise thee for it. O, my Father! withold not from me thy care and protection, and above all, at those times when, perhaps, like this little one, I am playing the fool.—Selected.

DEATH OF A CHILD.

John Rhodes, son of Br. Stephen B. and Sr. Mariah Billings, of Eatontown, N. J., died on Thursday morning 23d inst 6 1-2 o'clock; aged 8 years 1 month and 14 days.

For some weeks he had been laboring with whooping cough that was finally assisted by congestion of the lungs which made hasty work. The last 12 hours of his life, his little body was racked with convulsions, which made it heart rending for tender parents to look upon him.

His native benevolence and hospitality was so abundant even though so young as to be noticed by all, which tends to make his loss more keenly felt. At his funeral, the writer sought from Rom. viii. 11, to impress upon a good number of sympathizing friends the absolute necessity of having the indwelling of the Spirit of Him, who raised Christ from the dead, in order to have our mortal bodies quickened unto eternal life.

Our Br. and Sr. mourn not as those who have no hope; for they expect to clasp their little boy again when the chilling hand of death will afflict no more.

A Jewish Parable.—A poor man was travelling on a hot day, carrying a heavy load upon his back. A rich man passing by in his chariot took pity on him, and invited him to take a seat in his chariot behind. Shortly after, on turning round, the rich man saw the pilgrim still oppressed with the load upon his back, and asked him why he did not lay it on his chariot. The poor man said that it was enough that he had been allowed to be himself in the chariot, and he could not pre ume to ask for more. "Oh, foolish man," was the reply," if I am willing and able to carry you, am I not able to carry your burden?" Oppressed and anxious christian, do you not see in this man your own unbelief and folly? He who has accepted your person and is your reconciled Father in Christ Jesus, expects you to cast upon him all your burdens and cares too, and he is able to sustain it. Has he not also said for your encouragement and comfort, "He careth for you." Precious words; may we all experience all the joyful relief they are intended to convey.

NEW YORK, MARCH 29, 1865.

Life Believers in New York.

Life only in Christ, is the grandest and most glorious truth ever brought to the ears of mortal man. The friends of this heavenly message, in New York and vicinity, have engaged Dodworth Hall, 806 Broadway, for meetings on the "first day of the week," for the year to come. Preaching morning and evening, uniformly, every Lord's day, at the usual hours of public services. Seats free.

Joseph T. Curry is expected to preach there each Lord's day during the month of April.

The Christian Passover.

The Life believers in New York and Brooklyn, will meet for the observance of this feast. The commemoration of our Lord's death is, in the nature of the case, and in harmony with all other memorial of events, an anniversary celebration. Therefore, the doing "this in remembrance of" Christ's death, and to "show forth his death till he come," is our object; and, by Divine permission, it will be attended to in New York on its anniversary; which, this year, falls on Monday eve, April 10th. The friends abroad who have not the opportunity to attend to it at home, are invited to be with us on the occasion; which we trust will be one of much interest. The gathering in the evening will be at an early hour. A moderate repast will be provided for the opening of "the feast," and such other matters attended to as shall be suitable to the occasion. The closing service will be eating the bread and drinking the wine in commemoration of our Redeemer's broken body and shed blood. All who love the Saviour are welcome to participate with us at their and our Lord's table. Let each examine himself, or herself, and see that the feast is kept so as to honor our Lord.

The place of meeting for this Feast, will be the same we occupied last year, viz, Room No. 18, Cooper Institute, Cor. of Bowery and Eighth St.

Let none suppose because they are are unable to meet in company with others that they can not keep the feast. We doubt not you can keep it acceptably at home, and alone, if attended to as a memorial of our Lord's death and in memory of his love.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

The time for holding this Conference has been fixed for Sunday April 23d, in Dodworth Hall, 806 Broadway, New York. Services three or more times on the first day, and to be continued as far into the week as thought best; doubtless through Monday and Tuesday, if no more. Important matters will come up at this Conference relating to future operations and missionary work. All who feel an interest in these things should be present as early Monday as possible, as these matters will be under consideration Monday and Tuesday. We presume that most preachers will have appointments in other places which will prevent their attendance till Monday. On their account business matters will not be called up on "the first day."

"Degrees in Punishment."

BY S. W. BISHOP.

"Punished according to the deeds done in the body." Many times have we been asked, "If your doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked is true, how can the wicked be punished according to the deeds done in the body?"

In the first place, we remark there is no text of scripture that reads they shall be punished according to the deeds done in the body. Here is where the misapprehension lies. Many suppose that certain texts of scripture so read as to discriminate between different classes of sinners, and that the doctrine of the bible is, that the punishment of wicked men is to be intense, or mild according as the subject of that punishment has been to a greater or less degree culpable. This doctrine of degress in punishment we think has no foundation in the word of God. The Bible does not discriminate between different degrees of crime, or between different classes of sinners; but between the good and the bad; between the righteous and the wicked.

Take as an example of the texts of scripture of the class we are considering, Rom. ii. 6, which reads, "Who will render to every man according to his deeds." Whatever else may be said of this text and its connection, one thing is certain, the only discrimination in the text is between the good and the bad. But there are texts which are supposed to contradict this doctrine. We are told that Christ says, "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment" than for certain Jewish cities. In the first place, this text has no reference to the last judgment whatever. Sodom had long ere the utterance of these words by Jesus passed every step through to the execution of judgment. Christ simply calls up the case of Sodom, and others, as an example for that wicked generation whose judgment was then pending. The great idea designed to be impressed on the minds of the people, that heard this language of the Son of God is this, that as Sodom sinned under less favorable circumstances than the Jews, and still she experienced an utter overthrow, the justice of God will most certainly be vindicated in the destruction of these cities that have sinned under greater light.

A fair, impartial construction of the whole text and context we think proves this and nothing more. We find its parallel in Heb. x. 29, "Of how much sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God," &c. Here we are told, that those that reject Christ and the gospel, will receive sorer punishment than those who despised Moses' law. When we adopt Prof. Murdock's rendering of the text, which not only bears upon its very face, the impress of its own genuineness, but is in perfect harmony with the general tenor of all the scriptures, we find no trouble with it. He translates it thus: "For if he, who transgressed the law of Moses, died without mercies . . . how much more will he receive capital punishment," &c.

Here is brought out distinctly the only idea that we think is designed to be impressed by our Lord, in what he says concerning Sodom, &c., viz., that as these nations and cities in their judgment were utterly destroyed while sinning against but little light; the destruction of these cities of Judea will most certainly be accomplished, and that justly too, from the fact they have sinned against greater light.

We readily concede that under different circumstances different sinners, both individuals and classes of individuls, have suffered more than other individuals or classes of individuals under other circumstances; but this proves nothing as respects the infliction of that punishment which is the penalty of the divine law. That penalty is death, and death only. Now if it were true that the Sodomites did suffer more than the antedeluvians, it does not prove that the law of God required that extra amount of suffering to satisfy its demands. Should the Sodomites suffer ten times ten millions of years, the penalty of God's law is no more satisfied than if they had suffered none at all. The wages of sin is death.

There is no way that these "degree punishment" people can give any plausibility to their notion only by changing the penalty of God's law. The moment we admit that the penalty of God's law is death, and let death mean death, we virtually pledge ourself to the doctrine of one only punishment for the sinner, whatever may be his crimes.

There is no use in attempting to keep away logical minds from coming to logical conclusions: they will just as naturally come to such conclusions, as the magnet will point to the poles. We run no risk, neither are we dogmatical in saying, that every individual who is under the direction of a logically formed brain, will just as certain, and just as readily see, that if the penalty of the divine law is death, there can be no such thing as degrees in punishment; as a common intellect will see that two and two make four.

The only trouble is in getting men of reason and good sense to look these propositions squarely in the face. When these matters are investigated by men who are capable of of reasoning, there is no difference of opinion in their conclusions. Let us be consistent. Either stop talking about death being the penalty of God's law; or abandon the miserable, foolish whim of degrees in punishment of sinners.

Letters and Extracts.

From Samuel J. Brimhall.

Mapleton, Bourbon Co., Kansas, March 12, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—Last Sabbath, day and eve, a renowned D. D., preached two sermons for the people in this place. The first sermon was Isa. xxxiii. 17, "Thine eye shall see the King in his beauty; they shall behold the land that is afar off." Subject—"Heaven." Question—What and where is heaven? First, Heaven is a place, a land; it might with propriety be called a country. Introduced no scripture to prove his position; yet so far, very good. Second. Where is it? Then commenced a stream of argument from astronomy. He stated that scientific astronomy had discovered some eighty millions of suns; and that each sun had a complete concourse of planets, satellites, and stars revolving around it; and that the land of rest, the definite dwelling place of God, was the grand attractive centre of all the solar system; that these systems of worlds were all opaque, and that God was the great reflector from which all the light of these systems of worlds was produced; that this grand metropolis was not a little cooped up place like the city of Jerusalem, or even Palestine; but it is a world, a whole world the centre of all worlds; a land, a home where all the souls of the good of all ages shall dwell forever; that the souls of the righteous were wafted upon the wings of angels; they being sometimes caused to fly swiftly (quoted Daniel ix. 21.) to bear the redeemed to this grand centre sphere, which is afar off. There dwells perfection perfected; and there the King of that country displays the brightness of his glory to all eternity.

The second sermon was on the opposite subject, viz., "Hell." Text, Psa. ix. 17. "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God." Question: What and where is hell? First, hell is a place, a land, a place of punishment; a world like our world. Its locality was not definitely described; but it was not within the boundary of that vast concourse of planetary system described in the above sermon. That this hell-world came from the hand of the Creator more holy and pure and superior in every respect to this world of ours. That it is ruled by a great and notable prince or Governor called Lucifer; but in course of time, this notable prince fell; (quoted Isa. xiv. 12) that Lucifer bore the same relation to that world that Adam bears to this; and because that world, at its creation, was more perfect than this, consequently when Lucifer fell, and his world with him, a more powerful display of God's displeasure was manifested in the condemnation of Lucifer than was apparent in the fall of Adam; for punishment was always measured by the perpetude of the crime. (quoted Isa. xxx. 33.) This fallen world is the worst place in all God's dominions; therefore the place in every respect is calculated for the finally impenitent, and has become the general penitentiary for the wicked; that their punishment consisted in a mental remorse of conscience; that they sit in judgment on themselves, saying, I brought this on myself; and that they weep and groan over their condition in indescribable anguish; and it was his opinion, that after an infinite number of ages, God's displeasure might be satisfied, and that the wicked might be restored in part; but never to the full enjoyment of the righteous. That at the resurrection the righteous and wicked would be all raised indiscriminately. (quoted 1 Cor. xv. 53.) Were all judged, doomed to their particular sphere, which is best calculated to correspond with the tenor of their life; that the wicked were to live on in that fallen world, governed by Lucifer and his subordinates, the fallen angels; that the great gulf fixed between Heaven and Hell was a figure, denoting the character; and that Christ, so to speak, was the bridge across that gulf, &c., &c.

He then stated that he had deduced these conclusions from a careful examination of the Scriptures. I might give the two sermons almost verbatim, but my letter is too long already. This is a synopsis of some of the preaching in southern Kansas; and the result is no better for the sinner; and the ungodly say, that the D. D. has cooled off hell so much that they are willing to risk their chance with the laity of the churches, and will give themselves no trouble about it. Thank God, we have some preaching here that comes nearer the truth; but it is mixed up with the traditions of the fathers. I ask, did any of you ever see more vain philosophy in two sermons? Kansas is a healthy country; the weather is warm and pleasant here now; and it is settled by an intelligent people. My prayer is, that some messenger of God's truth, that preaches a whole gospel, (and not a quotation from Dr. Dick or Dr. Milton) may come this way and gather in a few sheaves, while the reaping time yet is, and before the harvest is closed. Yours for the Truth.

From Thomas W. Smith.

Butlerville, Tama Co., Iowa, March 11, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—I have just concluded a meeting at this place, which commenced on Saturday, 4th inst. Rode 70 miles in a lumber wagon, spending two days in the trip. Found Bros. Brayton and Churchill of N. Hartford, Butler Co., on hand. On Sunday we endeavored to present the doctrine of the Atonement in the scripture light; after which a number of questions were asked by different persons; and the interval between the discourses was spent in removing objections and in contending for the faith. Brs. Brayton and Churchill delivered several able and instructive discourses, and proved themselves able to rightly divide the word of life. They left us early Monday morning; while I remained and spoke twice a day till Friday. The doctrine of no life out of Christ was made prominent during the meeting; and several said, it was evident that no resurrection for the ungodly was taught in the Scriptures. We expected to have returned home early in the week; but the interest manifested demanded a longer stay. Indeed, we should stay a few days more, but as we are dependennt upon others for our traveling accommodations we have to go when they desire. This is one of the inconveniences of not having a means of traveling of our own. Hope, however, that that difficulty will soon be removed. When convenient and able, I would be glad to have you send a few tracts and back Nos. of Herald. I send you one new subscriber for Herald of Life.

Yours as ever in Hope of Life.

[In a later communication, from Alden, Iowa, his home, Br. Smith says:

I used to wonder how it was that those who held the "Non-resurrection view" could speak of it with so much love and approbation, and that it was such a favorite theme with them. But I see and understand now that such was the natural and unavoidable result of a belief in the doctrine. I was deeply impressed with a remark made by you, in a late Herald, that those who had left the Creed-worshipping assemblies and doctrines of Babylon, "Must go forward or turn back." I see that, as a truism, constantly. Those who have embraced, or are inquiring into the glorious theme of "no future life for the wicked," are the honest, and progressive spirits in the, so called, Advent body. I, for one, could not stop short of my present position and justify myself in the sight of God. The doctrine of no life out of Christ, is a legitimate and unavoidable consequence of the rejection of immortal-soulism and eternal torments. "No life—no immortality—no crown—no kingdom—no hope, out of Christ" is yet to be inscribed on the banners of all true believers: all others will ultimately be found in the ranks of the only other existing class, viz., Spiritualists. This may be thought a wild conjecture, but it is based on more than one Bible precedent.

[In another letter of still later date, Br. Smith, says:

I must have a horse by the 29th of this month, or I can not fill my appointments; for our Brethren cannot spare any at that season. I shall need a light wagon this summer nearly as much as a horse; for, beside the difficulty of carrying books on horseback, brethren and friends often offer me corn, potatoes, &c., which would be of great service to me, but which I must refuse on account of inability to carry them home. Often this is all the assistance many can give, and they offer it cheerfully and grieve because they cannot help in money Our brethren in the East can hardly realize the difference between their facilities for traveling and ours. There railroads are abundant. I am willing to devote my entire time to preaching; and sometimes ride from 20 to 70 miles on horseback, and otherwise, across bleak prairies in the winter, with houses 15 miles apart oftentimes. It is not so in the East. But I do not envy them their more pleasant situation. I am contented with mine.

[Remarks by the Editor.—Br. Smith has now been furnished with $70 towards the "Missionary Horse" through this Office; and we hope our friends will take up, at once, the 30 shares remaining in this "Horse Stock Company," as it has been called. Let us raise the $30 immediately. No time should be lost. We shall "knock on the dear Lord" for it, and it will come. Br. Smith, you may count it certain to come: no fear. So, praise the Lord and take courage.

From Jacob V. Collamore.

West Greenville, Pa., March 14, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—You wish to know the result of papers and other works sent me while in the army, early in 1864; and also, why I did not write after the army moved last May. When the army moved, I was detached from my Regiment, or was detailed by Gen. Birney for the field hospital. This separated me from those with whom I had been associated during the winter; so that I can say but little as to the final result of the books and papers on the minds of those who read them. I was kept in the hospital till I got my discharge from the service; so that I never saw many of them again. Many of them fell on the battle field; but even their death I did not hear of till so late that I thought it would be useless to write you about it. When we had a battle, then was the time to write you, in order to interest your readers; but that was the very time when I could not write; for then we had to work night and day, where thousands were suffering and hundreds dying. And then, think of our long and difficult marches from Culpepper around Richmond to Petersburg, where I got my discharge. Our mails also, were irregular, in fact, no regular mails to and from the field hospital. Letters and papers were not received for weeks after they were sent. Perhaps the readers of the Herald will not blame me for not writing when I tell them, I did not have an opportunity to change my clothes in the month of May 1864—I was near 40 days without a change of clothes; and such has been the case with many a poor fellow that now sleeps in Virginia soil.

As to those who received and believed the doctrine of life only in Christ—there are some that I cannot tell whether they are living or not, as I have not heard of them since the army moved last May. Br. W. W. Warren, whose letter can be found Vol. I. No. 21 of the Herald of Life, was wounded and returned home to his wife and friends, and there fell asleep, assured that he would awake when his Lord returns from heaven. Br. Green died on the battle field. He was firm in the belief that there is no eternal life out of Christ. He was raised a Baptist, and was one of the few who embraced the life theme the first time it was presented to him. He was a promising young man, and a Lieutenant at the time of his death. Br. Wiggins, who opposed for one year and then believed, was a member of the Methodist church for ten or twelve years. He was sick and sent to Washington. I know not whether he is alive or not. Br. Chamberlin had a fever, and the last I heard of him he was home, but very poorly. Br. Slayton is yet with the 57th Regt., P. V. There are many, who embraced the doctrine of life only in Christ, of whose where-abouts I know nothing.

I have visited Ohio, recently, and addressed a large crowd of Universalists, Spiritualists, and endless torment men, on the subject of "No life out of Christ." I occupied one hour, and then friend Luce addressed the audience on the evil of the docrine of inherent immortality. After this we occupied an hour in answering questions, which the audience had the privilege of asking. Some of the endless misery Ministers were compelled to take universal salvation in order to dodge the non-resurrection of the wicked. We had an interesting evening of three hours. Of course, there was talking in that time. I sent some of them, papers you had forwarded to me. You may hear from them soon, as many of them declared they would investigate the subject.

[The writer of the following is in the service of the United States. He is from R. I., and was a Local Methodist preacher. He was in Wasington City for some year or more, and we sent him the Herald to that place; but having heard nothing from him for a long while, we discontinued his paper, several weeks since. He now writes us from Jeffersonville, Ind., and says:

I have not seen a copy of your excellent paper for some months; but the fault is my own, as I neglected to inform you of my removal from Washington. I send you herewith $2. I wish the paper sent to my wife, in Albion, R. I. My term of service expires early in August. In moving from place to place, this winter, I have lost all track of the doctrine of life only in Christ. Most of those with whom I have become acquainted are my brethern of the Methodist E. Church: many of them seem afraid of me because I do not believe in endless misery. Well, I cannot help it. That doctrine had been a torment to me for a long time before I was brought to the truth as it is in Jesus. Thank God, since then the world has looked brighter; the character of our Father has shone with more resplendant glory. With my old belief I could never solve the fearful problem of the moral universe. It looks clear now; and I know that inherent immortality is one of the most fruitful sources of error in Christendom. I wish you abundent success in the great work of spreading the Gospel truth. Yours in the hope of an endless life through Jesus Christ alone.

J. Lewis writes from Otto, Fulton Co., Ills., Mar. 10th:—You may look for an increase to your list of subscribers from the old one arm'd preacher. Glory to God, the truth is onward: our numbers are increasing: the people are stirred up. The truth is, many have gone to reading their bibles to see if what the old "babbler" says is so. Quite a number have told me, they have read their bibles more since we have been preaching here than in all their lifetime previously. We feel thankful for the tracts sent. May the Lord reward those who have contributed to this object, with eternal life. A thousand thanks to Br. Jones, of Lebanon, Ill., for his liberality. May he be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. We want more tracts. People come from quite a distance to get them; for they have a thirst to hear and read of life. I wish to say to the brethern scattered abroad, that I shall the Lord willing, go out soon on a preaching tour, and if any wish my services they will write me at this place, until further notice.

[Note by the Ed.—We sent you, some ten days since, Bible vs. Tradition, 6 Watch Tower, 6 Life from the Dead, and 100 Tracts.

La Fayette Norris, Campton, Iowa, March 9th, writes:—That "Debate," here, has set the Preachers to work in this vicinity. They can hardly preach a se mon without saying something against the hated doctrine. The Congregationalist minister preached on the subject, to prove "The immortality of man irrespective of a moral character." I design to review his sermon at the same place, Sunday April 2, Providence permitting. I wish Sister Henry could return this way from her visit in the west. I will go to the Depot at Masonville to meet her, if she will. If she can come, or any other preacher of life only in Christ, they can write me stating particulars.

What force is there in the assertion that Adam died in the very day he ate the forbidden fruit. Please answer in the Herald, if conveinent.

[Remark by the Editor.—No "force" at all, in the sense in which our opponents make that "assertion." Adam did die in that very day in the sense of, in that very day his death was made certain and inevitable; so that he might be truly said to be "a dead man" from that moment; but in no other sense did he die that day. If he died a spiritual death, as some maintain, then redemption was impossible. Such a penalty must be met by a corresponding sacrifice, and he who should undertake to make it, must himself die a spiritual death. Such a death Christ did not die; and if Adam did, and that was the penalty, the race are hopelessly lost.

The Discussion Closed.

Br. Storrs:—You have had from Br. Curry a summary of the Debate between Br. Grant and myself up to the close of the fifth evening. The report of the remaining three evenings is to be prepared by myself; but I am unable to furnish it seasonably for next week's paper. Br. C.'s appointment in Manchester, N. H., obliged him to leave us on Thursday. The Discussion closed last evening at a little before ten o'clock. I availed myself of my right to have the closing speech—which made the whole number of my speeches twenty-five. From first to last I enjoyed my work exceedingly; but the conclusion of it finds me very weary. My feelings were deeply interested, and I sought in every speech, to the best of my ability, to make the evidences of "the non-resurrection of the wicked" stand out in bold relief.

The blessing of God, I have no doubt, will follow the effort. Our audiences throughout were good, and much interest was manifested in the subject. The Salem and Lynn friends were largely represented every evening. But this must suffice for the present. The Life truth is onward; we have every reason for encouragement in our labors. May the Lord gird us for a ceaseless conflict with error, and keep us faithful to the end.

The War News.

The war news of the past few weeks has been more important than at almost any previous period. The armies of the Union are steadlily and irresistably closing in on the rebels, on every side. Gen. Grant holds the rebel Gen. Lee fast in Richmond, the rebel Capital; while Gen. Sheridan has carried devastation all along the communications of Lee westward; and Gen. Sherman has steadily advanced North from Savannah Ga., till he is now found in the heart of North Carolina. He has met with little opposition till he entered the latter State, and there, though stoutly opposed, he seems to carry all before him. Sherman, from the South, Schofield, from Newbern, N. C., and Terry, from Wilmington, have now formed a junction of all their forces, so that all attempts of the rebels to resist their approach to a junction with Gen. Grant, near and about Richmond, must, humanly speaking, be utterly unavailing.

Hence the rebellion now looks like the criminal, with the halter around his neck, led forth to execution: it may die with a bloody struggle; but no human power can now save it; and we do not think any divine power will interpose to save it from the fate that a righteous judgment is inflicting on its abettors. It certainly looks now as if peace may soon be restored to this torn and bleeding country. May its inhabitants learn righteousness by the things they have suffered, and not provoke the divine justice to another such a terrible manifestation of displeasure against our national sins.

The Time Question.

BY DR. ALEXANDER DECKER.

That the 1335 days are symbolical time, is clearly proved from the fact that the events that were to transpire within their limits, could not be fulfilled in 1335 literal days—a little over three and a half years. What are those events or some of them at least? First, a great tribulation upon the saints, beginning with the setting up of the abomination of desolation, and continuing to "the time of the end." "They shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, even to the time of the end."

If the 1335 days are literal, and yet in the future, then, indeed, there is a fearful tribulation awaiting the church of Christ. Second, during the time of the end, a great conflict, between the kings of the north and the south, takes place resulting in the overthrowing of "many countries" including "Egypt" &c.

Third, the standing up of Michael, time of trouble, resurrection, &c. That all these events could not be crowded into about three and a half years, must be evident, I think, to all; therefore the 1335 days are symbolic, and as such symbolize so many years.

But it is regarded as a mistake, to say the resurrection is the last in the category of wonders, mentioned in Dan. xii. It is said, the last is "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars forever and ever," and that this brings the saints into the inheritance.

This objection to the ending of the 1335 days at the resurrection, might be admitted as having some weight, if, as some suppose, the saints are to be raised mortal, and, therefore, will not shine until sometime subsequent—until they are brought into their inheritance. But if, on the contrary, they are raised, according to the scriptures, "immortal, incorruptible, in glory, in power, a spiritual body," then, the objection, at once, falls to the ground, as it were, since the time when the saints begin thus to shine is identical with the resurrection—they come up shining from the grave quite as bright, no doubt, as they will ever shine at any subsequent period.

Thus, it is clearly proved, I think, that the only event pointed out by the 1335 days, is the resurrection, and, therefore, the standing of Daniel in his "lot" at the end of the days, has reference to standing in his lot, destiny, or part, in the resurrection, and not in a lot of land a mile or two square or so in the kingdom, since, standing in his lot, must have reference to the wonders, for they are the only things brought to view, as in any way connected with the termination of the 1335 days.

But it is said that the 1335 days are not regarded literal time by the advocates of definite time, &c., and therefore they are not definite. To this I object, that, if the 1335 days are to be understood so many years, then most certainly, they are as definite as though they had been thus given; and their beginning is as definitely marked as any of the literal periods in the Bible; and to suppose that the Jews did not know when the forty years wandering in the wilderness, and the seventy years captivity ended, is to suppose that they were too big blockheads even to know their own age.

It is said, that Messiah's first advent was given in symbolic time of the most clearly understood character. This, I think, is a great mistake, if it had reference to his birth; for the 69 weeks extended to Messiah the Prince, not to Messiah the Babe, and the Scriptures nowhere recognizes any one as Prince, unless actually seated on a throne and exercising power as a king. Hence it was said of Christ, that he "was exalted a Prince and a Saviour," &c.; and this exaltation was upon the throne of his Father, exercising "all power and authority, both in heaven and earth."

That Christ, at least, understood the time as applicable to His time, is clearly proved from the fact that He so frequently referred to it in the manner He did. "My time is not yet come," &c. That the Jews did not understand the time, I readily admit, for the very good reason, that, as Isaiah testified of of them, in prophesying of Christ's times; "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way." David, also, in speaking of the Saviour's times, testified, "They are all gone aside; they are all together become filthy: there is none that doeth good, no, not one." And Jesus declared, that Jerusalem should be destroyed, "because thou knowest not the time of thy visitation:" they knew the event—that they were to be visited, and that, according to the position of some, was all that was necessary. But Jesus declared that they were destroyed, not because they did not know the event, but because they knew not the time.

This declaration of the Saviour, should be sufficient to satisfy the reader of the importance of a knowledge of the time. What saved Nineveh, but the preaching of definite time? How came Noah to build the ark and have it done in time for the flood? Ans. The time. How came he to go into the ark when he did? Ans. The "yet seven days." And the Saviour clearly shows, that the Jews would not have rejected Him, and thus brought destruction upon themselves and their city, if they had understood the prophetic numbers in Daniel ix. God would never connect time and events together, unless a knowledge of both were equally important. The Jews knew that the destruction of their city was prophesied of in Dan. ix., but that simple fact was not sufficient; it was necessary to know the time. They knew Messiah was to come, but they rejected him when he did come, because they knew not the time.

The world knows, to-day, that the judgment is coming sometime, but they do not turn to the Lord, but grow worse and worse. But let it be known that the Judgment is not only coming sometime or other, but, that it is within two years, and there would be a Nineveh prayer meeting, at once, inaugurated on a grand scale.

Therefore, when God connects time with events, he does so because it is necessary to accomplish his purposes; and, by consequence, no man has the right to preach the one, to the exclusion of the other; nor can he do so, without incurring the displeasure of Heaven. As well might Jonah have preached that Nineveh would be destroyed and left out the forty days.

The time when God designed the periods, in Daniel xii., to be preached in connection with the coming of Christ, is clearly shown to be in the "time of the end," when they were to be unsealed, and therefore understood, by the gradual increase of knowledge.

That they have not been perfectly understood heretofore, I admit; nor were they so to be, at once, or else there would have been no chance for an increase of knowledge. Thus much for the importance of understanding the time, in connection with the events, which God has given in his word.

It is said, that when the Saviour threatened to come on the Sardis church as a thief, and at an hour they should not know, He related to judgments with which he would visit them—and that the Sardis church has long since passed away, &c. To this I object, that the seven churches are evidently symbolic, and as such, symbolize seven states or divisions of the nominal church; and this view is quite general with modern expositors, especially Advent expositors. Therefore, the Sardis church, I regard as a symbol of the nominal church now in existence, which indeed, has a "name to live but art dead." That the second advent of Christ will come on the nominal church as a "thief," and at an hour "thou shalt not know," no one can reasonably doubt that see things in a right light.

If the language of the Saviour to the church of Sardis, "I will come," can be explained to mean judgments, then, indeed, we might challenge the world to prove that such an event as the second personal advent of Christ would ever take place; for the teachings of the Bible must be in harmony with its self. If visiting judgments upon the Sardis church, is what is meant by the affirmation—"I will come," then, indeed, Christ has come a great many times since the first advent, the first time being in the judgment upon Jerusalem, for Christ must come, according to this principal of exegesis, at every manifestation of judgment.

It is manifest, that Christ means by the declaration, I will come in the case of the Sardis church, he means in the case of the other churches, or else, who can tell what he does mean? Let us see how this principle will work. To the Thyatira church, it is said, "But that which ye have already, hold fast till I come." To the Philadelphia church, "Behold I come quickly, hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." That the Saviour, in both these instances, means by the declaration, "I come," his second personal appearance, is proved by chapter xxi. 12, 20: "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me," &c. "He that testifieth these things saith, surely I come quickly." From these texts, it is clearly proved that the Saviour, when He says "I come," means just what he says—I myself.

Indeed, the threatening against the church of Sardis, is virtually that against the "evil servant," in Matt. xxiv. and therefore, any principle of interpretation that denies the literal coming of Christ in the one case, applies with equal force in the other. But, as it is admitted that the second advent of Christ is affirmed in Matt. xxiv. 50, and as the reverse of the threatening of Christ against the "evil servant," must be true of the "good servant," therefore, the coming of Christ must be "in a day" and "hour" he is looking for it and aware of. Hence says Paul, in 1 Thess. "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." "Ye are all the children of the light, and the children of the day." In view of all these facts, how, then, are we to understand, Mark xiii. 33, 35, and their parallels, in Matt. xxiv. I have shown, in a former article, that Mark xiii. 32 had reference to present, and not to future time, and, by consequence, the same must be true of verses 33 and 35; for, if the Saviour did not mean to say that no man, angel, neither the Son, never should know the day or hour before hand, in verse 32 (which he did not for it is admitted that he, at least, will know the day and hour beforehand) He clearly did not mean all future time in 33 and 35.

For further proof of this fact, I refer to what the Saviour said to his disciples, on another occasion, when they desired to know when the kingdom would be restored to Israel, as recorded in Acts. i. 6–8. "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power. But you shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you." Shall receive power to what? The answer here is inevitable, that they, that is, the church, upon whom the Holy Ghost should come, should receive power to know the "times and the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power." This declaration of the Saviour, is not only evidence of the most positive character, to prove that the waiting church will finally know the time of Christ's second coming, but it is also explanatory, and shows, that when He said, "Take heed, watch and pray for ye know not when the time is," he did not say, or mean, that they never would know; for so sure as the church shall receive power to know the times and the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power, so sure they will know the time and season of Christ's coming beforehand: for this is one of the times and seasons, at least, which the "Father hath put in his own power." And further, this is the very thing that the disciples were anxious to know about; and, therefore, the very thing which Christ clearly declared they should know.

"Lest coming suddenly, He find you sleeping." A church in this condition, could not be expected to "see the day approaching." This verse, in Mark, serves to explain, Matt. xxiv. 44, and shows that the Saviour can only "come in such an hour as ye think not," to a church that is off her watch—asleep; for let it be observed, that Matthew and Mark are relating the same discourse; and it is only by comparing the two together, that we can get a clear understanding of the Saviour's teachings on the subject. Hence to give the true idea, of Matt. xxiv. 44, according to Mark, it should read thus, "Therefore be ye also ready," that is, "take heed, watch, lest" in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh, or, as Mark has it, "lest coming suddenly, I find you sleeping." To come on a church, sleeping, is evidently to come in "such an hour as ye think not," and vice versa. Hence, the object of the Saviour, in commanding the church to watch, was to prevent her going to sleep—to keep her awake, or, in other words, to keep her walking in the clear daylight of prophecy, by which, she would "see the day approaching," and thus seeing it, she would be ready for it, and in the language of the prophet exclaim, "Lo this is our God: we have waited for him," &c. This is not the language of a church taken unawares, or in an unexpected hour.

This makes it all plain and harmonious with the rest of the Saviour's teachings, and especially so in regard to the evil and good servants. From all these facts and considerations, we arrive at the following conclusion—That there are certain texts such as Mark xiii. 32, 35, and their parallels, in Matt. xxiv. that speak of the knowledge of the time of Christ's second advent, as it then existed at the time it was spoken; while others, several of which I have referred to, speak of the church at the time of the end.

It must be apparent to the reader, that there are two divisions of the church on this subject—the first, existing from the first advent of Christ to the "time of the end;" the second, between that point and the end itself. Therefore, any declaration of the Saviour that would be applicable to the first division of the church, in reference to knowing the time, would not be applicable to the second, or last division. Hence, the necessity of rightly locating the different texts on this subject.

When the Saviour said, of that day and hour, knoweth no man, or angel, neither the Son, he had no reference to future time. As the text in Acts i. 6–8, is so the point, I will here refer to it again. "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power," that is, it is not for you to know them now—the time has not yet come.

"No man knoweth the day nor the hour, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father only." These statements, it will be seen, are parallel. This knowledge belongs to the time of the end. Hence, while it is "not for you to know" now the times or seasons you shall know, after the Holy Ghost is come upon you, &c.

Although the Saviour addressed this language to the apostles, as he did nearly all the rest of his teachings, yet, it evedently applies to the church, and proves that she will finally at the proper time, know "the times and the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power."

This view makes all plain and harmonious, where, with another view, all is jargon and confusion. I think now, that I have clearly established the fact, that the 1335 years terminate, definitely, at the resurrection, and that they are or will be definitely understood; and thus the time of the second advent of Christ be known by the waiting church. "The wise shall understand." Amen.

More Words about Time.

That the 1335 days of Daniel xii. are symbolic, we are satisfied never has been proved and never can be by any course of argument that has yet been resorted to. They are given in a historic prophecy, and not in a symbolic one; that is sufficient for us to reject any interpretation which makes these days symbols of years. But with some people, "of making many" words" there is no end;" so we will not multiply them on that point.

As to the saints "coming up shining from the grave, quite as bright as they will ever shine," we have yet to see it proved. Their Master did not so shine with his resurrection; and his glory is yet to be made manifest on the earth. But we will not multiply words on this point.

That the birth of Christ brought "Messiah the Prince," is testified to by the angel who announced that event—"Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy.... for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ (Messiah) the Lord" (the Ruler, the Prince). Lk, ii. 10, 11. Thus we are saved "many words" here.

That Jesus knew the time of his first advent, and the time of his death, is true, but it is not true that his disciples, ever, knew the exact time of either of these events till they actually occurred. To prove they did, will take more proof than any "beloved physician" has ever yet presented: or, that Jerusalem perished for not knowing the time of these events, before they occurred, will take another Bible, of human invention, to prove. That the Jews perished for not knowing—i. e. not improving—the events, when these events were present or past, is true. They improved "not the time of their visitation:" that was their condemnation; and not the lack of the previous knowledge of the time when the visitation was to be made. We need no more words to settle this item.

If "the Jews knew their city was to be destroyed by the prophecy in Dan. ix.," neither they nor the disciples of Jesus knew the exact time. When the prophecy was renewed by Jesus himself, and the disciples inquired, "when shall these things be" Jesus did not give them the time; but He did give them events to precede it, and told them, "when ye see Jerusalem compassed about with armies, then know the desolation thereof is nigh." A modern Timeist would have said, "Lord, that simple fact is not sufficient; it is necessary to know the time." Such is the language of those who can't trust the Lord further than they can see.

That the world does not repent because they do not know that the judgment "is within two years," may be possible; but as "they have Moses and the Prophets;" and also Jesus Christ and his apostles, to teach them "that men ought now to repent," we may be assured, "if they hear not them, neither will they be persuaded though" we should have another "time movement." Even poor "Jonah" thought one such movement was quite enough; and if another time movement should have the effect to bring on a "Nineveh prayer meeting, on a grand scale," we wonder if Timeists would be in much better mood than Jonah was, when he saw the time did not bring the event. But enough of your deathbed and gallows repentances. Let all men, everywhere, repent now, or take the consequences. When God gives us time as definitely as he did Jonah, for anything, we will preach it as strong as the strongest. But we cannot take man's word for the time of the second advent, when He, who is to come, has said, "Ye know not when the time is."

As to the symbolic character of the seven churches of Revelation, we believe it to be a mere fancy and no way susceptible of proof. But if symbolic of seven periods of the church's history, the Sardis church state has passed away, or we are not very near the end; for there are two more "symbolic churches" to follow them, viz. the Philadelphian and the Laodicean. All the special pleading, therefore, upon the language to the Sardis church, shows that "much study" has been "a weariness to the flesh," and of "making many" words "there is no end."

To appeal to the words of Jesus, Acts i. 7, 8, in proof that the church should know the exact time of the second advent, and to state that the "inevitable" answer is, that the church should "receive power to know" that time is so amazing a perversion of His words that we wonder how any one can refer to it again, after his attention has been called to the facts. The Saviour had told his disciples "It is not for you to know the times," &c. Does any one sincerely believe, He intended to tell you then, "You shall not know to-day; but to-morrow, when the Holy Ghost has come upon you, you shall have power to know the time"? Such an argument proves too much for those who use it; for, according to it, the apostles and the church should have known the time from the day of Pentecost till the present time. But such has not been the fact, and the argument is worthless, besides being a perversion of our Lord's words. The purpose for which they were to receive power was not to know terms and seasons; but to "be witnesses unto" Jesus "both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermest parts of the earth." See the text. We showed in a previous number of the Herald, that the original terms in these verses, translated power, are not the same, nor of the same import. In the 7th verse it is exousia; which the Father hath put in his own exousia; and imports God's infinite authority over all times and seasons. In the 8th verse the word is dunamin; literally, denoting energy to accomplish a work, which, work, Jesus tells his disciples is to "be witnesses unto me," &c.; not energy to know times, &c. This text being taken from the hands of Timeists; all their special pleadings based on it fall to the ground.

We do not wonder that the definite time teachers have to tell us that our Lord's words "should read thus;" that is, they "should read" entirely different from what they do, or from what they can make them read without doing violence to plain language. "The wise shall understand." We have no doubt of that; but if those who spend their time and energies in trying to find out the exact time of the second advent are the wise, it will take "time" to reveal it: all their efforts hitherto have been abortive.

That we may understand when the time is near, if we watch events as they pass, we have no doubt. The chain of prophetic events show clearly where we stand in the history of this age; and we may rejoice in the possibility that our eyes may yet see our coming King, without first sleeping in death; yet the exact time of the event we are satisfied no man knoweth, nor can know by all the time he may bestow on the methods hitherto adopted to find it out.

Obituary.

Walter Pratt.

BR. STORRS:—I request to inform the brethren in Christ, who read the Herald of Life, of the death of our beloved Br. WALTER PRATT. This sad event occurred at his residence, in Boston, on Wednesday, March 22nd, as I am informed by brother Phineas White, Jr.

His disease was Pneumonia. His many friends are thrown into sadness, as well as his interesting family.

I saw him, and had a few moments conversation with him, in Boston, about the first of the month, and was very happy, not only to greet him once more, but hear him state that his health was in his opinion, materially improved. He appeared to be getting the better of his old difficulties. But, alas! a sudden stroke has taken him from his family—from his old fellow laborers, and from the cause of God.

I cannot, now enter upon a view of his useful life and labors—so suddenly cut short—but I may observe, that I knew him. He was a good man. A faithful laborer in the vineyard; until his health failed, devoting his entire energies to the noble purpose of awakening men to a preparation for Christ's coming, and immortality. Indeed, I am aware that his health became broken, and his system prostrated by many of his excessive labors in the East and in the West, where hundreds have learned to bless his name as a messenger of truth, in that vast new field. He never recovered from the effect of his labors upon himself in that field, in which he was a pioneer, with our views, voluntarily consecrating himself, and regarding the call of the Lord of the harvest as sufficient guaranty of success and final reward.

He was my friend. We labored, often, together, when we were young. I was in the West with him some. I knew of his experience in entering the ministry. He believed in a call by the Holy Ghost, and felt that he received it. He could not rest till he obeyed. I loved him.

Walter was an earnest, determined, uncompromising, advocate of the Advent doctrines. Zealous and consistent, he faltered not under a weight of care and responsibility. With difficulties and afflictions, and sometimes very limited means to contend with, he still bore manfully all the trials of the gospel until his health so far failed that he was compelled to forego the joyful service of preaching Christ to a perishing world. He is gone. I've lost him. He was a companion and brother, for more than twenty years. He rests from his labors, and his works follow. I hear many say—"How sad that he is gone," and "when shall we look upon his like again?"

Tears will fall, all through the circle of his acquaintance, that the good and faithful man has departed: but he is at rest.

May the Lord sustain and bless his dear family under this terrible trial.

I hope a proper obituary will soon be written, for this paper. Till then, let this brief and poor announcement, be taken as the tribute of bereaved brothers to whom he was endeared by long years of labor and friendship.

"The memory of the just is blessed."

W. S. CAMPBELL.

Philadelphia Pa., March 27th.

DIED in Norwalk, Conn., March 21, 1865, CHARLES IVES, son of Ransom and Julia Ives, of Chateaugay, N. Y., aged 26 years and 7 months. With hearts filled with sorrow, Br. Storrs, we inform you, and the rest of the Brn. and Sis., of the death of our dear Brother, who died here at our house last Tuesday. The first time since we kept house (which is over ten years) that the cruel enemy has entened our dwelling. But the second time it has laid its cruel claim on my father's family, and taken the loved of earth from our embrace. Thirteen years ago, we were called to give up, in childhood's morn, a little sister of 7 years. And now again have our hearts been made to feel and know what death is, among our number. This Br. of ours enlisted four years ago in the 16th Regt. N. Y. Vol., and was among the first that went forth to meet his country's call. He was in the first battle of Bull-Run; after which he endured many hardships, but kept his health until the last of the following September, when he was taken down with the typhioid fever, from which after a long and severe illness he partly recovered and was afflicted with dispepsia, from which he never recovered. He remained sick, and was carried from one hospital to another until June, when he got his discharge and was sent home to loved ones who had long wished for his return; thinking that they might do something for his recovery. But O, how vain is the help of man. All was done that could be done, but it was of no avail, he still lived to suffer (with the same complaint) until last spring, about a year ago, he was taken with a cough and has been confined to the house the most of the time since. After our removal here he ever wanted to come; thinking that it might possibly make a change with him for the better. With faint hopes, our parents came with him here, four weeks ago. But short has been his stay with us. Before he enlisted he was converted to God and stood as a witness for his cause; but for some reason grew cold and did not enjoy his mind; yet he was a constant reader of the glorious truths contained in the bible, and advocated in our paper, until last fall, when he made an entire surrender to his God; and since has been sustained by His promises. And until the last his faith was strong that he should hear and live. His last words were, that all was well; and that God was with him. Yes, Bo. Storrs, we feel to rejoice (in sorrow) over the words that Jesus comforted Mary and Martha with, when they told Him their brother was dead. He said, "Thy brother shall rise again: I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth on me, though he were dead yet shall he live." O, glorious thought; the tomb will not always hold from our view the loved ones that have passed away.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

New York & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wher ever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with nt egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE WANT OF HOME INFLUENCE.

The following communication was left in our office, some little time since, accompanied with a note saying:

"I ask you to do me a great favor. Will you be kind enough to let me have $2 for the enclosed. I am a stranger here; and owing to non-arrival of remittances from England I am without any money. . . . . . I have not been able to get my breakfast today. I am a member of the Rev. Mr. ——'s church, London, England," &c.

A short time after leaving the MS., he called again. He appeared to be a sincere Christian, and we gave him the two dollars he desired. We give our readers the article and think it may be very useful to some, and stir up a concern specially for those young men who come into our cities from the country.—Editor.

A few months ago, just before the writer shipped from England on a visit to this country, a circumstance came before his notice which gave rise to a few thoughts upon the subject of the duties of Christian professors in relation to social life.

The case was this. A young man about seventeen years of age, residing some eighty miles distant from the great metropolis of England, London, obtained an engagement as clerk in the office of a city merchant. He entered upon his new career with hope slightly tinged with sorrow at the necessary parting from his father's home. At that home he had enjoyed from earliest childhood, those hallowed meetings peculiar to the Christian's social hearth. All this would be broken up. The, to him, long vista of coming months would draw their slow length along whilst he drudged at his work and sighed for the happy moment of re-union with those he loved.

The young man arrived in London, carrying with him but one letter of introduction, and that to a gentleman whose own business engagements were too pressing to allow of his paying much attention to our young friend. Lodging, as it is called in England, is conducted upon a some what different principle to what boarding is, in this country. It is very often the case that but one boarder is admitted, and seldom more than two. If there is only one boarder, and he is a young man, he generally takes his luck with the family.

If there are two of them they probably have a sitting room to themselves where their meals are served to order.

In the instance referred to, the young man simply lodged without boarding, as he dined, &c., in the city. Thus when he hurried homeward at night he could hardly refrain from a feeling of lonesomeness. His chamber was but a small one, cold and ill-furnished. His landlord was only visible on rent day, and the dirty drab annoyed him by her Irishisms and sundry impertinences. He had no midnight oil wherewith to study by, and the flickering candle light offered poor inducement. How was he to employ himself? Where could he go during these lonely evenings? How his heart yearned for the social hearth, for the family circle, with its almost myriad charms, and its pleasing associations.

He dared not, for he had been religiously trained, think of visiting the theatre. He had heard too much of its seductive charms, yet he said to himself, "I must have something." He would attend a concert; there could be no harm in that. He went, he heard the beautiful music and he was enchanted. At night he dreamed sweet dreams, the fairy forms of the gaily dressed singers reappeared and he felt happy. He saw again the vast throng with its glaring light, excited people, and he said to himself, I must go again. I do not think there is any sin in this, for glorious thoughts find birth when listening to those creative geniuses whose efforts lead us involuntarily "from nature unto nature's God." All this may be true, and if the effect stopped here we should hardly feel disposed to demur to our friends sophistry. But, as in his own case, he was not satisfied; he wanted more, more, more; and we know full well that in even large cities good and innocent amusements are not of every day's occurrence.

Thus our friend was led to visit places somewhat questionable. Without denouncing a certain class of concerts, we can say at least that no man will be led to love God with all his heart by hearing the human voice divine. The effect produced is too transient, and we are led rather to worship the creature than the creator. Our feelings may be awakened, our sensibilities be touched, and a thrill of voluptuous pleasure will run through us and we exclaim, How sublime, how beautiful, What a sweet voice she has, or how grand are his deep toned notes; but we do not feel to have derived any spiritual benefit. It may lead a saint to appreciate, still more, God as revealed in his creatures, but it will not make a sinner cry aloud, What must I do to be saved? We may then ask, are such things absolutely healthy? Can any thing be wholesome which creates but does not satisfy? In the case before us, it did a very great amount of harm, inasmuch as it aroused in this young man's heart unhealthy excitement. The love of home was supplanted by a love of pleasure. He, who but a short time ago would say, "The dearest spot to me on earth is home, sweet home," has now no love for it. Home is synonymous with the "mumps."

It is not necessary to elaborate upon this case. That man is now living in London, busy in the pursuit of worldly enjoyment. He has no anxiety for the time to come when he can return to his once loved circle. The spell is broken and our readers can imagine the rest. A faithful father's prayers, a pleading mother's heartfelt outpouring's will not be made in vain. For He hath sworn it.

Now the object we have had in narrating this circumstance (only one of a thousand) was to arouse young men's Christian associations to the duties which devolve upon them. Let them extend their sphere of usefulness. Cannot something be done? Is it not worth trying? Our young men are drifting, drifting, drifting towards the road of destruction. Let the strong arm of true christianity, pure socialism intervene. It is worth the trial, and great shall be the reward of those who save the erring.

IMMORTALITY NOT INHERENT.

BY THOMAS READ.

1. That the scriptures, in all their parts, being written by the inspiration of the same Spirit, must consequently be perfectly harmonious throughout; then, when the literal interpretation of a passage of scripture agrees with the context, and is in harmony with the general tenor of scripture, such literal interpretation is to be preferred above all others.

2. That no metaphor, or allegory, is to be taken of itself, as absolute proof of any doctrine; but the clearly manifested design of the writer is of course admissible.

3. That the true interpretation of a word or phrase being substituted for such word or phrase, will make good sense.

In the following arguments, the marginal readings, and the best translations of the scriptures are freely used, but all words differing from the common text are enclosed in brackets: but a good argument is not spoiled by the use of any translation that will not stand the test of severe criticism. The reference to the various commentaries, lexicons, and marginal readings, are rendered necessary, because the translation of king James, who died a papist, has evidently been made under a strong Catholic bias on the very questions at issue.

BIBLE ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE INHERENT IMMORTALITY OF MAN.

God did not impart to Adam, at his creation, the immortality of his body, of his soul, nor of his spirit; and his posterity could not therefore derive immortality from Adam; nor do they receive it as a birthright from God when they come into the world. Therefore, mankind have not, and never had, any principle of perpetual life, different from that possessed by the inferior amimals, excepting what has been purchased by Jesus Christ, and bestowed subsequently to birth, unconditionally upon the young, and through faith in his sacrifice and mediation to others. 1 Cor. xv., "The first man is of the earth, earthy; [choikos, a man of dust,] the second man is the Lord from heaven." And there is no third nature, nothing that comes not from Adam, who was mortal and corruptible or from Christ. There is no part of man, material, spiritual, or immaterial, that is not mortal and corrupt; if the life-giving spirit of Christ be infused, we are made, not the actual possessors of, but "heirs" of immortality. That is, we have "an earnest, a pledge, a title to, the promise of, or a hope of" immortality, to be realized when Christ shall appear the second time to raise the dead to life, and to judge the world. No hint to the contrary can be found in the Bible. "The wages of sin is death," (the entire suspension of life and consciousness; the dissolution of the organs of thought and feeling;) but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord; commencing "when Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory;" and not before. To the question, does the Bible teach the inherent immortality of man? or any part of man? the answer is, No, "for God only hath immortality:" (1 Tim. vi. 16). 2 Chron. xiv. 11. "Let not mortal man prevail against Thee." Job. iv. 17. "Shall mortal man more just than God?"

Now try these by the 3d canon of interpretation, we have given; putting down the the meaning that some would affix to the term "mortal man." Let not mortal bodies prevail against Thee. Shall mortal bodies be more just than God. These are not sense according to the prevailing opinion and therefore not correct. Rom. i. 23. "They changed the glory of the [immortal] God into an image made like to [mortal] man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things:"—Campbell's Translation. Here four-footed beasts and man are classed together as mortal, and stand in constrast on this very point with God, who is incorruptible or immortal, and "who only hath immortality."

Inspiration says that man is mortal; but some say no, his body only is mortal, while his soul, or spirit, or both, constituting the essential part of his nature, is immortal. A plain contradiction of the scriptures.

1 Peter i. 23. "Being [begotten] again, not of corruptible seed" (as at the first begetting) "but of incorruptible (seed) by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. For all flesh is as grass" and "withereth, but the word of the Lord endureth forever."

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of [lives;] and man became a living soul: Gen. ii. 7. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return: Gen. iii. 19.

The first man is of the earth, [a man of dust]. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish: Ps. cxlvi. 4. The man, the whole man is here represented as being formed of dust and returning to dust. We can conceive of the man formed perfect, excepting life, breath, and if he had been thus left, the laws of chemistry would soon have dissolved him into his original elements. But God communicated life to him by causing the vital air to be breathed into his nostrils thereby setting the lungs in play, imparting heat and circulation to the blood, and thus man became a living soul.

For as the body without the [breath] is dead, so faith without works is dead also: Jas. ii. 26. Job xxxiii. 4. The spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given life. Thus then is seen the nature of the breath that God breathed into man; it gave him life.

It is reasserted that "God breathed into man the breath of life;" yea, and so he did into the beasts, and creeping things before he breathed it into man. And so far from this breath of life being an argument for immortality, inspiration uses it as an argument of the frailty of human life. Thus:

Cease ye from man whose breath is in his nostrils: for wherein is he to be accounted of? Isa. ii. 22. Job. xxxiv. 14. If [God] set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath; all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust. Thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust: Psa. civ. 29. Psa. cxlvi. 4. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish. Thus we see man's life is dependent upon his breath, and because his breath is in his nostrils, though breathed by God, he is frail, is mortal.

It is still insisted that God having breathed into man the breath of lives, that man has a pre-eminence in point of perpetuity of existence over the beasts of the earth?

Ecc. iii. 19. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that man hath no pre-eminence above a beast.... all go to one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth if the spirit of man goeth upward, or if the spirit of the beast goeth downward to the earth?—Septuagint Translation.

Gen. vii. 13. "In the self same day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons with them into the ark. They and every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, and of every sort. And they went in unto Noah, into the ark, two and two, of all flesh, as God had commanded him. Gen. vii. 21. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man: all in whose nostrils was the breath of [lives,] of all that was in the dry land, died. And every living substance was destroyed which was upon the face of the ground; both of man and cattle and the creeping things, and the fowl of heaven; and they were destroyed from the earth; and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark."

The candid reader must see at a glance that both man and the brute creation, are alike comprehended under the one phrase, all flesh, and every living substance; and that of all alike and indiscriminately it is said—"in whose nostrils was the breath of lives," and of all alike, "wherein was the breath of lives," that they died, that they were destroyed. As the beasts died, soul, body, and spirit; so man died, soul, body, and spirit. So then the term "breath of lives" being the possession of man in common with the cattle, and creeping things, proves man mortal and not immortal.

But some will still persist that "man became a living soul." Truly; but the term "living soul" so far from implying immortality, is applied to creeping things before it is applied to man.

Gen. i. 20. And God said let the waters bring forth abundantly the [creeping] creature that hath [a living soul,] and the fowl, &c. Gen. i. 24. And God said, Let the earth bring forth the [living soul] after his kind, cattle and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind. Gen. ii. 7. And man became a living soul. Gen. ix. 9, 10. God establishes his covenant with Noah "and with every living soul that" was with him, of the fowl, and the cattle, and of every beast of the earth with him. Rev. xvi. 3. And every living soul died in the sea.

Thus the phrase living soul, so far from being applied peculiarly to man, is applied to all animals at their creation as a phrase denoting an animal nature, and perhaps living soul is synonymous with animal life: and Paul places the term living soul in the strongest contrast with a nature that is properly immortal: between the first and second Adam.

1 Cor. xv. 44. There is an "[animal] body," or a soul body, and there is a spiritual body, or a spirit body. And so it is written, (Gen. ii. 7.) The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a [life giving] spirit.... The first man is of the earth, [a man of dust,] the second man is the Lord from Heaven.

Thus it will be perceived that instead of applying the term "living soul" to the mind of man, the apostle refers it to his whole nature, but with a special reference to the body; while he points out the fact, that the first Adam was only a "living soul," and therefore liable to dissolution; but that the second Adam is a life giving spirit, having life in himself, as God, who will bring the dead to life again. "I am the resurrection and the life."

This term "living soul," then, does not teach that man, or the soul of man, is immortal; but it does most clearly teach, when rightly explained, that the soul of man is mortal.

Richard Watson believed only in the contingent immortality of man, and he being a judicious writer is good authority. He says in his sermon, "Paradise shut and re-opened," that immortality was promised conditionally, and that "sin excluded man from the tree of life, as he lost his title to immortality." And in his Institutes, Vol. 2, page 167 and 168, (early edition) he says that the doctrine of the "natural immortality of the soul" is an "absurdity." And on page 250, he writes that the notion, "that the soul is naturally, immortal is contradicted by scripture, which makes our immortality a gift, dependent on the will of the giver."

In his sermon on the Tree of Life, he says, "that the tree of life is spoken of in connection with the life of the soul—not only with immortality, on earth, but with immortality in heaven." John Wesley and Adam Clarke believed, contrary to Watson, and contrary to the Bible, that the soul was naturally immortal; and as the Bible affirmed that the brute creation had the same kind of living soul, then, if the possession of the living soul confers perpetuity of existence, they very consistently believed in the future existence of the brute creation, and argued accordingly. And no man can consistently maintain the one without maintaining the other. The two doctrines must stand or fall together.

We blame not Wesley for this; he had enough of unpopular doctrines to examine and defend, and nobly did he do it. Neither can it be thought, such was his modesty, that he would deem himself very highly honored by being canonized as Pope Wesley, the infallible!

But if Methodists will believe with Wesley and Clarke in the inherent immortality of the soul of man they may not separate that doctrine from its partner, the doctrine af the inherent immortality of the souls of brutes, and they must then disagree with the judicious Watson, and with the plainest declarations of the Bible. Reader, do you believe in the future existence of the brutes? If you say, Nay, then be entreated to discard that exploded dogma of inherent immortality, and go to Christ for life, and by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, and honor and immortality, and Christ will "give" you "eternal life, and raise you up at the last day."

THE TEMPLE IN THE TIME OF CHRIST.

In reading about the temple, many think of it as like a vast cathedral, under whose roof thousands might assemble for prayer and sacrifice. This impression is very erroneous. The sacred edifice contained two main apartments: the innermost, called "the Holy of Holies," 20 cubits, or 30 feet in length, breadth, and height; and "the Holy Place," in front of this, having the same breadth and height, but being 40 cubits or 60 feet in length. The "Holy of Holies" was entered by no one but the high priest, and by him on one day in the year. The "Holy Place" was entered only by the officiating priests; and probably the Saviour while on earth was never within its walls.

Immediately around the sacred building, on a lower level, was an open area called "the court of the priests," on the eastern side of which was "the court of the women;" and all these were surrounded by a still larger and lower area, called "the court of the Gentiles," which was an eighth of a mile square, and inclosed by a lofty wall. The name of "the Temple" was given to all the courts or inclosures, as well as to the central edifice; and in these courts occurred a large part of the temple scenes described in the Bible. Having thus given a general idea of the temple, we may review its several parts in detail.

The best external view of the temple and its inclosuers was from the Mount of Olives, east of Jerusalem. From it one could overlook the beautiful courts and golden glory of the temple, could hear the trumpets of the Levites, and see the multitudes entering into its courts with thanksgiving, and into his gates with praise. From this mountain our Lord beheld the city, and wept over it. (Lk. xix. 37–34.) Descending this mount, and crossing the Kedron Valley, you climb Mount Moriah to the wall on its summit, some of the stones of which were 35 feet long.

1. Entering at the east, or Shushan Gate, you stand in a grand uncovered area, "the court of the Gentiles," paved with elegant stone mosaic. All around this court, next to the outer wall, were three rows of massive marble columns; upon which and upon the wall were magnificent galleries, on whose outer verge, a ta point hanging over the deep Kedron Valley, perhaps at the southest corner, it is supposed, the Saviour was placed by the tempter. (Matt. iv. 5, 6.) The part of the colonade, or covered walk, on the east side of the Gentiles, was called "Solomon's Porch;" here the Jews threatened to stone Christ, (John x. 23, 40,) and here the apostles afterward preached Christ crucified. (Acts iii. 11; v. 12, 20.) In the open area of this great court the Jews erected some of their booths at the Feast of Tabernacles; and here, on the last day, "that great day of the feast," they heard him offer them the waters of life. Here, too, the changers of money and the sellers of doves, for the temple dues and offerings, had established themselves. (John ii. 14, 16.) This court had four gates on the west side, and one on the north and south.

2. In the center of this outer court was "the court of Israel;" the eastern portion of which was called "the court of the Women," because they were not allowed to enter beyond it. This "court of Israel," including that of the women, was higher than that of the Gentiles, from which it was separated by a "middle wall of partition," beyond which no Gentile might enter, under penalty of death. This illustrates a scene in the life of Paul, (Acts xxi. 26, 30; also Eph. ii. 13, 14.) It had three gates on the north side, and three on the south; but the main entrance was on the east side, where, by a flight of fifteen broad steps, and through "the Beautiful Gate," you entered the "court of the Women." This gate was made of costly Corinthian brass. Near it the lame man was laid, to ask alms. (Acts iii. 2, 11.) Around the walls were treasuries, into one of which the widow cast her memorable two mites, (Mark xii. 41, 44.) Here the people assembled for devotion, and here they heard the voice of Christ. Another flight of steps led up from the court of the Women to the court of Israel, where, when the lamb of the dayly morning and evening sacrifice was offered, or when they had offerings of their own to present, the men of Israel assembled, clustering around the innermost court—that of the preists—from which an elgant parapet divided them, without intercepting their view, and which they could not enter, unless to lay their hands on their own private offering, to wave a part of it before the Lord, or some similar service. In this court of Israel it was that "the whole multitude of people were praying without, while Zacharias went up into the Holy Place to offer incense; and as he was detained within by the Angel Gabriel, they marveled at his long delay. (Luke i. 10, 21, 22) To the inner railing of this court the infant Jesus was brought; with two turtle doves for an offering; and here Simeon blessed him. (Lk. ii. 22.)

3. In the inner and sacred "court of the Priests," immediately in front of the temple proper, stood the great altar of the burnt-offerings, the brazen laver, etc. Here the various ablutions, offerings, and sacrifices were made. Here, too, the Levites were stationed, to praise God with instruments of music and responsive chants.

4. Toward the west side of the court of the priests, and on a higher level, stood the temple itself, fronting the east. Its main rooms were "the Holy Place," and "the Holy of Holies." But on the sides and rear of these, though wholly disconnected with them, were various apartments and store-rooms in three stories; so that the whole building, in Christ's time, was 90 feet wide and high, and 180 feet long. The "porch" or tower in front was 180 feet wide, and 180 feet high, with a magnificent gateway nearly 100 feet in height, on each side of which were two lofty pillars, covered with golden vines, whose clusters were formed of costly gems. The whole building was built of which marble without, and cedar within; and large portions both within and without were plated with polished gold. In the light of the sun it must have shone with exceeding splendor.

The "Holy of Holies" was the place for the ark of the covenant, where of old the glory of God dwelt "between the cherubim." Psa. lxxx. 1. It was separated from "the Holy Place" by "the vail of the temple" which was rent at Christ's death. Matt. xxvii. 51; Heb. x. 19–22. "The Holy Place" contained the altar of incense, the table of shew-bred, the golden candlestick, and the Jubilee trumpets; and on the capture of the city, these sacred relics were conveyed by Titus to Rome, where a representation of them may still be seen on his triumphal arch.

Nothing could exceed the veneration and love cherished by pious Jews for THE HOUSE GOD. When absent, their hearts fainted for the courts of the Lord; and they envied even the sparrows that built their nests on the sacred pile. Other Jews also regarded it with a superstitious and almost idolatrous pride. To insult it was the highest of crimes; and no charge was so well fitted to excite the popular fury against Christ, as the false charge of blaspheming the holy place. Even amid the agonies of the cross, he was mocked by their bitter taunts: "Thou that destroyest the Temple, and buildest it again in three days, save thyself, and come down from the cross." Yet the house of God, with all its "goodly stones and gifts," was destroyed according to his prediction. Luke xxi. 5.

None of us will ever see what the Jewish Rabbins called the finest building ever seen on the earth; but through the grace of Christ, we "sinners of the Gentiles" may be admitted to the new Jerusalem, of which "the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple," and there even we may join with Abraham, Isaac, and David in songs that shall never end.

The sublime externalities of Jewish worship were necessary to the training of an early and Oriental people. Symbolism is the great characteristic of Eastern thought, especially religious thought. It was thus that God educated the first people; but Christianity, being once introduced by such a preliminary course, has superseded the type by the antitype, the letter by the spirit. Spiritual glory is what it proposes rather than architectural or ceremonial pomp. It needs its temples, but convenience rather than grandeur should characterize them. Good taste in their architectural adaptation should be studied, but their splendor should never be such as might divert the mind from the higher spiritual tastes which seek nurture within their walls.

THE LITTLE SIN.

"Mamma," said Lucy Grant, one evening, to her mother, "will you tell me what is a little sin?"

"My child, no sin could be little, though some may be greater than others. But what makes you ask that question?

"Mamma, I was playing after school to-day with Jane and Ellen, and Robert Hamilton. The master walked across the yard, and pulled out his pocket-handkerchief, and a pencil came out and rolled away, but he did not observe it. When he was gone, Robert ran after it, saying, 'Oh, what a capital pencil! just the very thing I was in want of!' I said, 'Robert, it is the master's not yours; you must not keep it; that would be a great sin.' 'Oh,' he replied, 'the master can get plenty more, and it is only a penny pencil; it will be but a little sin' Mamma, was Robert right?"

"Lucy, what reason have we to hope that God will pardon any of our sins?"

"Because Jesus died."

"Is there any sin too great to be forgiven for Jesus' sake?"

"No mamma."

"But may we not ask God to pardon our small sins in some other way?"

Lucy thought for a minute; but she answered, "No, I do not think there is any other."

"Certainly not. Well my love, can we think any sin a little thing, if Christ must have died that it might be forgiven?"

"But now I shall tell you a story. Some years ago, before you were born, papa and I lived in an old house quite near the sea. There was a low wall at the foot of the garden, where we used often to sit, and admire the pure waves coming in below, and the pretty vessels sailing past. One lovely summer evening we were sitting there; all was calm,—the clear water reflected the red sunset, clouds of the sky, and the white sails of the ships. Just then we saw a man and a boy preparing to set out in a fishing-boat, from a little pier at a short distance from our garden. The air was still, we could hear them speak. The boy looked down in the boat, and said, 'Father the water is coming in.' 'Oh,' said the man, 'there is a small leak; but never mind, it will do us no harm; it would not be good in a storm, but' (looking at the sky) 'there is no fear to-night; so come along.' So they hoisted the sail, and we heard them singing merrily as they moved slowly out to sea.

"The sun had quite set, and the darkness was coming on, before we went into the house. In a short time we felt that there was a change in the weather. The wind began to rise, and whistled through the passages, making the doors and windows shake, and soon we heard the noise of the waves dashing up against the garden wall. We were quite safe and comfortable, but our thoughts turned auxiously to the many ships and boats we had seen so lately on the quiet waters. Then we thought we heard cries from the sea, and between the large waves, the sound of a bell, as if some one were in great distress. We could not rest at home and we went down to the shore. The people of the village were all running about, the women sobbing and screaming, the men calling for the life-boat. We could see, in the darkness, a feeble light glimmering out at sea, and again the bell rang violently. Then the light disappeared and we did not hear the bell again; but cries for help seemed to come on the wind. By this time the life boat was ready, and four strong men jumped into it, and made for the place where the light had last been seen. Oh, how eagerly we looked, and listened, and watched for their return! God was very merciful, and they were not too late. They found the man and boy we had watched in the evening still clinging to a raft; but their boat had gone down. And what had sunk the boat? Just the small leak. Do you think it appeared small to them then, that dreary night, when the winds and waves were rising round them, and the water getting deeper at their feet?

"Learn my dear child, never to call any sin a little thing. Remember how great it will look on a sick or dying bed. Remember how the apostle says, 'Abstain from all appearance of evil;' and pray for the new heart and tender concience which will shrink from the first beginnings of temptation.

"'Ah! give me, Lord, the tender heart,
That trembles at th' approach of sin!
A godly fear of sin impart;
Implant and root it deep within,
That I may dread thy gracious power,
And never dare to offend thee more."

OUR SPIRITS ARE NOT IMMORTAL.

BR THOMAS READ.

Some may affirm that there is a spirit in man distinct f.om the soul or animal life, and that this spirit is naturally immortal.

Too little is known of the nature of spirit to determine accurately its nature. The word translated spirit is used with considerable latitude in the Bible. Its primary meaning is wind, or breath. And it sometimes means wind, air, breath, spirit, life, soul, vigor courage, the understanding, mind, judgment and affections. But as it is represented as being breathed into, inspired, poured out, and is often connected with the intellectual faculties; and as the original word both in Hebrew and Greek means the wind, or breath, it may be a principle that stimulates into activity our intellectual powers. In one place, speaking of all animals, the term used is, "spirit of the breath of lives." As the Creator is "the God of the spirits of all flesh," and as the spirit of the beast goeth downward, whatever be its nature, it is certain that it is not conscious when separated from the body, as consciousness, like sight, is a function of the fleshly mind. So then, the spirit, or mind, is a part of our animal nature, and when uninfluenced by a spirit extrinsic and divine, is altogether fleshly, corrupt, and material; and consequently cannot be immortal.

Rom. viii. 7. "The carnal mind is enmity against God." Gal. v. 19. "The works of the flesh are....Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like." All these are works of the mind or spirit; and all such are declared to be carnal, and therefore material, and mortal. Job xxxiv. 14. "And when God gathers unto himself his spirit and his breath ....man shall turn again unto dust."

Ps. cxlvi. 4. "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." As the Spirit of God operates upon our minds, and upon our hearts, that is upon our intellectual faculties, and upon our affections or passions, may not our own spirits operate on the same organs? We read of the will of the flesh, and the works of the flesh; which works are the abuse of our mental faculties, and of our affections.

And as to be spiritually minded, is to be influenced by a Spirit not naturally belonging to us; that is, by the Spirit of Christ; and as "that which is born of the flesh, is flesh," and not spirit, so to have a title to immortality we "must be born again," or "of the Spirit." So the "to be carnally minded, (to act from our own natural impulses,) is death, but to be spiritually minded," that is, to have the mind of Christ communicated, "is life. If you walk after the flesh, you shall die, but if you walk after the Spirit, you shall live." Therefore, our animal, or carnal, or fleshly mind, is mortal; and the spiritual mind is the germ of immortality, derived from another and external source; that is, Christ Jesus; and though we die, we shall be raised from the dead by his Spirit that dwelleth in us. So far is the soul or spirit from conferring immortality on man, they being necessarily added to his perfect organization, to constitute man a living being, assist to make man compound, hence liable to a separation, and therefore they are the very things that render him divisible and mortal. Whereas if God endowed matter with the capacity of thought, and the capacity of sight, and the capacity of feeling, without organization, as he has endowed it with the capacity of gravitation, of electricity, and of chemical affinity; then that matter would have been naturally immortal, or at least till God reversed the laws of matter, which it is probable will never be done. But because, to the perfect organization, the intervention of the breath to impart heat and circulation to the blood, is necessary to the production of thought, of sight, and of feeling; and as these are liable to be separated, the organization to become deranged, the circulation of the blood to be impeded, and the breath to depart, on that very account the man is naturally mortal.

Suppose the reader cannot comprehend how matter, however fearfully and wonderfully organized, assisted by such a simple thing as spirit, or breath, can perform the functions of thought and feeling—is that a reason to deny a clearly demonstrated fact, sustained by the word of the God of truth? Surely it is much easier to comprehend how organized matter can think and feel, than it is that an immaterial nothing can think and feel. But why this inveterate prejudice against matter? Is it not finding fault with God who has chosen matter for this very purpose? For Moses attests that God did "form man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul."

And Paul affirms that man continued to be dust after his breath, a material thing, was added; for he wrote, "The first man, Adam, is of the earth," a man of dust; and God declared, at his expulsion from the garden, that "dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." In asserting therefore that thought and feeling (and it would be quite as logical to add sight and hearing, these being functions of the same mind) cannot be properties of matter, even when highly organized, you arraign the wisdom, power and truth of God. And in this you do err, my beloved brethren, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For if dust be not the origin of the essential nature of man, Moses has given us no account of his creation at all. And if the soul, or spirit, divested of the body, could think, feel, see, hear and act, then the organs of thought, feeling, seeing, hearing and action, are superfluous; and those divested of reason, sight and hearing, cease to be objects of sympathy, for their "immortal souls" can see, feel, reason and hear, without the appropriate organs!

Paul thought otherwise when he said, 1 Cor. xii. 21, "and the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. For the body is not one member, but many, yet one body."

WHAT WE NEED.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

We do not need more doctrine; at least we do not need more doctrine for practical purposes. But we do, as a people, need more religion. I mean by religion what is generally meant by the word religion. I mean vitality. I mean practical piety, old fashioned godliness; spirituality—such as we used to see in our advent congregations in years gone by—such as was enjoyed by the Wesleys, Fletchers, Carvasso, and a host of others who lived in those far off days when christians were more humble. We, as a people, are greatly inclined to make religion wholly intellectual. This tendency is perfectly natural. We are living in that time expressly marked in the prophetic word, when knowledge shall increase. We have therefore been constantly learning. And we have learned fast. We have through the mercy of God been enlightened concerning great principles of truth that have for ages been covered up, and darkened by the fog of mysticism, and the fooleries of traditionary metaphysics. Our investigations, as respects ourselves, at least, have turned the theological world upside down. Our work has been pioneer—missionary work. We have consequently been often like Paul compelled to dispute our way, step by step, through organized opposition, and determined prejudice. We have well earned all our victories; for they have been the result of hard fought battles. No wonder that we love the glorious principles of truth that identify us as a separate people; separate so far as our religious identity is concerned from other religious communities. No wonder that we idolize those great facts of truth that have blessed us so much. This is all natural; all legitimate. The tendency is to think so much of these giant achievements in intellectual truth, as to lose sight of the all important consideration, that no truth is saving in its effect, unless that truth is so received as to have a practical effect upon us. Truth just as much needs a vitalizing principle, or power, in order to make it effectual in working salvation for him who holds it, as the blood must have the vitalizing principle received from the atmosphere in order that it may impart and perpetuate life and vigor in the physical being. Truth in order to accomplish for us the great work designed by the God of truth in giving us a revelation of truth, must abide in us as a positive principle of faith. Real faith is something more than a mere intellectual idea.

It is true indeed that there can be no faith where there is no intellectuality. For faith is simply believing God. No man can believe God unless by an intelligent investigation he has learned what God has said. But judging by a rule given by the Son of God himself, we should be led to conclude that very many go no farther in the matter of truth, than simply to satisfy themselves that certain parts, or portions of the truth are doctrinally correct. The consequence is, though intellectually they are far in the advance of many of their fellows, still their belief of the truth amounts to nothing more than mere religious dogmatism, and produces no practical effect whatever on their lives. The effect is not only sad as respects these individuals themselves, but it also fills the mouths of unbelievers with scoffing words against the glorious truth of God. But the truth is not to be blamed under such circumstances. No. The truth of God is always saving in its effect on all hearts that deal justly with it. Faith, genuine, bible faith, will always, with him who really possess it, produce corresponding action. Everything which a man really believes, in the bible sense of believing, will as a moral necessity, act just as though it was a matter of knowledge. There is no need to multiply words to prove this proposition; our every day experience verifies its truthfulness. Therefore is the doctrine of faith and works just as intimately related, the one to the other, as the fruit to the tree. Such a faith as this is not a mere intellectual conception, but rather a vital principle of power. The grand reason why men of real faith are always earnest, zealous, uncompromising men, is that they have the principle of earnestness and zeal inherent in their moral nature. The reason why that on the day of Pentecost, and during several years following that day, the gospel church made all worldly matters of at least a secondary object, and were absorbed wholly in things pertaining to the kingdom of God, almost to the exclusion of all things else, was the simple fact that when they received the gospel, it was received through the power of the Spirit of God.

There lies the difficulty with us as people. We lack the pentecost power. Men may say what they choose, but twenty years experience, and the word of eternal truth has settled the question forever with me, that any thing short of pentecost religion is worthless indeed. Others may dote on dwelling on mere theological abstractions, and metaphysical probabilities if they choose; but, in the name of the Lord and the bible, I must "go up higher." How does my heart groan over the great lack of spiritual life in the entire advent body. No one clique can in this matter say to another faction, stand thou by, for I am holier than thou. This want of a holy, sanctified state of mind is seen throughout all the ranks of those professing faith in the speedy coming of our Lord, and its kindred doctrines.

As a people we have become proud, worldly minded, and vain. And unless we get up out of this place, God will curse us as he did Israel of old. We are doing but very little in saving souls from death. And it is often the case that those that are desirous of leaving the shoal waters of a formal profession for the real work, and deep things of God, have their efforts paralized by the majority, who have no heart for any thing outside of their selfish religious designs. There is but very little among us of that earnest, wrestling, prevailing prayer, that makes us Israelits indeed. Instead of this, our prayer meetings often are more like debating clubs than meetings for prayer and praise. I do not write to complain of my brethen; but the state of things existing among us as a people, brings sadness to many hearts. Brethren, as we value eternal life, let us arise, and shake ourselves from this apathy of spiritual death, and make one mighty effort, and free ourselves from this Laodicean state; and by making a covenant with God by sacrifice, secure his favor, receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, then shall we be prepared to labor for the salvation of our fellow men. Then will all be constrained as they see our consistent christian walk, to acknowledge our religious honesty; and our influence will tell for good, and for the glory of God.

THE USES OF SORROW.

BY REV. G. B. WILLCOX.

Every creature of God ought to be happy. God shapes body and soul for happiness. Every bone, and muscle, and ligament, and and vein; every original faculty, and instinct, and feeling, is as clearly meant to work happiness as the machinery of a mill is geared to turn out flour. Wretchedness is an abnormal growth, a parasite, a fungus. There is no contrivance in man's original make for producing it.

But if sorrow is opposed to our natural state, how can any good come of sorrow! Because we are not in our natural state. We have taken on, since Adam's fall, a second nature. Purity, goodness, is the rare exception with us; as a patch of verdure, a bit of nature, in a great city, is an excepton—only because the city itself is simply so many acres of artificiality. So it comes about that we need the very thing that, in a different case, might harm us. Arsenic is, to a healthy constitution, an unmixed evil. The bodily organs drive it out with great commotion as a nuisance. Yet a man sick with any one of certian diseases must have it. He might die without it. The physician who keeps it from him is either an enemy or a quack. And so is it with affliction. Men are all sin-sick; and what might to an angel be only a curse, is, as the Good Physician knows, to them a priceless remedy.

But that only transiently. For sorrow, like the salt which the prophet cast into the spring, in the very act of cleansing melts itself away. "Every good institution digs its own grave;" aims to accomplish so much good as to leave no place for itself to work, and so be laid aside. God's rod is always wearing out; and no Christian, smarting under it, will be half as glad as he when the last fiber of the unwelcome thing is gone!

He promises sorrow to his people as a proof of affection. Whom he loveth he chasteneth. But there is no such promise to the worlding. And when he has rebelled till his heart is incurably hardened, there is something awful in God's abandonment of him to unchecked and unmeasured prosperity. Every dollar he earns draws around him some new snare of death; but God suffers his dollars to accumulate. Every fortunate speculation dazzles and blinds him more effectually; but God prospers his speculations. Every new house or lot secured makes him only more "of the earth earthy;" but God adds to his lots and houses. So the bewildering work goes on, the stupid world wondering with besotted envy, and the vain-glorious fool chuckling over his bonds, and mortgages, and deeds, and bank-certificates, till a splendidly tapestried death-bed and a magnificent funeral garnish his path to perdition.

But God shades the eyes of his people from this glitter of prosperity. He deals with a Christian disciple, we have sometimes thought, as they did with the Koh-i-noor diamond in the London Exhibition. They had it so adjusted that, at any approach of danger, by touching a spring they could bury it in a subterranean safe. When spiritual perils beset some child of God, a jewel costlier far and dearer, he drops him into a valley of humiliation, under the shadow of his wings, till these calamities be overpast.

Now no Christian will ever cheerfully submit, to this discipline of sorrow till his eyes are opened to the value of spiritual good. If you are blind enough to be able to see only earthly treasures, you will find little relief when earthly treasure fails you. But a believer, will, by faith perceive his lost good re-appearing in another and better shape. A glacier in the Alps gleams in the light with its glistening pinnacles, a perfect miracle of beauty. And when the sun begins reducing it to ruins, toppling down this tower, lopping off that buttress, melting the whole into a shapeless mass, till finally it sinks and falls away, how sad a sight, what a magnificent structure demolished! But see the stream trickling out from under it. See it go bounding and laughing down the mountain-side to that far-off meadow. The sun was only turning the splendid, glittering, worthless ice palace into the liquid wealth, that was to spread the fields with emerald and load them with vegetable gold. So God takes down the splendid fortune of many a Christian, and gives him for it the fertility of soul that brings forth some thirty, some sixty, some a hundred fold.

What love could be truer or wiser than this? Severe it may be; but what believer who knows himself would have God do less? A superficial fondness is not what we need, but a profound and thorough love—a Father who shall love not our comfort or pleasure chiefly, but our being in all its deep and vast capacities. How an old harper doats on his harp! How he fondles and caresses it, as a child resting on his bosom! His life is bound up in it. But see him tuning it. He grasps it firmly, strikes a chord with a sharp, quick blow; and while it quivers as if with pain he leans over intently to catch the first note that rises. The note, as he feared, is false and harsh. He strains the chord with the torturing thumb screw, and though it seems ready to snap with the tension, he strikes it again, bending down to listen softly as before, till at length you see a smile on his face as the first true tone trembles upward. So it is, sorrowing Christian, that God is dealing with you. Loving you better than any harper loves his harp, he finds you a mass of jarring discords. He wrings your heart-strings with some torturing anguish; he bends over you tenderly, striking and listening; and, hearing only a harsh murmur, strikes you again, while his heart bleeds for you, anxiously waiting for that strain—"Not my will, but thine be done"—which is melody sweet to his ear as angel's songs. Nor will he cease to strike until your not till your chastened soul shall blend with all the pure and infinite harmonies of his own being.

"heart in tune be found,
Like David's harp of solemn sound"—

There are fathomless depths of love in the great heart of God, which nothing else than some burden of bitter woe will ever sink us low enough to explore. It is a love into which we may look for ever, never to comprehend it all. It reaches around and above us, like the bending arch of heaven. This it is that smites you, fellow Christian; but the blow, like the blows with which kings used to confer knighthood, only promotes you. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." O rarest, heavenliest rest, which only God's bosom has to afford!—Independent.

JESUS THE LIFE.

In reading the New Testament every one must notice how frequently the words life, live, live for ever, eternal life, everlasting life, occur. So common are they that one can hardly open a page at random without meeting them. Jesus himself said more than once, "I am the life;" and eternal life is invariably connected with a cordial reception of him as the Saviour, and a full submission to his will. Language which is found so often on the lips of Jesus, and in the pages of his apostolic servants, must be important, we would say unutterably momentous. Without a clear notion of its import, much of the Book will remain in comparative obscurity, and a great personal loss be sustained by every reader and disciple of Christianity. Let us try to get at the meaning of these words. As a safe guide let us follow the direction of Hooker, in our interpretations on this and all occasions:—"Hold it," he says, "for a most infallible rule, in exposition of sacred Scripture, that where a literal construction will stand, the furthest from the letter is commonly the worst. There is nothing more dangerous than this licentious and deluding art which changes the meaning of words, as Alchymes does, or would do, the substance of metals, makes of any thing what it lists, and in the end brings all truth to nothing."

What then is the literal meaning of "life?" The Greek noun rendered life in such expressions as "I am the life," "everlasting life," and the like, is zoe, of which the primary sense is "physical life, and existence, as opposed to death and non-existence." All admit it is so used in verses like these, "He giveth to all life (zoen) and breath and all things," Acts xvii: 25; and "if in this life (zoe) only we have hope in Christ," &c,, 1 Cor. xv. 19. Every person understands such phrases as these so well—"the man is alive yet, save my life, he lost his life there," there is no explanation can make the import of life when so used, any clearer. Life has its universally known signs; so has death, its opposite. Now, when the blessed Jesus is called the Life, and the giver of everlasting life, it is very common to understand these terms as signifying not life literally, but a kind of it, that is, happiness, and happiness to run on without a close. In other words, the literal idea of life is excluded, and the secondary, or figurative one, of happiness preferred. Thus a very great change is effected on the representation of the Book, for if the Saviour wishes to be understood as the life, that is, as the author of life, in its primary sense of conscious existence, and if he intended us by "eternal life" to receive the meaning of unending concious being, we certainly lessen the force of his words greatly, when we regard him as only a bestower of eternal blessedness.

Following that most excellent rule afforded us by the distinguished writer named above, we proceed to ask if a literal construction will stand? That is, in the case before us, must we set aside the literal for the figurative? Must we reject the simple idea of being as the gift of Jesus to his followers? We verily believe the literal will stand, for this reason, that unless we get life, and everlasting life from Jesus, in its primary sense, then we must ultimately enter on a condition of eternal non-existence. Had men been naturally immortal, then having in themselves life, or being heirs of ceaseless existence, they could in no way require a Saviour to come and yield them what they had already. But in Scripture, where are we pronounced immortal? The Book uses language of a thoroughly opposite character, as when it speaks of us as "mortal," and "corruptible;" as when it declares "all flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass;" and to add no more, when it exhorts us to "seek for immortality." Rom. ii. 7. Were we possessed of inherent immortality—a life that would go on unwinding and unwinding forever, we might need to seek for immortal or eternal happiness, but not immortality itself.

In consequence of assuming that men are to live for ever, as surely as God himself, no wonder that the gospel life has been set aside in its primary import, and happiness, ceaseless happiness, alone been held forth as the great blessing to be obtained through the interposition of the Son of God. The whole mistake, and a melancholy one it has been, has proceeded from the assumption just mentioned, and in what that originated we stop not at present to consider For the honor of the Lord Jesus, for the consistency of his teaching, for the unspeakable delight of his people, for the enlightment of poor sinners, let us no longer assume that men are immortal beings.

On the withdrawal of this assumption a great erection of misapprehension, and not a little superstition, perishes; the gift of God beams forth in richest glory, and the universe is bathed in a mellower light. Jesus imparts life, and endless life to his friends; happiness no doubt he gives also, but being—immortal, incorruptible being—through a resurrection from among the dead, is the grand product of his philanthropy and power. His mission among men had a view to the future especially. It was among the dying and the dead that he proclaimed "I am the life," "he that believeth on me though he were dead," though he must die, "yet shall he live," and live for ever. In a world of immortals he might have given the announcement, "I am the blessedness;" among men who had no life in themselves, whose breath was in their nostrils, who were hastening to the grave, he was required as the LIFE GIVER—one who would resurrect the inmates of the sepulchre, and cause his saints to inherit an angel-like and deathless state of being.

Let us then disclose him as the Life of men; and assure the Christless that eternity instead of being their home will be their grave! "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so was the Son of Man lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii. 14, 15. The bitten Israelites needed life; all that they had they would have given to escape impending death; without money life was restored to them, their days were prolonged, by looking at the brazen serpent. So now it is life, life from the dead,—an immortal and incorruptible resurrection—that is needed by men, and lo! it is reachable, for Jesus is "The Resurrection and the Life." Ere long he will impart to his followers eternal life, and they will continue in being because his years are unending.

"God so loved the world," each of us on earth, "that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." It was love divine that wrought the miracle in the desert; mercy shown there in benign effulgence, but oh! how it radiates from Jesus, and from his cross, and from Joseph's tomb. The Israelites had their existence continued for a brief space of time, and then the dark foe of man flapped his wings over them when his talons entered their vitals; the life set before you in the gospel of heaven is one that death will never reach. Life and love radiate from the Divine Throne, they are concentrated in the Son of the Blessed, and the blaze is excessively glooious. The proof that God loves you is discoverable in this fact, that there is a Jesus; the evidence that the Infinite and All-merciful Parent wishes you to be immortal in his universe, and perpetually in bliss, is that Jesus sits behind yon sky veil, and that his voice comes to your ears burdened with sorrow and desire, "Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." M.

BAXTER AND THE MAGISTRATE.

The following anecdote is related of the eminent Richard Baxter, which sets off his natural shrewdness and knowledge of human nature to great advantage:

Several of the ministers ejected by the act of uniformity, in 1662, united with Mr. Baxter in establishing a lecture in a private house. The time of worship being at a very early hour, Mr. Baxter one evening left home with a view of being there ready for the morning. The night, however, being dark, he lost his way, and after wandering for a long time, he came to a gentleman's house, where he asked for directions. The servant informed his master of this fact, who thinking it unsafe that so respectable a looking man should be wandering on the common at so late an hour, invited him to stay. Mr. Baxter readily accepted the invitation, and was treated with great hospitality. His conversation gave his host a high opinion of his good sense and extensive information. The gentleman, wishing to know the quality of his guest, after supper said:

"As most persons have some employment or profession in life, I have no doubt, that you have yours."

Mr. Baxter replied, with a smile, "Yes, sir, I am a man-catcher."

"A man-catcher?" said the gentleman; "I am very glad to hear you say so, for you are the very person I want. I am a Justice of the Peace in this district, and I am commissioned to secure the person of Dick Baxter, who is expected to preach at a conventicle in this neighborhood early to-morrow morning; you shall go with me, and I doubt not we shall easily apprehend the rogue.

Mr. Baxter very prudently consented to accompany him. Accordingly, the gentleman, the following morning, took Mr. Baxter to the place where the meeting was to be held.

When they arrived there a considerable number of people were hovering about, but on seeing the Justice, they suspected his intententions, and were afarid to enter the house. The Justice now intimated to Mr. Baxter his fears that Baxter had been apprised of his intentions, and would disappoint them, and proposed to extend their ride, that the people might be encouraged to assemble, and give them an opportunity of fulfilling their commission. They did so; but on their return they still found the people unwilling to assemble. The magistrate now supposing he would be disappointed of his object, said to Mr. Baxter, that as these people were much disaffected to the government, he would feel obliged to him if he would address them on the subject of loyalty and good behaviour. Mr. Baxter replied that, as they met for worship it was probable that such an address would not satisfy the people; but that if the Justice would engage in prayer, he would endeavor to say something to them. The gentleman replied, that he had not his prayer-book with him, or he would readily comply with the proposal; but expressed his persuasion that Mr. Baxter was able to pray with them, as well as to talk with them; and requested him to begin with prayer.

They entered the house, followed by the people; Mr. Baxter prayed with great devotion and fervor; the magistrate, standing by, was soon melted into tears. The good divine then preached in his usual faithful and zealous manner; and when he had concluded, he turned to the justice and said—"Sir, I am the very Dick Baxter of whom you are in pursuit. I am entirely at your disposal."

The magistrate, however, had felt so much during the service, and saw things so differently from what he had before, that his enmity was changed into love, and ever afterwards he became the friend and advocate of the persecuted, and it is believed also a sincere Christian.

The Love of Christ.

It is the observation of Sir Walter Raleigh, that if all the pictures and patterns of a merciless prince were lost in this world, they might all again be painted to the life out of the history of King Henry VIII. On the other hand, the Jews had such a high esteem of Esdras, that they declared, "if mercy, love, and knowledge were extinguished, they might light them again at his heart and brain." May we not with greater truth say, that if all our love were quenched, we might rekindle it at the love of Christ? Not a word that he ever spake, not a work that he ever did, not a pang that he suffered, but is an argument, an expression of his love. He brought love down from heaven; he purchased love by his death; he exhibits love in his life; he bequeathed it when he left the world for heaven; he shall bring it again when he revisits the earth; it marks his intercession; it shall fill his reign; it shall crown his kingdom and glorify his church. How hath he loved us? Ask the mountains of Judea, where he prayed through the long night. Ask Olivet, on whose side the midnight hour found him watching, praying for us. Ask Bethany, ask Jerusalem, ask the murmuring Cedron, whose waters often laved his weary feet.

How hath he loved us? Ask the band
That fled his woes with faithless haste;
Ask Peter's sad denial tone,
Scarce by his bitterest tears effaced.
Ask of the traitor's kiss, and see
What Jesus hath endured for thee.

Ask of Gethsemane, whose dews
Shrank from the moisture strangely red,
Which, in that lonely hour of pain,
His agonizing temples shed—
The scourge, the thorn, whose anguish sore,
Like the unanswering tomb, he bore.

How hath he loved us? Ask the cross,
The Roman spear, the shrouded sky;
Ask of the sheeted dead, who burst
Their cerements at his fearful cry.
Nay, ask no more; but bow thy pride,
And yield thy heart to him who died.

His love is peculiar, it is everlasting—from eternity to eternity; it is gracious—given without desert on our part; it is infinite in depth and fulness—the mind of God is in it; it is active love, it prompts to all beneficence, it comes to us and blesses us; it is patient love, enduring our errors and imperfections; it is a watchful love, ever present to guard and defend us. It is a pitying love, touched with the feeling of our infirmities; a forgiving love, remembering our sins no more forever; a saving love, for it has ascended into the heavens to prepare a place for us; it is a fulfilling love, for it will move him to come again to receive us unto himself.

Converted at Last.

The Crisis, at Boston, has, all through the terrible conflict the United States government has had with a most causeless and wicked rebellion, shown a sort of joy at any reverses the government has met with, and shown a readiness to reiterate the evil prognostications of its enemies; but it seems now to have awakened to the fact that the Lord is really favoring it; and it has become "very evident that the Lord" is giving the government success." We are glad our contemporary has its eyes open at last; and we hope this is not the only subject on which "eyesalve" may be granted to its relief, so that it may take its stand "on the side of truth." The item showing its conversion is in the following language, March 23:

"THE WAR."

"Since government at Washington has decided to let the captives go free, success seems to be more fully upon the side of the truth. It is very evident that the Lord is overturning the terrible system of slavery that has cursed the Southern States for many years."

The foregoing is "short, but sweet." Give us more such, Br. Crisis. It is refreshing. God has probably more for this nation to do yet, than you ever dreamed of.

Help the Widows.

PEORIA, Mahasha Co.,
IOWA, March 18, 1865.

MR. STORRS:—I have had the pleasure of reading several numbers of the Herald of Life through the kindness of the widow E. S. Fenderson. I like the paper, and would gladly subscribe for it. But my means are, like all war widows, very limited. I believe the Herald of Life is all the religious paper in the U. S. that has a "knocker's fund." If that fund is rich enough, will you be so kind as to send me the paper?

I will close with my best wishes to you, and all that are connected with the Life paper,

SARAH VANCLEAVE.

[NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We intend to send the Hereld of Life to any Widow of a soldier who has died in the cause of the country, if requested by such widow, so long as we occupy the position in this office we now do. The "Knocker's Fund" will meet such demands, we have no doubt. Our friends will provide for all such cases, we know.

NEW YORK, APRIL 5, 1865.

Onward, Onward.

FROM ELD. FRANCIS H. BURBANK.

BR. STORRS:—Many thanks for the "Herald of Life" that is sent to me weekly from your office. Though not fully persuaded that the view of the non-resurrection of the wicked is correct, yet my whole heart longs for such a revelation. To-day, I stand four in favor of the view, to one against it; and am praying, reading, and thinking, and have my mind open to conviction. I hear many arguments advanced to support the view of the resurrection of the unjust, but they favor eternal torment, as much as they favor what is advocated; therefore such arguments have little or no weight on my mind. I am considerably surprised at the change manifested in some of our brethren, who have asserted, until recently, that torment was no part of the penalty for sin. Now they declare it is. If that is true, eternal torment is true, for the penalty is "everlasting."

When I look at the page of history, and read there, God's dealings with the children of men, I incline still more to the non-resurrection view. It is absolutely heart-sickening to read the details of wars, famines plagues, pestilences, earthquakes, and casualties of all kinds that have occurred, since the Saviour's first Advent, causing the destruction of millions upon millions, and unnumbered sorrow, and distresses. My whole being has been stirred when I have read the awful page; and the thought that they will all be raised for one more day of tribulation, wrath, and anguish, seems to me ungodly.

They are dead; and I feel that all the claims of justice will be met, if they remain under the dominion of death. I have no hold on the Old Testament to support the view of the resurrection of the unjust, and but little in the New.

Friends tell me that one text will answer to settle their minds in favor of the resurrection of the wicked; but I find the same friends will reject more than one text that teaches the doctrine of "Election;" and more than one that supports the "Trinitarian" theory.

When I recollect the fact that the translators of our Bible were believers in all three views, it leads me to think that it is safer to receive the mass of testimony upon any subject, and look for a harmony of the others with them.

May the Lord bless you in your endeavors to forward the cause of Christ, is the earnest prayer of your brother in Christ.

FRANCIS H. BURBANK.

Philadelphia, Pa., March 31, 1865.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We have often said, and still maintain the position, there is no standing point between eternal torments to the impenitent and their non-resurrection from the dead; and vain are all the efforts to avoid such a conclusion, if torment is any part of the divine law. All the dead who awake at the last day, or at the last trump, awake immortal; and if all men awake in the resurrection, irrespective of moral character, they cannot die any more; and eternal torment is inevitable, if immortal beings can be tormented at all. The torment of an immortal being, however, is an absurdity, and an impossibility in the nature of things. That which is immortal cannot die, and for the same reason cannot suffer or be tormented; and we wonder how any man, that ever thinks a thought outside of bigotry and superstition, can so bewilder himself and do violence to all sense and reason as to attempt to support the unsupportable idea of a mortal resurrection at the last day, or torment for an immortal being. Yet we have more charity for those who hold the latter view, as to honesty, than for such as continue persistently to maintain a mortal resurrection, to torment and kill again. These last have to deny or ignore their own previous position that death, and not torment, is the wages of sin; while the believers in endless torment have more texts that seem to support their theory, and early education has so trammeled their minds that it is next to impossible for them to escape the chains and fetters with which they are bound. But there is no such excuse for those who have already rejected eternal torments. They made their escape from that doctrine by giving up the idea that torment is the penalty or wages of sin, and embracing the true Bible ground that "the wages of sin is death" But this position leads inevitably to the conclusion that the wicked dead will never be revived into life. To this conclusion they must come, or return to eternal torments, or else go over to universal salvation. Mark well what we here say, and see if such is not the result.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

The time for holding this Conference has been fixed for Sunday April 23d, in DODWORTH HALL, 806 Broadway, New York. Services three or more times on the first day, and to be continued as far into the week as thought best; doubtless through Monday and Tuesday, if no more. Important matters will come up at this Conference relating to future operations and missionary work. All who feel an interest in these things should be present as early Monday as possible, as these matters will be under consideration Monday and Tuesday. We presume that most preachers will have appointments in other places which will prevent their attendance till Monday. On their account business matters will not be called up on "the first day."

The Hope and its Trial.

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time."—1 Pet. i. 3–5.

"Blessed"—eulogetos—worthy of praise is "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." Precisely such an expression as Paul uses in Eph. i. 3 "Which, according to his abundant mercy"—eleos—pity, compassion—"hath begotten us again to a lively hope"—elpida—expectation, trust, confidence—of what? The incorruptible inheritance. How was this done? "By the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." They had hope of inheriting a temporal kingdom—a corruptible inheritance—while Christ lived, before his crucifixion; but that hope perished with his death. Though that hope perished, like all perishable things, God did not leave them long without hope. In his abounding pity and compassion, he regenerated them with a lively or living hope when he raised Christ from the death which he experienced by being a partaker of flesh and blood, and endowed him with that eternal life—the unmeasured indwelling of the Spirit of God by which he lives an endless life, and with which he will endow all his true and faithful followers, who believe on his name and suffer with him, at his coming again, and in his kindom. That coming again Peter kept in mind, and now understood that it was an incorruptible or imperishable inheritance and kingdom they were to possess; now clearly revealed to faith by Christ's being raised up from the dead by his God and Father; who is also the God and Father of all that truly adhere to Christ, and become of his mystical body, the church spiritual, or "the spiritual building." This inheritance is not only imperishable, but "undefiled", amianton, unstained, without defect, perfect—"and fadeth not away" like all the treasures and kingdoms of this present state, and therefore will never disappoint the expectations of those who possess it. This inheritance is at this time "reserved"—teleeremeneen—kept, preserved in safety—"in heaven," by Christ, who has ascended there—it is not in our own keeping, but in the hands of one who never failed in any undertaking. He has it in his keeping for "you who are kept"—who are preserved—"by the power of God through faith"—pisteos—trust, confidence, fidelity faithfulness. They are kept by the power of God, but it is only by, or through a particular medium that God keeps them, viz., their confiding in him in faithful obedience to his will; in that way they are kept "unto salvation" from corruptibility; or, into the state of "adoption of children to God," which salvation is "ready" or prepared, "to be revealed"—apokaluphtheenai—to be manifested, uncovered, disclosed, displayed, unveiled—"in the last time," or season: in the fit or proper season; i. e., seasonably. God will not suffer the period of putting his saints in possession of the incorruptible inheritance to go beyond the proper or most suitable period. In this confidence we may rest, without distracting anxiety as to the definite time of the event; knowing that the event is certain.

"Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations, that the trial of your faith, being more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ."—Verses 6, 7.

"Wherein"—the lively hope of the incorruptible inheritance—"ye greatly rejoice"—agalliasthe—exultation, leap for joy, ecstacy; that is, ye are exceeding joyful in the hope, "though now for a season"—oligon—a little—that is, for a short space compared with the endless inheritance—"if need be"—if necessary—"ye are in heaviness"—lupeethentes—in grief, pain, distress, trouble, sorrow—"through manifold"—poikilois—diverse, various—"temptations"—peirasmos, from peiraso—to try, to examine, to sift, to search out, &c. God tried them either directly, as in the case of Abraham to offer up Isaac, or suffered them to be tried by wicked men, as was Daniel, the three Hebrews, the Apostles, and others; or tried them by various providential dealings, all of which were designed to test the real character of their confidence in God, "that the trial of your faith," being tested by these various trials, and "being much more precious"—valuable—"than of gold that perisheth" appollumenon—that may be lost, or destroyed—"though it [the faith] be tried with fire"—with fiery trials—"might be found unto praise"—epainon—commendation—"and honor and glory"—to be made like Christ—"at the appearing"—apokalupsei—revelation, manifestation, disclosure, unveiling—"of Jesus Christ." Peter, in Acts 3d, had said—"The heaven must receive Jesus Christ until the times of restitution," &c.; and that then "God shall send" him to accomplish that "restitution." He is now, therefore "veiled"—hidden from our view—but then he shall be "unveiled, manifested, disclosed, from heaven." When this shall happen, it is all important to our inheriting incorruptibility that our faith is found having endured the trial—the assaying that it has passed through. Many men are at this day seeking "gold;" but after all their labor and suffering, it sometimes happens that when it is "assayed"—tested—they find themselves deceived, and they cannot use it for any valuable purpose. Faith, tried—assayed—by fire, and enduring the trial, is the only coin that will pass current at the unveiling of Jesus Chrst from heaven. Nothing else will be received as currency for the incorruptible inheritance; and that will pass only as evidence of union to Christ, the heir of God. How valuable then is tried faith; and why should we ever murmur, or complain at its trial, seeing that now is the time to discover our mistake, if we have made one, in our faith; because, now if we find ourselves mistaken, we may repair it; but at the unveiling of Christ it will be too late to remedy the evil. Let all think of this when passing through various and even protracted trials; then God is dealing with us in mercy. If our faith stands the assaying process our joy will increase in the same ratio of the assurance of its being genuine; if it does not, what a mercy to know it is spurious while there is a remedy, before the revelation of Jesus Christ.

The Christian Passover.

The Life believers in New York and Brooklyn, will meet for the observance of this feast. The commemoration of our Lord's death is, in the nature of the case, and in harmony with all other memorial of events, an anniversary celebration. Therefore, the doing "this in remembrance of" Christ's death, and to "show forth his death till he come," is our object; and, by Divine permission, it will be attended to in New York on its anniversary; which, this year, falls on Monday eve, April 10th. The friends abroad who have not the opportunity to attend to it at home, are invited to be with us on the occasion; which we trust will be one of much interest. The gathering in the evening will be at an early hour. A moderate repast will be provided for the opening of "the feast," and such other matters attended to as shall be suitable to the occasion. The closing service will be eating the bread and drinking the wine in commemoration of our Redeemer's broken body and shed blood. All who love the Saviour are welcome to participate with us at their and our Lord's table. Let each examine himself, or herself, and see that the feast is kept so as to honor our Lord.

The place of meeting for this Feast, will be the same we occupied last year, viz., Room No. 18, Cooper Institute, Cor. of Bowery and Eighth St.

Let none suppose because they are are unable to meet in company with others that they can not keep the feast. We doubt not you can keep it acceptably at home, and alone, if attended to as a memorial of our Lord's death and in memory of his love.

The View of a Christian Jew.

The following remarks on the Lord's Supper question were handed us unsought and unlooked for, by the EDITOR of the "Isrealite Indeed." We give them to our readers without note or comment, save to say, Br. Lederer is a well known convert to Christianity, and a most self-sacrificing and faithful laborer in the cause of Christ; and his labors have not been in vain; especially, among his "own countrymen, the Jews." His monthly magazine is published by him at $1 per year, and we hope he may be helped in his good work.

NEW YORK, March, 1865.
No. 189 East 13th Street.

BR. STORRS:—There are certain doctrines in the Christian religion in which a Hebrew-christian is more interested than in others; particularly is this the case with such institutions which are purely Jewish, and which, by direct command of the divine author of christianity, received—not another form—but another and more important meaning, representing and commemorating events of greater and more glorious consequence, than those which called forth those institutions among the people of Israel, by divine command, of course, before the appearance of the Son of David.

One of these institutions is The Lord's Supper; and while I pass by the time troubles, which have recently been revived among some brethren, with total indifference, for I know of a surety that no mortal will ever solve that mystery, which God in his wisdom and goodness concluded to keep for himself, I followed with deep interest your controversy concerning The Lord's Supper. In writing this letter it is by no means my intention to enter, as a third person, upon the arena of controversy; for, how could the hyssop cope with the cedars of Lebanon? I only wish to say, that I fully agree with you that the real Lord's Supper should be celebrated on that very evening on which the Jews did, before and in the days of Christ, and do now, in our days, celebrate the passover in commemoration of the exodus of their fathers from Egypt. I ever understood it so.

There are but two ceremonial institutions or ordinances which our Saviour kept by for his followers from the many who were in existence among his people; namely, baptism and the Supper. Baptism existed among the Jews before and in the days of Christ, and is still practiced by the Jews of our days, and every Gentile who wishes to become a member of the synagogue must not only be circumcised—if a male person—but also baptised. But as this was and is done among them as a cleansing of the flesh, they were and are now baptised in no particular name, while Christ commanded those who will receive the word of the kingdom and believe it be baptised in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost.

Thus it is with the "Supper;" it existed before and in the days of Christ, and still exists among the Jews. The supper of the night of the Passover did not exist in a roasted lamb only, which did not represent any event or circumstance at the exodus from Egypt, but was rather a type of the real pascal Lamb which should once be slain to take away the sin of the world, and which was hidden to the mass of the people, but also in things which did represent circumstances in connection with that great event. Thus were, first the Matzos, or unleavened, thin cakes, in commemoration of the circumstance that, in their hasty departure the Israelites had no time to let their dough be leavened, and were obliged to make, when on their journey, very thin cakes of it, in order to bake it on hot stoves, heated only by the Egyptian sun. Then there were several kinds of bitter herbs, representing the agonies and bitterness of their position in the house of bondage. There was also a kind of paste, made of almonds, apples and cinnamon, representing the mortar or loam of which our fathers made the bricks for the building of Pithom and Raamses. Then the wine, red wine, if possible, representing the blood of the innocent children slaughtered by the command of the wicked Pharaoh.

When the antitype of the Pascal Lamb, the Messiah, appeared and was slain, God caused, soon afterwards, the temple to be destroyed, and the type to be abolished; the Jews, then, take a lamb's bone and put it among the other things in commemoration of it, but all other representative objects are still retained.

Now to the point. When the Messiah on that night, which he knew preceeded his death sat down with the twelve to celebrate the commemoration of the exodus of the fathers, he as the Master among them, took the Matzo—unleavened cake—gave thanks, brake it and gave each of them, just as it is done now among the Jews. But he said that the breaking of this bread symbolized his body, which should soon be broken for them. After that, they sang the Hallell—certain psalms, selected for the occasion—ate of the bitter herbs, the paste, the roasted lamb and perhaps some other dishes prepared for that festive occasion, and then, after the supper, he took the cup with wine, spoke the blessing over it, drank himself and let it pass around the table to all of them—just as it is done now in every pious Jewish family—and they all drank from it. But again: he added, that this wine symbolizes, or represents his blood, which shortly would be shed for them. Now he said, "This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." In other words: Hitherto you have taken this particular supper in commemoration of the wonderful liberation of our fathers from Egyptian bondage; but I tell you, that henceforth you shall take it in commemoration of my death. And the disciples and all first christians, mostly Jews, did so; they celebrated annually that very night, with all the usual ceremonies, with the only difference, that instead of speaking of the wonderful deliverance from Egypt, and singing a Psalm in relation to that event, they spoke of the love of the Son of God and what he has done for them; his sufferings, his agonies, his death and resurrection and the good news of the coming kingdom.

It is true we read of the disciples coming together on every first day of the week for prayer and for breaking bread; but this was certainly not the "Lord's Supper," which is evident from the expression "from house to house." It was rather in token of brotherly love to each other, and therefore they had no particular place, but went from the house of one brother to that of another, to show that was no preference among them. They had every thing in common, and and on that day, which they had set apart for a season of prayer, they assembled at the house of one of them, held their prayer meeting, and then partook of a supper—not a mock supper, consisting of a cracker and cup of water, but a substantial one—at which, of course, they conversed on "the things most needed."

The practice of the different churches in these days, is another proof that none of them celebrate the Lord's Supper in that very sense in which the Lord instituted it. The Greek Catholics take it three times in the year, and instead of giving the bread and then the cup, they put a piece of bread in a teaspoon, pour a drop of wine on it and put it in the open mouth of the communicant. The Roman Catholic priest takes it every day, and some times three or four times in a day; while the laymen get it but three times in the year, and then only bread and no cup. The Luthereans and other Protestant churches in Europe take it, the former with unleavened, the latter with leavened bread three times a year. The Episcopaleans, Baptists and some Presbyterian churches, take it monthly, and some others weekly, but none of all take the Lord's Supper either in its original form or in the originally appointed time. This, and a thousand other doctrines and practices in Christendom plainly show that the corruptions which began to disfigure the pure church of the Messiah as early as the third century, have not been purged out of it by either of the reformers, and that it needs a Herculees, indeed, to clean the Augean stable. This Herculees, however, is none else but our glorious King, Jesus Messiah himself, who at his coming, with the iron rod in his hand will remove the mountain of rubbish which conceals the pearl of great value, the pure christian religion, the only true Judaism.

Your Brother in the Hope of Israel,

J. R. LEDERER

The Baptism for the Dead.

The Apostle Paul, in his matchless resurrection argument, 1 Cor. xv., uses the following language: "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?" This passage has occasioned much speculation, and a number of different expositions have been suggested, but they are generally unsatisfactory in consequence of an assumption that the practice referred to was sanctioned by the Divine mind. This assumption is fostered by a superficial acquaintance with the structure of the New Testament writings, and also of the status of the primitive church. It is supposed that whatever was allowed by the New Testament writers, and whatever was practiced by the early churches is binding on Christians of all ages. This is a great mistake. The Gospel dispensation is spiritual, and its worship is spiritual. Whatever of form is connected with it is nonessential. There will naturally be more or less of form among every Christian people and in every age, but it does not therefore follow that the forms used at one time are necessary or required at another. The principle we state is very important as affording a stand-point from which to view the forms that have existed in the past, that their true value may be understood.

As to the baptism for the dead we believe that it never was warranted either by our Lord or his apostles. It certainly was not by the Apostle who refers to the custom. The following translation is better than the common one: "Else what shall they do who are in the habit of being baptized (hoi baptizomenoi) on behalf of the dead (huper ton nekron) if the dead rise not at all? why are they baptized for them?"

Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, A. D. 374, makes the following comment on the text: "Paul, in order to show that the doctrine of the resurrection was perfectly established, quoted the example of those persons, who were so secure of a future resurrection that they were even baptized for the dead, if one died before having received that rite, fearing either that the deceased would not rise at all, or only to condemnation. Thus a living man was baptized in the name of the dead. Whence Paul subjoins, 'Why are they baptized for them?' By this example he did not approve their custom, but by it he wished to show how firm was the faith in a resurrection." Dean Alford's remarks on the passage, are instructive and evidently correct. On the words—"What shall they do?" he says: "There is in these words a tacit reprehension of the practice about to be mentioned, which it is hardly possible altogether to miss. Both by the third person, and by the article before bapt., he indirectly separates himself and those to whom he is writing, from participation in or approval of the practice:—the meaning being, what will become of—'What account can they give of their practice?' Alford further says: "The only legitimate inference is, to a practice, not otherwise known to us, not mentioned here with any approval by the Apostle, not generally prevalent (hoi bapt.,) but in use by some, of survivors allowing themselves to be baptized on behalf of (believing?) friends who had died without baptism."

Work of the Spirit.

The plan of salvation in Jesus Christ begins and ends in the Spirit. Even the condemnation of the animal man is wrought by a spiritual instrument—the law. Paul finds himself condemned because he is not what the law is. "The law is spiritual; but I am carnal [and therefore] sold under sin." If God had not purposed to offer another and higher life to the children of men, the presumption is that he would not have condemned them in Adam. He would have left us in as perfect a state of ignorance concerning the future as he has the brutes. Hence Paul says, "By law is the knowledge of sin." "I had not known sin, but by law." And the account of the Adamic trial clearly shows us that the "knowledge of good and evil" was not Adam's possession previous to his eating the forbidden fruit, but that it was a subsequent as well as a consequent acquirement. The trial manifested, not Adam's personal and wilful development of sin—for no such development could take place without a "knowledge of good and evil"—but the natural and irresistible proclivity of the animal man. It was the argument in the seventh of Romans illustrated. If Paul could say with propriety, "I am carnal, sold under sin," so could Adam. He was created a "carnal" being—that is, fleshly, animal—and his experience in the garden of Eden showed him the connected fact that he was "sold under sin." He was "convinced of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment" by the Spirit of God, the only condemning principle; and as he represented the animal nature in its entirety, the same spiritual law condemns the race.

But in its condemning relation the Holy Spirit is merely an outside actor. It is a striver with man, not a worker in man. It frowns with portentous visage; it speaks with dreadful voice; it rouses the stupid soul; but it remains apart. It is only in its Gospel character that it links itself to man, as the great re-generative, purifying and life-giving power. Considered in its two contrary aspects, it may be compared to a physician who combines with his usual practice the duties of a Quarantine Officer. In the latter office it examines and condemns the diseased; in the former, it advises, treats, and heals the patient.

The Spirit is the Divine motive power. Without it man must inevitably perish. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth." Without it man must remain in his sins. "Ye are justified....by the Spirit of our God." And lastly, in its relation to us in the present, it is the Spirit that sanctifieth, it is the Spirit that enlighteneth, it is the Spirit that lifts us even now by anticipation and through its exhilarating influences, into heavenly places with Christ Jesus. The law is spiritual, the Gospel is spiritual, the inheritance is spiritual, the resurrection is spiritual, and we, if we have any part in the future life must be spiritual. "God is spirit and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth."

It costs us more to be miserable than would make us perfectly happy.

Inconsistency of Time Theorists.

Far be it from us to discourage proper inquiry, and investigation into any question relating to the Coming and Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Those who "love his appearing" will naturally evince an interest in "the times and seasons" although they are put in the Father's "own power." If other things in the sphere of Christian duty and research are not neglected, even time theories may not do any special harm to those who harbor them.

But we must say that many time-talkers manifest a lack of common consistency. We do not now speak of the contempt and neglect of truth in general, although there is an abundant manifestation of this. But many timeists act as if belief in the coming of Christ and discussion of "the time" made up for a lack of personal development in spiritual things. Let them take warning! "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Matt. vii. 21.

There are also minor inconsistencies which present their perpetrators in a very ridiculous position. The following is a specimen. The Voice of the West and its Editor are using every effort to make people believe that the Lord will come in 1868. And yet, under date of March 28, 1865, we have this delicious morsel.

We commend to the careful and candid consideration of our readers the article by Elder D. T. Taylor, on the building of Meeting Houses. It was written by him some years since. We found it in looking over a file of old papers, and we think our readers will agree with us, that it would bear re-publication an indefinite number of times; or, at least, until we as a people become thoroughly awakened on this question. We invite the attention of the Church in Buchanan, especially, to this subject. Let us "arise and build."

We do not wonder that such talk is thought to be evidence of hypocrisy. The idea of men building meeting houses who do nothing but preach the coming of the Lord in 1868. That is the sum and substance of their religion. How it looks! And not only so, but this wonderful Voice thinks that Eld. Taylor's article on the building of Church Edifices "would bear re-publication an indefinite number of times; or, at least, until we as a people become thoroughly awakened on this question." Now we think that it will take more than two years to accomplish this awakening, not to speak of the re-publication of the instrument indefinitely. We wonder at the facility with which poor human nature is hood-winked.

We have no faith in the doctrine of Christ's coming in '68. We do not say that it will not be—we do say that there is no trustworthy evidence that it will be; but if we did believe it we should be ashamed of such teachings as that contained in the Voice. And in conclusion we remark again to all whom it may concern: It is one thing to talk of Christ's coming, it is quite another thing to be among those who "are Christ's at his coming." While we have no sympathy with any time theory yet preached, we do pray "Come, Lord Jesus!" and we intend to press into the kingdom, God being our helper.

Christ the Bread Of Life.

"I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."—John vi. 51.

These words are charged with the most precious meaning, and it is our intention to enter fully, though briefly, into an examination of them. Without any preliminary observations, we request the reader to observe first, the character in which Jesus here represents himself—"I am the living bread which came down from heaven." The parties to whom our Saviour thus addressed himself, had required from him some miraculous display of divine power, as an evidence that he was in reality what he professed to be—a messenger from God; and they supported their demand by referring to the circumstance of their fathers having been miraculously fed in the wilderness by the hand of Moses—"Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat." Jesus replied to their request by asserting that God had given them a blessing of far superior value, and that he himself was this transcendant gift. "My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven; I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever."

The phrase from heaven is equivalent to—from God, hence he styles himself "the bread of God," the bread of God's providing. It was God who, in the fulness of his compassion, sent his well beloved Son into this world that we might not perish but have everlasting life.

When Jesus represents himself as bread, he plainly intimates that one grand object of his mission was to give life. The only use of bread is to sustain life. The moment bread is deprived of its life preserving quality—the moment it fails to communicate nutriment—that instant it becomes void of all worth. It follows, then, that the only proper mark of analogy between Christ and bread consists in his being the source of life to all who receive him as their Saviour. It is commonly thought that the Lord Jesus is not the source of life to believers; that men will remain in being perpetually, let their conduct be what it may; that it is not as the communicator of everlasting life, but of everlasting happiness, that he is self-styled "the bread of life."—Such a doctrine is not only unwarranted by the Saviour's teachings, it is directly opposite to it. The property of bread is not to communicate happiness, for how many at this hour have abundance of bread, and continue in wretchedness. Life, not happiness, is the product of bread; and it is because Jehovah has constituted his Son the giver of immortality to all who obey him, that, in the passage before us, he designates himself "the bread of life." This will appear more obvious when we attend to the remainder of the verse.

The expression, "living bread," may be understood as descriptive of the superior quality of this God-given manna referred to by the Jews as having been provided for their ancestors in the wilderness. This is evident from what we find in verses 49 and 50—"Your fathers did eat mana in the wilderness, and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die." The superiority of the bread of which Jesus discoursed, consists in this, that it not merely preserves life, it imparts everlasting being. The Jews addressed by our Lord thought only of supplies for the present existence; his grand aim was to elevate their aspirations to a life beyond this state of things—a life that would not end its periods in the horrors of dissolution; one, in short, that would be as enduring as the fountain of being himself. Hence the great Teacher declares, "I am the living," i. e. the life-giving "bread, which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever." In the remainder of the passage Jesus continues to speak of himself as the life-giving One—"The bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." We are not to understand by these words, that it was merely by rendering up a part of himself that he was to bring eternal life within the reach of dying men. By his "flesh" he evidently meant himself; for in verses 35 and 48, as well as in the one before us, he plainly affirms that he himself is the bread of life. This appears still more plain when we compare his language in the 54th verse, and what he delivers in verse 57. In the one verse he says that "all who eat his flesh shall have eternal life;" in the other, that "as the living Father had sent him, and he lived by the Father, in the same manner they who ate him should live by him." The flesh of Jesus, then is Jesus himself; and when he intimates that he would give his "flesh," he taught his hearers that he would give himself for the life of the world.

The two parts of the verse, then, exhibit the same truth, that Jesus is the bringer in of life to a death doomed race. Still, we are inclined to view the second part of the verse as in some measure explanatory of the first part. Jesus in the first place states the fact, that he is life-giving bread sent from God, that all might eat and live for ever; and then he describes the process by which he becomes the source of life, or endless being to guilty men, viz.,—by giving his flesh, rendering up himself to death, for the life of the world.

Herein, indeed, is love! Reader will you contemplate it with earnestness? Jesus gave himself for you, and what more could he give? The whole world lies in wickedness, and on that account is worthy of everlasting destruction—for "the wages of sin is death;" but the Lord from heaven, in boundless compassion, "gave himself a ransom for all." He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, from which God speedily raised him up and gave him glory. He rose victorious over death, the first fruits of them that slept. In receiving him as our Saviour, and being reconciled unto God through the influence of his love, we become heirs of unending being: we may rejoice in hope of immortality. This hope will be realized at his coming, when his people are to be ransomed from the grave, and fashionad like unto his own glorious person.

And now, reader, permit the inquiry, What think you of Christ? What think you of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ? Think, O, think of his love till your heart melts in tenderness within you, and tears of contrition and gratitude flow from your eyes! Listen how he calls you in tones of the most moving accents, while pointing to the Son of his love who expired for your sins, he exclaims, "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?"

Mission to the Freedmen.

Dr. Litch, editor of the Advent Herald, is giving us some account of the working of the Mission of the friends of that paper among the colored population of the South; at present in the vicinity of Nashville, Tenn. Brethren Child's and Leslie are laboring there. We give the following extracts from the Journal of one of them. He says:

Our experience at the Contraband Camp was sad and depressing, yet never to be forgotten. I shall never forget the first evening with those little suffering orphans. Dr. Leslie had been working incessantly for their good during the day, and I felt at night, that I could take a father's care of them. As I entered they were dled around the stove. I seated each on the foot of their little bunks, and then spoke to them of Jesus' love. I then directed their souls to God in prayer—helped the nurse put them to bed, bid them good night, and found from that moment I had made many friends. The next evening about the time that "peepers grow heavy" I called in to carry their thoughts again to Heaven. Settees from the school room had been brought in and the little ones sat in a pleasant group together. This evening they were ready to enter into my project. I first asked how many knew the Lord's Prayer; three little hands were raised. Who will repeat it? "I will," and a little boy repeated it correctly; one other repeated it with assistance, and a little girl repeated a mixed rhyme. After a few kind words they sung to me a sweet hymn of Jesus, to whom I committed their interests as the "Father of the fatherless."

Feb. 20. We are now enjoying the pleasure of realizing our long anticipated and heaven suggested mission as fully established. Never did Ethiopia stretch forth her hands more than do this people to us to teach them those things that they have yet to learn. We opened our school to-day under the most favorable circumstances. Soon after 9 o'clock the earnest seekers after knowledge came pouring into our small house, and immediately filled our seats,—the mother of 40, with her child of 8 summers—and oh that child, I wish you could all see her, the most beautifully chiseled face that I have seen for many a day. Sporting, happy, loving boys, hardly able to keep their chuckling fun inside till after school, and perfectly susceptable to every funny thing that might be said and done, yet all wishing to dig into the mine of wisdom, just as though every letter learned was a sugar plum, or something golden. The girls were as happy as larks, heads neatly dressed, faces clean, dresses nice, teeth like snow, angel hearts, real jewels. How it causes my heart to swell with emotion as I recount the happy faces of the morning.

Friday. 24. We are suffering for the want of choice school books suited to the capacity of this people. We find books of a poor stamp without adaptation or propriety, and are being tortured with their use, but as we have sent to the "Hub" for books, we are in high expectation of speedy improvement. We find the boys are noisy, active, and playful out of school, and enjoy their recess very much. In school they are generally steady, but being of a playful, cheerful mood, and not being accustomed to school discipline they require to be spoken to, but without resenting it, they try to be quiet till they fill up, and then as the little boy said to his teacher "I did'nt whistle, it whistled itself." The girls are pleasant, intelligent, and always greet you with a smile. They learn quite as quick as the boys, and require to be frequently reminded of the rules of school. They are charming singers. We to-day introduced the tune "Lilly Dale." The school caught it at once, and after a few trials sung it beautifully. This is a very interesting feature of our work. We open in the morning with reading and explaining some familiar Bible story, followed by prayer, at the close of which the school join in repeating the Lord's Prayer. Usually they sing also. Mrs. Child, who has now joined the mission, is peculiarly blessed with the art of teaching. She is delighted with the work, and the children are full of her praise.

Miss Mary Whitney of Westboro, whom Mrs. C invited to accompany her south as an assistant, felt months since a desire to give herself to God and the Freedmen's Work. Mrs. Child having transportation for another, and disliking to come alone without a lady friend, offered it to her, and she after much prayer, decided to come, trusting in the Lord for food and raiment, knowing that in thus coming she had no claim on the Association for support. She is an Adventist, and a sweet spirited sister, a great comfort to Mrs. Child, and will do a good work for the Master. Owing to the number of scholars, we have the boys come in the morning and the girls in the afternoon. This we regret, but must do so until we get more room, for we have enough of either to fill our house. We had the first day 80, the second 105, and an increase every day, and we have not as yet urged any family to send. We are in the midst of a death struggle with slavery and darkness, and shall soon see the following results worked out by the Wonder-working Mind:

1st. Four millions of slaves will spring forth to freedom demanding their sufferage and education.

2d. Six millions of whites, lower than the blacks in education and especially in morals, must be elevated, taught that to work is no disgrace, and by law required to send their children to school.

3d. The whole South must be renovated, and electrified by Yankee enterprise. Free labor, free schools, and a free people must succeed the gaunt, long-haired, suspicious aristocrat. Cattle without number must be brought on to this fertile soil, the manure husbanded, and the exhausted land recovered. The sunny south would then be a Paradise, but not like the one we hope for in the world to come.

The Missionary Horse.

Brooklyn, N. Y., April 2d, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—I have been watching and hearing the knocking on the Lord for that horse for Br. Smith, of Iowa, and have felt for some time that I should like to have a share in the horse or wagon, but some how I have neglected it.

But to-day, when reading your blessed paper, the Herald of Life, (the best paper I ever read in my life,) I saw you stated you had sent $70 to Br. Smith, and that there were $30 more wanting and you meant to "knock on the dear Lord" for it, and it would come. Well you have truly knocked so as to make me hear, at least sufficiently distinct to take one share; though poor, yet I believe it is from the Lord, and may Br. Smith go through the great west aud preach "No future life out of Christ;" and we hope we shall hear from him soon again; for the letter we read in this week's paper did us much good. You want short letters, but as this is the first time I have ever written you, bear with me a little. I feel as if I could write a volume; but let me say, that I am doing what I can to honor Jesus and be admitted to the marriage supper of the Lamb. I expect to be THERE: praise the Lord. Now, in my humble way, I have convinced a number of their errors. I believe the idea of the natural immortality of man is the great rock on which many have split. Now let me ask a question or two.

Is man naturally immortal? If so, then Christ cannot give him immortality.

Again. If the man or soul never dies, then Christ cannot raise it or him from the dead. So I think that doctrine robs Christ of the glorious work for which he died on Calvary, and rose from the dead to perform, which was to give man immortality and raise him from the dead. And if we are immortal and never die, it seems to me Christ has died in vain. But, no; glory to God, we are all mortals, and Christ has died to give us immortality. Hallelujah, praise the Lord.

Come brethren, don't forget or postpone a share in Br. Smith's horse; and he must have a wagon, too. Now I have no doubt there are advent brethren who are better able to give hundreds of dollars than I am to give one. Now say, brother, sister, don't you hear that knocking for that horse and wagon? I believe you do; I am sure you do, or else you have not got as good ears as I have. Hark now, one moment! Don't you hear it? Why, how plain I can hear it since I told the Lord I would help a little. Now, then, let us send him the money at once.

Aaron Kimball.

[Note by the Editor.—Br. Kimball is an old Methodist, but has got his heart wide open to the truth. He is one of the "Lord's poor;" but rich in faith and love. His one share in the "Horse Stock Company" is worth more than a hundred in any Oil, Silver, or Gold Stock Company in the world. The shares are most all disposed of, and how good the tidings from Br. Smith will be, from the far west, to those who have taken shares. To accommodate those who may be too late in taking stock in the horse we will let them have a share in the wagon: so do not be afraid to send what the Lord has put it into your heart to send; and do not delay in sending, lest the tempter should get the advantage of you and cheat you out of the blessing.

Will the Lord Heal the Sick?

Springfield, Mass. April 3, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—Feeling under renewed obligations to the Lord for his kind and gracious interposition on my behalf, when prostrated by disease, I feel constrained to say with David, "Come and hear all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul." It is now eight years since I (being very low by a disease which had preyed upon me for five and a half years, it having baffled the skill of some of the most eminent Physicians) was remarkably favored of the Lord by his direct interposition at a time when my hope of recovery was almost gone, as my case was too complicated for any earthly Physician to render me any assistance. I then felt, during my wakefulness one night, while in suffering mentally, as well as physically, that unless the Lord should be pleased to take my case in hand, I must soon be laid away in the cold and silent grave. And strange to tell, beyond anything I ever expected, that very day an opportunity was afforded me to have the prayer of faith offered on my behalf, which prayer proved effectual, and most truly the power of the Lord was present to heal. It seemed as though the windows of heaven were opened, to pour us out a blessing. Our hearts were filled with love, joy, and peace to the Lord, as the healing virtue was infused into my poor feeble frame, creating new strength and vigor in body and mind, so that I could confidently and joyfully testify that the Lord had raised me up, and though I had committed sins, they were forgiven me. I then felt renewedly to consecrate myself to the Lord desiring to subject my will to his in all things.

But such was the weakness of my nature, and liability to become unmindful of my obligations to Him who had done so much for me. I lived far below my privileges, and made some crooked paths, so that since that time I have needed sore chastisements; yet I thank the Lord that his forbearance is still exercised toward me. I am daily seeking for that grace which will enable me to endure chastening, that God may deal with me as his; for what child is it whom the Father doth not chasten?

About five years since, I was again brought low; when, not withstanding every thing was done for my relief and comfort which could be thought of, I was still languishing. The skill of the Physicians failed and I was sensible that unless help was afforded I must soon sink into the arms of death. I then (clinging to life, more especially on behalf of my little ones, who need a mother's care), remembered how the Lord had previously been pleased to manifest his power in rebuking disease and bid me go free in the name of Jesus. I felt that he had not changed, and as a last resort, I ventured to call on the Elders according to James' exhortation, to present my case before the Lord; and blessed be his name, He did not turn a deaf ear, but graciously helped us to draw near, and take hold, as it were, of the hem of his garment, from which, healing virtue was obtained, so that from that time my bad symyptoms, one after another, left me; and I went forward in the strength of the Lord attending to my domestic duties, in weaknes tis true, at first, but my strength came amazingly fast. From that time, to the present my faith has been unshaken in the promise of God, that the prayer of faith shall save the sick.

The last time I was favored with a marked token of the willingness as well as power of the Lord to arrest the progress of disease, was about six weeks ago, when I again fell under its power and my strength was so reduced, that it was necessary for me to be kept perfectly quiet; and although the disease had assumed a formidable character and was gaining upon me, I could not concede to the wishes of kind friends, to call in the aid of any other Physician than the One whose timely interposition on my behalf had been so effectual on previous occasions, when all other remedies failed. Call on me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me. This we felt was our privilege, and I was willing to risk my life in the hands of the Lord, who mercifully heard the supplications of his servants, who sought unto him on my behalf. And though the tempter strove hard to keep me down in unbelief and dark despair, yet his power was soon broken by the more powerful operation of the Spirit of God, which came upon me (as it were) from above, like a mighty shock, vibrating through my whole being, infusing strength and vitality into every part of my body, at the same time, filling my soul with unexpressable love, joy, and peace constraining me to shout, "Glory to God, the work is done. The Lord is mine and I am His."

I once more arose in the name of the Lord, resuming my household duties gradually, as my strength came, which I found to increase daily; and I can truly say, it is my desire that it may be spent in the service of Him to whom I feel so much indebted for the continuence of this mortal life.

Yesterday, while thinking of the ten lepers whom Christ cleansed, when there was but one, who returned to give glory to God, I thought of what the Lord had done for me and felt prompted to communicate, through the Herald of Life to some of His dear children, who are suffering by disease, yet seem not to realize that it is their privilege to apply to the great Physician, whose word still stands good, that if we ask any thing according to his will, He heareth us, that they may be encouraged to plead the promises of God which are for their benefit, and are all yea, and amen, in Christ Jesus.

I feel thankful for the privilege of being associated with the little flock of Believers in, "No life out Christ," who meet together from time to time to worship God in Rice's Hall. 'Tis true, we don't often have preaching, but the Lord meets with us, and through the power of His Spirit, brings to our minds the soul-cheering, life-giving truths of His precious word; so that we are comforted, instructed and refreshed. Our number is but small, but we are a united company. And though the cause of truth here, has been injured, yet, I believe, if we continue each, at our post, realizing our individual responsibility to do our duty in the fear of God, looking to him for wisdom and counsel to guide us continually, he will in due time move in our midst, and truth will ultimately triumph, and those who are faithful to the truths committed to them, will be abundantly blessed. "They that honor me, I will honor," saith the word. Having had but little preaching for so long, we are prepared to appreciate the services of our Ministering Brethren who may have an opportunity to come this way.

That the great the Head of Church, may so overrule and control matters relating to His own children, open their eyes to see the truth, add their hearts to receive it in the love thereof, that they may be united and made ready for the coming of Him who is so soon toset up his everlasting kingdom, is the prayer of your's, in hope of Life, through His Name.

Ann Payne.

The War News.

The result is summed up in a few words. The rebel capital, Richmond, Va., and also Petersburg, the key to Richmond, is in the hands of the Federal army, and Gen. Lee, with the broken remnant of his rebel hosts is fleeing as best he can. The details we need not supply to our readers as they will learn all that it is important to know from secular papers before ours will reach them. The rebellion is overthrown, and come to its deserved doom. That there will be more fighting, in some quarters, is to be looked for; but, it is likely, Government will make short work with the remnants of rebels who still carry on their warfare in scattered bands. The bogus "Confederacy" has been effectually broken up, and become a total wreck. The hand of Yahveh (the Deliverer) hath done it: to Him be the glory.

☞ The Sister in R. I. who sent us $3, to be disposed of "in the manner you deem best," is informed, we have applied $1 for the "Missionary Horse;" $1 to the credit of the "widow of a soldier," Mrs. Sarah Vancleave; and $1 to the Knocker's Fund.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price 50 cents, in pa per covers only. Postage 6 cents.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Inconsistency of Time Theorists.

Far be it from us to discourage proper inquiry, and investigation into any question relating to the Coming and Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Those who "love his appearing" will naturally evince an interest in "the times and seasons" although they are put in the Father's "own power." If other things in the sphere of Christian duty and research are not neglected, even time theories may not do any special harm to those who harbor them.

But we must say that many time-talkers manifest a lack of common consistency. We do not now speak of the contempt and neglect of truth in general, although there is an abundant manifestation of this. But many timeists act as if belief in the coming of Christ and discussion of "the time" made up for a lack of personal development in spiritual things. Let them take warning! "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Matt. vii. 21.

There are also minor inconsistencies which present their perpetrators in a very ridiculous position. The following is a specimen. The Voice of the West and its Editor are using every effort to make people believe that the Lord will come in 1868. And yet, under date of March 28, 1865, we have this delicious morsel.

> We commend to the careful and candid consideration of our readers the article by Elder D. T. Taylor, on the building of Meeting Houses. It was written by him some years since. We found it in looking over a file of old papers, and we think our readers will agree with us, that it would bear re-publication an indefinite number of times; or, at least, until we as a people become thoroughly awakened on this question. We invite the attention of the Church in Buchanan, especially, to this subject. Let us "arise and build."

We do not wonder that such talk is thought to be evidence of hypocrisy. The idea of men building meeting houses who do nothing but preach the coming of the Lord in 1868. That is the sum and substance of their religion. How it looks! And not only so, but this wonderful Voice thinks that Eld. Taylor's article on the building of Church Edifices "would bear re-publication an indefinite number of times; or, at least, until we as a people become thoroughly awakened on this question." Now we think that it will take more than two years to accomplish this awakening, not to speak of the re-publication of the instrument indefinitely. We wonder at the facility with which poor human nature is hood-winked.

We have no faith in the doctrine of Christ's coming in '68. We do not say that it will not be—we do say that there is no trustworthy evidence that it will be; but if we did believe it we should be ashamed of such teachings as that contained in the Voice. And in conclusion we remark again to all whom it may concern: It is one thing to talk of Christ's coming, it is quite another thing to be among those who "are Christ's at his coming." While we have no sympathy with any time theory yet preached, we do pray "Come, Lord Jesus!" and we intend to press into the kingdom, God being our helper.

Christ the Bread Of Life.

> "I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."—John vi. 51.

These words are charged with the most precious meaning, and it is our intention to enter fully, though briefly, into an examination of them. Without any preliminary observations, we request the reader to observe first, the character in which Jesus here represents himself—"I am the living bread which came down from heaven." The parties to whom our Saviour thus addressed himself, had required from him some miraculous display of divine power, as an evidence that he was in reality what he professed to be—a messenger from God; and they supported their demand by referring to the circumstance of their fathers having been miraculously fed in the wilderness by the hand of Moses—"Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat." Jesus replied to their request by asserting that God had given them a blessing of far superior value, and that he himself was this transcendant gift. "My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven; I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever."

The phrase from heaven is equivalent to—from God, hence he styles himself "the bread of God," the bread of God's providing. It was God who, in the fulness of his compassion, sent his well beloved Son into this world that we might not perish but have everlasting life.

When Jesus represents himself as bread, he plainly intimates that one grand object of his mission was to give life. The only use of bread is to sustain life. The moment bread is deprived of its life preserving quality—the moment it fails to communicate nutriment—that instant it becomes void of all worth. It follows, then, that the only proper mark of analogy between Christ and bread consists in his being the source of life to all who receive him as their Saviour. It is commonly thought that the Lord Jesus is not the source of life to believers; that men will remain in being perpetually, let their conduct be what it may; that it is not as the communicator of everlasting life, but of everlasting happiness, that he is self-styled "the bread of life."—Such a doctrine is not only unwarranted by the Saviour's teachings, it is directly opposite to it. The property of bread is not to communicate happiness, for how many at this hour have abundance of bread, and continue in wretchedness. Life, not happiness, is the product of bread; and it is because Jehovah has constituted his Son the giver of immortality to all who obey him, that, in the passage before us, he designates himself "the bread of life." This will appear more obvious when we attend to the remainder of the verse.

The expression, "living bread," may be understood as descriptive of the superior quality of this God-given manna referred to by the Jews as having been provided for their ancestors in the wilderness. This is evident from what we find in verses 49 and 50—"Your fathers did eat mana in the wilderness, and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die." The superiority of the bread of which Jesus discoursed, consists in this, that it not merely preserves life, it imparts everlasting being. The Jews addressed by our Lord thought only of supplies for the present existence; his grand aim was to elevate their aspirations to a life beyond this state of things—a life that would not end its periods in the horrors of dissolution; one, in short, that would be as enduring as the fountain of being himself. Hence the great Teacher declares, "I am the living," i. e. the life-giving "bread, which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever." In the remainder of the passage Jesus continues to speak of himself as the life-giving One—"The bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." We are not to understand by these words, that it was merely by rendering up a part of himself that he was to bring eternal life within the reach of dying men. By his "flesh" he evidently meant himself; for in verses 35 and 48, as well as in the one before us, he plainly affirms that he himself is the bread of life. This appears still more plain when we compare his language in the 54th verse, and what he delivers in verse 57. In the one verse he says that "all who eat his flesh shall have eternal life;" in the other, that "as the living Father had sent him, and he lived by the Father, in the same manner they who ate him should live by him." The flesh of Jesus, then is Jesus himself; and when he intimates that he would give his "flesh," he taught his hearers that he would give himself for the life of the world.

The two parts of the verse, then, exhibit the same truth, that Jesus is the bringer in of life to a death doomed race. Still, we are inclined to view the second part of the verse as in some measure explanatory of the first part. Jesus in the first place states the fact, that he is life-giving bread sent from God, that all might eat and live for ever; and then he describes the process by which he becomes the source of life, or endless being to guilty men, viz.,—by giving his flesh, rendering up himself to death, for the life of the world.

Herein, indeed, is love! Reader will you contemplate it with earnestness? Jesus gave himself for you, and what more could he give? The whole world lies in wickedness, and on that account is worthy of everlasting destruction—for "the wages of sin is death;" but the Lord from heaven, in boundless compassion, "gave himself a ransom for all." He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, from which God speedily raised him up and gave him glory. He rose victorious over death, the first fruits of them that slept. In receiving him as our Saviour, and being reconciled unto God through the influence of his love, we become heirs of unending being: we may rejoice in hope of immortality. This hope will be realized at his coming, when his people are to be ransomed from the grave, and fashionad like unto his own glorious person.

And now, reader, permit the inquiry, What think you of Christ? What think you of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ? Think, O, think of his love till your heart melts in tenderness within you, and tears of contrition and gratitude flow from your eyes! Listen how he calls you in tones of the most moving accents, while pointing to the Son of his love who expired for your sins, he exclaims, "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?"

Mission to the Freedmen.

Dr. Litch, editor of the Advent Herald, is giving us some account of the working of the Mission of the friends of that paper among the colored population of the South; at present in the vicinity of Nashville, Tenn. Brethren Child's and Leslie are laboring there. We give the following extracts from the Journal of one of them. He says:

Our experience at the Contraband Camp was sad and depressing, yet never to be forgotten. I shall never forget the first evening with those little suffering orphans. Dr. Leslie had been working incessantly for their good during the day, and I felt at night, that I could take a father's care of them. As I entered they were dled around the stove. I seated each on the foot of their little bunks, and then spoke to them of Jesus' love. I then directed their souls to God in prayer—helped the nurse put them to bed, bid them good night, and found from that moment I had made many friends. The next evening about the time that "peepers grow heavy" I called in to carry their thoughts again to Heaven. Settees from the school room had been brought in and the little ones sat in a pleasant group together. This evening they were ready to enter into my project. I first asked how many knew the Lord's Prayer; three little hands were raised. Who will repeat it? "I will," and a little boy repeated it correctly; one other repeated it with assistance, and a little girl repeated a mixed rhyme. After a few kind words they sung to me a sweet hymn of Jesus, to whom I committed their interests as the "Father of the fatherless."

Feb. 20. We are now enjoying the pleasure of realizing our long anticipated and heaven suggested mission as fully established. Never did Ethiopia stretch forth her hands more than do this people to us to teach them those things that they have yet to learn. We opened our school to-day under the most favorable circumstances. Soon after 9 o'clock the earnest seekers after knowledge came pouring into our small house, and immediately filled our seats,—the mother of 40, with her child of 8 summers—and oh that child, I wish you could all see her, the most beautifully chiseled face that I have seen for many a day. Sporting, happy, loving boys, hardly able to keep their chuckling fun inside till after school, and perfectly susceptable to every funny thing that might be said and done, yet all wishing to dig into the mine of wisdom, just as though every letter learned was a sugar plum, or something golden. The girls were as happy as larks, heads neatly dressed, faces clean, dresses nice, teeth like snow, angel hearts, real jewels. How it causes my heart to swell with emotion as I recount the happy faces of the morning.

Friday. 24. We are suffering for the want of choice school books suited to the capacity of this people. We find books of a poor stamp without adaptation or propriety, and are being tortured with their use, but as we have sent to the "Hub" for books, we are in high expectation of speedy improvement. We find the boys are noisy, active, and playful out of school, and enjoy their recess very much. In school they are generally steady, but being of a playful, cheerful mood, and not being accustomed to school discipline they require to be spoken to, but without resenting it, they try to be quiet till they fill up, and then as the little boy said to his teacher "I did'nt whistle, it whistled itself." The girls are pleasant, intelligent, and always greet you with a smile. They learn quite as quick as the boys, and require to be frequently reminded of the rules of school. They are charming singers. We to-day introduced the tune "Lilly Dale." The school caught it at once, and after a few trials sung it beautifully. This is a very interesting feature of our work. We open in the morning with reading and explaining some familiar Bible story, followed by prayer, at the close of which the school join in repeating the Lord's Prayer. Usually they sing also. Mrs. Child, who has now joined the mission, is peculiarly blessed with the art of teaching. She is delighted with the work, and the children are full of her praise.

Miss Mary Whitney of Westboro, whom Mrs. C invited to accompany her south as an assistant, felt months since a desire to give herself to God and the Freedmen's Work. Mrs. Child having transportation for another, and disliking to come alone without a lady friend, offered it to her, and she after much prayer, decided to come, trusting in the Lord for food and raiment, knowing that in thus coming she had no claim on the Association for support. She is an Adventist, and a sweet spirited sister, a great comfort to Mrs. Child, and will do a good work for the Master. Owing to the number of scholars, we have the boys come in the morning and the girls in the afternoon. This we regret, but must do so until we get more room, for we have enough of either to fill our house. We had the first day 80, the second 105, and an increase every day, and we have not as yet urged any family to send. We are in the midst of a death struggle with slavery and darkness, and shall soon see the following results worked out by the Wonder-working Mind:

1st. Four millions of slaves will spring forth to freedom demanding their sufferage and education.

2d. Six millions of whites, lower than the blacks in education and especially in morals, must be elevated, taught that to work is no disgrace, and by law required to send their children to school.

3d. The whole South must be renovated, and electrified by Yankee enterprise. Free labor, free schools, and a free people must succeed the gaunt, long-haired, suspicious aristocrat. Cattle without number must be brought on to this fertile soil, the manure husbanded, and the exhausted land recovered. The sunny south would then be a Paradise, but not like the one we hope for in the world to come.

The Missionary Horse.

Brooklyn, N. Y., April 2d, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—I have been watching and hearing the knocking on the Lord for that horse for Br. Smith, of Iowa, and have felt for some time that I should like to have a share in the horse or wagon, but some how I have neglected it.

But to-day, when reading your blessed paper, the Herald of Life, (the best paper I ever read in my life,) I saw you stated you had sent $70 to Br. Smith, and that there were $30 more wanting and you meant to "knock on the dear Lord" for it, and it would come. Well you have truly knocked so as to make me hear, at least sufficiently distinct to take one share; though poor, yet I believe it is from the Lord, and may Br. Smith go through the great west and preach "No future life out of Christ;" and we hope we shall hear from him soon again; for the letter we read in this week's paper did us much good. You want short letters, but as this is the first time I have ever written you, bear with me a little. I feel as if I could write a volume; but let me say, that I am doing what I can to honor Jesus and be admitted to the marriage supper of the Lamb. I expect to be THERE: praise the Lord. Now, in my humble way, I have convinced a number of their errors. I believe the idea of the natural immortality of man is the great rock on which many have split. Now let me ask a question or two.

Is man naturally immortal? If so, then Christ cannot give him immortality.

Again. If the man or soul never dies, then Christ cannot raise it or him from the dead. So I think that doctrine robs Christ of the glorious work for which he died on Calvary, and rose from the dead to perform, which was to give man immortality and raise him from the dead. And if we are immortal and never die, it seems to me Christ has died in vain. But, no; glory to God, we are all mortals, and Christ has died to give us immortality. Hallelujah, praise the Lord.

Come brethren, don't forget or postpone a share in Br. Smith's horse; and he must have a wagon, too. Now I have no doubt there are advent brethren who are better able to give hundreds of dollars than I am to give one. Now say, brother, sister, don't you hear that knocking for that horse and wagon? I believe you do; I am sure you do, or else you have not got as good ears as I have. Hark now, one moment! Don't you hear it? Why, how plain I can hear it since I told the Lord I would help a little. Now, then, let us send him the money at once.

Aaron Kimball.

[Note by the Editor.—Br. Kimball is an old Methodist, but has got his heart wide open to the truth. He is one of the "Lord's poor;" but rich in faith and love. His one share in the "Horse Stock Company" is worth more than a hundred in any Oil, Silver, or Gold Stock Company in the world. The shares are most all disposed of, and how good the tidings from Br. Smith will be, from the far west, to those who have taken shares. To accommodate those who may be too late in taking stock in the horse we will let them have a share in the wagon: so do not be afraid to send what the Lord has put it into your heart to send; and do not delay in sending, lest the tempter should get the advantage of you and cheat you out of the blessing.

Will the Lord Heal the Sick?

Springfield, Mass. April 3, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—Feeling under renewed obligations to the Lord for his kind and gracious interposition on my behalf, when prostrated by disease, I feel constrained to say with David, "Come and hear all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul." It is now eight years since I (being very low by a disease which had preyed upon me for five and a half years, it having baffled the skill of some of the most eminent Physicians) was remarkably favored of the Lord by his direct interposition at a time when my hope of recovery was almost gone, as my case was too complicated for any earthly Physician to render me any assistance. I then felt, during my wakefulness one night, while in suffering mentally, as well as physically, that unless the Lord should be pleased to take my case in hand, I must soon be laid away in the cold and silent grave. And strange to tell, beyond anything I ever expected, that very day an opportunity was afforded me to have the prayer of faith offered on my behalf, which prayer proved effectual, and most truly the power of the Lord was present to heal. It seemed as though the windows of heaven were opened, to pour us out a blessing. Our hearts were filled with love, joy, and peace to the Lord, as the healing virtue was infused into my poor feeble frame, creating new strength and vigor in body and mind, so that I could confidently and joyfully testify that the Lord had raised me up, and though I had committed sins, they were forgiven me. I then felt renewedly to consecrate myself to the Lord desiring to subject my will to his in all things.

But such was the weakness of my nature, and liability to become unmindful of my obligations to Him who had done so much for me. I lived far below my privileges, and made some crooked paths, so that since that time I have needed sore chastisements; yet I thank the Lord that his forbearance is still exercised toward me. I am daily seeking for that grace which will enable me to endure chastening, that God may deal with me as his; for what child is it whom the Father doth not chasten?

About five years since, I was again brought low; when, not withstanding every thing was done for my relief and comfort which could be thought of, I was still languishing. The skill of the Physicians failed and I was sensible that unless help was afforded I must soon sink into the arms of death. I then (clinging to life, more especially on behalf of my little ones, who need a mother's care), remembered how the Lord had previourly been pleased to manifest his power in rebuking disease and bid me go free in the name of Jesus. I felt that he had not changed, and as a last resort, I ventured to call on the Elders according to James' exhortation, to present my case before the Lord; and blessed be his name, He did not turn a deaf ear, but graciously helped us to draw near, and take hold, as it were, of the hem of his garment, from which, healing virtue was obtained, so that from that time my bad symyptoms, one after another, left me; and I went forward in the strength of the Lord attending to my domestic duties, in weaknes tis true, at first, but my strength came amazingly fast. From that time, to the present my faith has been unshaken in the promise of God, that the prayer of faith shall save the sick.

The last time I was favored with a marked token of the willingness as well as power of the Lord to arrest the progress of disease, was about six weeks ago, when I again fell under its power and my strength was so reduced, that it was necessary for me to be kept perfectly quiet; and although the disease had assumed a formidable character and was gaining upon me, I could not concede to the wishes of kind friends, to call in the aid of any other Physician than the One whose timely interposition on my behalf had been so effectual on previous occasions, when all other remedies failed. Call on me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me. This we felt was our privilege, and I was willing to risk my life in the hands of the Lord, who mercifully heard the supplications of his servants, who sought unto him on my behalf. And though the tempter strove hard to keep me down in unbelief and dark despair, yet his power was soon broken by the more powerful operation of the Spirit of God, which came upon me (as it were) from above, like a mighty shock, vibrating through my whole being, infusing strength and vitality into every part of my body, at the same time, filling my soul with unexpressable love, joy, and peace constraining me to shout, "Glory to God, the work is done. The Lord is mine and I am His."

I once more arose in the name of the Lord, resuming my household duties gradually, as my strength came, which I found to increase daily; and I can truly say, it is my desire that it may be spent in the service of Him to whom I feel so much indebted for the continuence of this mortal life.

Yesterday, while thinking of the ten lepers whom Christ cleansed, when there was but one, who returned to give glory to God, I thought of what the Lord had done for me and felt prompted to communicate, through the Herald of Life to some of His dear children, who are suffering by disease, yet seem not to realize that it is their privilege to apply to the great Physician, whose word still stands good, that if we ask any thing according to his will, He heareth us, that they may be encouraged to plead the promises of God which are for their benefit, and are all yea, and amen, in Christ Jesus.

I feel thankful for the privilege of being associated with the little flock of Believers in, "No life out Christ," who meet together from time to time to worship God in Rice's Hall. 'Tis true, we don't often have preaching, but the Lord meets with us, and through the power of His Spirit, brings to our minds the soul-cheering, life-giving truths of His precious word; so that we are comforted, instructed and refreshed. Our number is but small, but we are a united company. And though the cause of truth here, has been injured, yet, I believe, if we continue each, at our post, realizing our individual responsibility to do our duty in the fear of God, looking to him for wisdom and counsel to guide us continually, he will in due time move in our midst, and truth will ultimately triumph, and those who are faithful to the truths committed to them, will be abundantly blessed. "They that honor me, I will honor," saith the word. Having had but little preaching for so long, we are prepared to appreciate the services of our Ministering Brethren who may have an opportunity to come this way.

That the great the Head of Church, may so overrule and control matters relating to His own children, open their eyes to see the truth, add their hearts to receive it in the love thereof, that they may be united and made ready for the coming of Him who is so soon toset up his everlasting kingdom, is the prayer of your's, in hope of Life, through His Name.

The War News.

The result is summed up in a few words. The rebel capital, Richmond, Va., and also Petersburg, the key to Richmond, is in the hands of the Federal army, and Gen. Lee, with the broken remnant of his rebel hosts is fleeing as best he can. The details we need not supply to our readers as they will learn all that it is important to know from secular papers before ours will reach them. The rebellion is overthrown, and come to its deserved doom. That there will be more fighting, in some quarters, is to be looked for; but, it is likely, Government will make short work with the remnants of rebels who still carry on their warfare in scattered bands. The bogus "Confederacy" has been effectually broken up, and become a total wreck. The hand of Yahveh (the Deliverer) hath done it: to Him be the glory.

☞ The Sister in R. I. who sent us $3, to be disposed of "in the manner you deem best," is informed, we have applied $1 for the "Missionary Horse;" $1 to the credit of the "widow of a soldier," Mrs. Sarah Vancleave; and $1 to the Knocker's Fund.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE JUBILEE IS COMING.

BY B. MATTHIAS.

The glorious day is coming! Oh, hear creation's call,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming:
Come, rally now to greet it, come, rally, one and all:
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.

CHORUS—'Tis coming! 'tis coming, awake ye awake!
Jesus is coming his kingdom to take:
Then rally round his banner, ye soldiers of the Cross,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.

In trials and afflictions the Christian can rejoice,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.
Though passing down the valley you hear his charming voice,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.

Oh what a joyful morning—what millions there will be,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming;
With prophets, and with martyrs from death's dominion free,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.

And when the morn is breaking sweet voices we shall hear
Shouting the Jubilee is coming!
And we shall know and join them—the dear ones we loved here—
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.

Our sorrows will be over—we're longing for the day,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.
And we will keep on shouting till tears are wiped away,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.

Then let the trumpet voices resound from pole to pole,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming,
Till o'er the land and ocean the pealing echoes roll,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.

King Jesus soon is coming, awake ye saints and sing,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.
Hosanna, hosanna! let hills and valleys ring,
Shouting the Jubilee is coming.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.

What is to be the exact future of the present ruler of France, of course, it is impossible to determine with certainty. It is clear, however, that he aspires to be Ruler of the world. Will he attain to that position? We think not. Like our slaveholding tyrants, his ambition will prove his final overthrow, and he will "go into perdition," being, as we have long believed, the "scarlet colored beast" of Rev. xvii. His past and present career is so well set forth in an article in the New York Herald, of the 31st ult., that we give it entire. It is as follows:

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON AND HIS BLUNDERS.

"Immediately after the coup d' etat, when the Emperor had secured absolute power and was safe in his seat, his seat was the least secure one that any man in his senses ever sat in. His throne trembled with every movement of the nation—with every pulse of its life—and the most trivial circumstance might originate a commotion that would sweep it away. It was necessary that the attention of France should be diverted from the fact that there was once more a French throne; that men should have other food for thought, and another topic for the daily salutation. It was necessary also that this topic should be one of great interest, and the Emperor, simply as a necessity of his own position, plunged France headforemost into the Russian war. Here was a sphere for the national thought and employment for the national power, and, better still, a double gratification to pride and state; for in this war one member of the Holy Alliance was arrayed against another member, and both were humbled almost to the feet of France. The success in that way was grand, though future vengeance was stored away in Russia, and though, through the thin veil of the entente cordiale, the hatred and hostility of England grew fiercer than ever. And the Emperor did all that at the expense of France simply for the sake of his own safety.

"And still he had to go on. It was not safe to be quiet yet. He was a wandering Jew, for whom there was no rest. Once more the blaze of glory was invoked to dazzle the eyes of the French people to their real position. And there was also another temptation. His entente cordiale still kept separate the members of the Holy Alliance. He had humbled Russia and England. Austria came next, and he went into the Italian war. He staid in long enough to accomplish his purpose. But he accomplished more than that. He showed the real weakness of Austria's position, and demonstrated that alliance between that Power and England was impossible, because the British people, though they did not like France, were heart and soul against the Austrian cause. It was another purely Napoleonic triumph at the expense of France. It was a triumph over the Holy Alliance; but it embittered Austria terribly, and it started revolution in Italy. The Emperor did not want that. He wanted to humble Austria, not to help Italy; and while in one month French troops were on the Mincio, ostensibly to lift Italy up, in the next month they were at Rome, very evidently to keep Italy down.

"Each of these wars, though on the surface a success, was in truth a blunder and a failure. Both were blunders, because they unnecessarily reawakened, stimulated and kept alive in the three great Powers of Europe the dynastic hatred and bitterness against the Napoleonic family; and both were failures, because while they wasted France, they did not have the desired effect upon her, and did not give Napoleon any equivalent in France for the hostile spirit he had excited elsewhere. He had to give the nation excitement, employment, glory; but he had to get these on hard terms—like one who mortgages his future for the imperative necessties of to-day. He had hoped that in the face of common enemies France would forget that he was not her friend—but she did not. She was feverish still, and then the Emperor, urged on by his necessities, slipped into the still greater blunder, and gave another mortgage in the Mexican expedition. From this expedition the other European Powers withdrew when they saw its true nature; but Napoleon could not withdraw. He had France behind and only Mexico in front, and he went on, because he dared not stop. And this Mexican expedition arrayed one more great Power in the world—the United States—against the Napoleonic dynasty; and this blunder, insignificant as it may appear, will be the Emperor's Moscow if he does not get out of it very soon.

"Napoleon has thus blundered in his relations with England and Russia and Austria, as well as in relation to the revolutionary spirit of Europe; he has blundered more greatly still in his ruinous entanglement with Mexico. But France, to soothe and pacify which he fell into all these blunders, was not satisfied, and now he has made before France his greatest blunder of all. This is his publication of his life of Cæsar—his announcement, his programme. France was kept quiet by a rigid censorship of the press. But now the Emperor has inadvertently furnished a way by which the people and the press can speak so freely that he might better have abolished the censorship and had the credit for it. He is Cæsar, and straightway all France, while it treats the Emperor's name with the respect exacted by the police, unbottles its wrath against Cæsar—that atrocious Roman, that foe of freedom, that trampler on the rights of others, that believer in fraud and force. And Brutus—what a glorious example of a great and good man! What a friend of his country; a murderer, to be sure—but then he murdered Cæsar. Already a French paper, quoting the Emperor's preface, has printed with it a tirade against Cæsar out of Voltaire. The prefect would have suppressed it; but is there any French ruler strong enough to suppress Voltaire? And thus the Emperor will be beaten over Cæsar's shoulders, and, by this simple means, France will learn a great fact—that is, exactly how strong the hatred of the empire is throughout the country. She must know that to move. And the Emperor has furnished the device that sets free all the voices that will tell the nation how strong it is."

SIGNS IN THE EAST.

The November number of Jewish Intelligence contains some striking facts from a letter of J. Barclay. He says:

"You ask whether there are any palpable symptoms of the events we desire? To this I think it can be replied, without any undue enthusiasm, that symptoms are becoming manifest that Jerusalem is no longer the city after which no man seeks. We see them in the increasing numbers of intelligent and noble visitors, from all parts of the world; we see them in the awakened interest of the nations, embodied in spacious and beautiful buildings, especially in the stupendous pile (including a Cathedral) erected by the Russians on the camp of the Assyrians; we see them in the proposal to connect the Holy City with the other capitals of Europe by the telegraph, which is already finished as far as Jaffa; we see them in the new road about to be constructed from the sea-coast, and in the plan to bring once again water from Solomon's pools, to supply and purify the city; we see them in the great influx of Jews, who have fled from the north coast of Africa, for protection, to the city of their fathers; we see them in the clearing and widening of the streets by the military during the past week, by order of the Sultan; and we see them in the increasing spread of light and knowledge of the truth, amongst the resident Jews."

The Rev. W. Bailey also gives the following:

"Jerusalem, which is generally so quiet at this season, has been all astir this week, in consequence of an order from the Porte that all the streets should be levelled and paved, and that all undue projections in the same should be removed. The order has been executed in true Turkish style, and many a tale of loss and oppression can probably be told by the poor storekeepers and some house-owners; but the improvement to the city, and the public benefit, will be great; we shall now have comparatively, broad and airy streets, where before we could scarcely move. When the work is completed, it will indeed prove an advance in civilized effort, and quite an achievement for Turkey. The Jews are very much concerned about this gathering up the stones and making broad the ways of Jerusalem; they say, 'Now we are certain Messiah's coming is very near.'

"You have, perhaps, heard that there is a telegraph at Jaffa, which connects Egypt with Beyrout. It is now decided, I believe, that a branch line is to be made to this city. I also find it is very probable we shall ere long have a carriage road to Jaffa, as two engineers, one English, the other Turkish, report says, are to arrive here in a few days to make preparation for it. A survey for a railway has already been completed, and a plan sixty feet long, to lay before the Sultan. left here about a month ago. I do not think, however that the time for a railroad in these parts has yet arrived. Jaffa is now undergoing a similar change to Jerusalem; a number of coffee and other unsightly shops, outside the gate on the Jerusalem road, are to be removed, and the land sold, with the condition that it shall be built upon; another gate is also to be made. Our Pasha went three days ago to see that these improvements are properly done. A better landing-place from the sea was nearly completed last week, and it is just possible that ere long a light-house may be built near it. Soon there is to be a light-house on Mount Carmel; and two or three others, it is said, will soon be placed on the Syrian coast. We have now two lines of English steamers touching monthly at Jaffa, in addition to the usual foreign ones, and the French will henceforth come oftener than formerly; thus Jerusalem and the Holy Land will necessarily be brought more than ever into notice. Surely these, and many like changes which are taking place around us, have much meaning in them. I must believe they have.

"On Saturday morning last we had heavy showers of rain, such as only fall in winter. Those who have been in Jerusalem many years, and many Turks who were born here, say they never before saw so much rain at this season. About eight years ago, on the twelfth of this month, a slight shower or two fell, but more than that cannot be remembered."

[This closing paragraph refers to the prophecies contained in Jer. iii. 3, Joel ii. 23, and Zech. x. 1, in connection with the remarkable fact that, after a period of centuries, marked by the entire lack of the rains referred to, they have lately shown symptoms of recurrence, after the old Scriptural order.]

THE "CAGE OF UNCLEAN BIRDS."

Such is Rome at this day. ALVORD, Dean of Cantebury, speaking of the city of Rome says:

"Rome is essentially a pagan city. Her churches, numerous as the days in the year, rise everywhere around you. Bells are continually going; the commemoration of saints and martyrs is endless. Yet with very rare exceptions indeed, the worship of the people in those churches has nothing in common with Christianity. It is not even the one God of Jews and Christians who, as a matter of fact, is adored in them; it is not He whom Christians believe to be God, blessed forever, incarnate in the flesh of man. God has passed out from the practical worship of this people; the Son of God has, as a matter of fact, ceased to be an object of their adoration. The Eternal Father is found in their pictures as an old man, the Divine Saviour as a little child; but both are subservient, and nearly all their worship is subservient to one purpose,—to the glorification of a great goddess, and after her, not of the Father, Son, nor Spirit, but of a host of men and women, made into objects of adoration by themselves, and, whatever may be alleged to the contrary, clothed, as she is pre-eminently clothed, with the incommunicable attributes of the Godhead itself.

"I know I am making strong assertions. But the facts themselves are stronger. I shall have to adduce them somewhat in abundance, by and by. But now I will go on to say more.

"The Jewish Church had fallen far in the time of our Lord's ministry on earth; but the Romish Church has fallen further now. The demon of idolatry had been cast out by the judgment of the captivity. His habitation had been left empty and garnished; and he had returned, not in the same form, but in the worse shape of hypocrisy. In the system of the modern Church of Rome, not only are hypocrisy and lying tolerated and encouraged, but idolatry, gross as that of Ninevah or Greece, and grosser than that of Imperial Rome, has entered and repossessed her people.

"More is yet behind. There is hardly a charge brought by our blessed Lord against the Scribes and Pharisees in St. Matthew xxiii, which does not find examples among the priesthood of modern Rome..... The system, as now laid down, and now practiced, is one of hypocracy, of extortion, of falshood, of cruelty."

THE WIND OF REVOLUTION.

It is very clear to us, if the rebellion in the United States is put down, and peace restrored, it will be the signal for revolutions in Europe, if not throughout others portions of the world. Despots everywhere, almost, have shown their sympathy with the rebel despots in the United States. Why, but because the triumph of an oligarchy here would show the masses in Europe that the few must rule, while the multitudes were born only to serve the purposes of the Nobility? The overthrow of the oligarchy here will be the death knell to all despots, everywhere. So when the storm subsides here, if peace and submission to the Government, throughout the United States, follows, peace will not long remain in Europe: the masses will demand a liberty which they have not enjoyed, but which they see is possible by the triumph of a popular government in this land. Thrones must then crumble—or be "cast down." "The judgment will set" on those seats of oppression; and they must fall. Discerning politicians see the events coming, though they understand not the prophetic significance of the matter. The following item from the N. Y. Herald is noteworthy.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL.—Rumors have been set afloat that the Prince Imperial of France will probably be sent off for an airing in the United States during the coming summer. There may be some truth in these reports, and it may be that the Emperor Napoleon has taken the hint from the hospitalities enjoyed by himself and other members of the Bonaparte family in these States; or from the flattering reception given to the Prince of Wales, from New York to our Western prairies; the Emperor of France may also entertain the idea that the Prince Imperial would be received here as an olive branch in reference to the Emperor of Mexico. At any rate, should the little Prince, represented as a bright, amiable and promising lad, be sent over to this country, he will be well taken care of; and should the empires, thrones and principalities of Europe be thrown into confusion in his absence by the a revoldtionary convulsion, he will be as safe in his American exile as was Louis Napoleon or Louis Philippe.

AN EGYPTIAN RAILROAD.

A Railroad from Cario to Suez takes you in six hours near to the place at which the best authorities have concluded that the children of Israel crossed over. So I have been there and come back in one day; and my stay in the desert was quite long enough. Its utter desolation stands before me as an indelible picture. There is no possibility of forgetting it. Ninety miles' ride out of sight of any green thing or any object of beauty is an experience that need not be repeated; yet it was, for the same miles must be traveled in coming back. Through this desert a railroad runs to connect with the steamships on the Red Sea.

The desert is as level as a western prairie, but what a contrast in every other respect! There a rich soil is watered by timely rains—here no rain, and no soil to be watered. And yet if the same soil was transferred to America, by the action of frosts and rains it would be covered with greenness in a single year, and with a soil in a single generation that would repay cultivation. Little do we appreciate the rich blessing which our winter frosts bring to us in aiding the work of profitable and prolific culture. No rains, no frost, no overflowing of the Nile, and hence there is nothing but pulverized mineral substance in all this wide waste.

The desert is largely covered with fragments of flints—some angular, some rounded, some sharp—from the weight of half an ounce to that of half a pound. This must have made the journey of the children of Israel—barefooted as they were—not a little uncomfortable; and somewhere in Deuteronomy the Divine goodness in preserving them is referred to as an occasion of gratitude: "Neither did thy foot swell these forty years." The forty years were spent between the Red Sea and the Jordan; but the surface there is similar to this, and as the stopping of the train at different points gave me an opportunity to gather a handful or two of flints as a memento of the desert, I could hardly realize how great a mercy it was that Moses called to their memory in these words.

There are a few mud villages along this route, peopled principally by those who are employed in keeping the track clear of sand, and doing other sorts of work on the road. A railroad, even through the desert, carries with it population. But shall I tell you how these rude people live? That would be impossible. I may perhaps approximate to it. Their huts are about ten or twelve feet square—I give the average size—seven feet high, flat roof, or no roof at all. Some straw on the ground constitutes the bed. And in a country where fleas abound, and where the common people seem never to have recovered from the plague spoken of in Exodus viii. 17, where water is so scarce that it seems to be used on neither person nor clothing; and where the sun, and the sand, and lack of washing give half of the men, women, and children blind eyes and sore ones; you can fill out the picture without further aid, as well as if I painted it for you.—F. L.—Is. aelite Indeed.

THE PRAYING SHOEMAKER.

Not many years since there was a poor man in the village where I lived, who, with a family of young children and a wife in very feeble health, found it extremely difficult to obtain a livelihood. He was at length compelled to work by the week, for a shoe dealer in the city, four miles from the village, returning to his family every Saturday evening, and leaving home early on Monday morning.

He usually brought home the avails of his week's labor in provisions for the use of his family during the following week; but one cold and stormy night, in the depth of winter, he went toward his humble dwelling with empty hands, but a full heart. His employer had declared himself unable to pay him a penny that night, and the shoemaker, too honest to incur a debt without knowing that he should be able to cancel it, bent his weary steps homeward, trusting that He who hears the ravens when they cry would fill the mouths of his little family. He knew that he should find a warm house and loving hearts to receive him, but he knew, too, that a disappointment awaited them which would make at least one heart ache. When he entered his cottage, cold and wet with the rain, he saw a bright fire, brighter faces, and a table neatly spread for the anticipated repast. The tea-kettle was sending forth its cloud of steam, all ready for "the cup which cheers, but not inebriates," and a pitcher of milk which had been sent in by a kind neighbor, was waiting for the bread so anxiously expected by the children. The sad father confessed his poverty, and his wife in tears begged him to make some effort to procure food for them before the Sabbath. He replied that he had kind friends in the neighborhood, whom he knew were both able and willing to aid him, and that he would go to them and ask relief. "But first," said he, "let us ask God to give us our daily bread. Prayer avails with God when we ask for temporal good as well as when we implore spiritual blessings." The sorrowing group knelt around the family altar, and while the father was entreating fervently for the mercies they so much needed, a gentle knocking at the door was heard. When the prayer was ended the door was opened, and there stood a woman, in the "peltings of the storm," who had never been at the door before, though she only lived a short distance from it. She had a napkin in her hand, which contained a large loaf of bread, and half apologizing for offering it, said she had unintentionally made "a larger batch of bread" than usual that day, and, though she hardly knew why, she thought it might be acceptable there.

After expressing their sincere gratitude to the woman, the devout shoemaker and his wife gave thanks to God with overflowing hearts. While the little flock were appeasing their hunger with their nice new bread and milk, the father repaired to the house where I was an inmate, and told his artless tale with streaming eyes, and it is unnecessary to say, that he returned to his home that night with a basket heavily laden, and a heart full of gratitude to a prayer-answering God.

THE CHURCH IN THE FAMILY.

We have made a new arrangement for our Sabbath evenings. Instead of our usual prayer meetings, each family is expected to spend an hour, at least, in reading the Scriptures, singing, and prayer; in which it is intended that all should unite. This was the practice in my mother's family; and those Sabbath evening exercises, in which I was expected to unite, even before I hoped I was a Christian, have left a marked influence upon me. I desire, likewise, to enlist our young men and women in a Helper's Society, which shall assist in carrying out this with other plans of Christian labor and usefulness. Sometimes it seems, for a moment, almost a hopeless endeavor, when Christians have so little enthusiasm in the work of their Master; but whenever I am tempted thus, I have only to remember the tender long suffering of a better Shepherd toward me, his wandering sheep. Jonah's children are not all dead. Possibly I may be of his kindred. For if all my gourds do not grow, I some times catch myself inclining towards disappointment. Line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little, this is God's way; and how does his plan glow with wisdom as seen through the glass of human experience.

If the practice above referred to could be adopted in each Christian family in our congregations, would it not add greatly in keeping alive the life of godliness in the soul, and in the household?—Selected.

AFRAID OF THE WAGES.

'I want your boy in my shop,' said a shopkeeper to a poor widow. 'I have had a great deal of trouble with clerks, and now I want your Seth—because I know he is honest.'

The widow was glad, for it was time for Seth to be earning something, and she thought it would be quite a lift in the world, to have him go with Mr. Train; and she knew he would suit Mr. Train, for Seth did well everywhere.

When Seth came home from school, he was almost as much pleased with his good fortune as his mother was. Neither mother or son knew any thing about Mr. Train's store. It was in the lower part of the town, but his family lived near the widow's in fine style. Seth was to go the next Monday morning; and Monday morning he was punctually at his new post.

The week passed away. When he came home to dinner or supper, his mother used to ask him how he liked it. At first he said, 'pretty well,' and then 'he didn't exactly know;' and then, 'not very well;' and Saturday he told his mother plumply, that 'he did not like it at all, and wasn't going to stay.'

'Why Seth,' exclaimed his mother, grieved and mortified at the change, 'are you so difficult to suit as all this comes to? Do you know how important it is to stick to your business? What will Mr. Train say?' 'Mother,' answered the boy, 'the shop is a grog-shop, and I cannot stay there.' The mother's mouth was stopped; indeed, after that she had no wish to have him remain; but she was very sorry the case was so.

When Mr. Train paid the boy Saturday night, Seth told him he could not stay. The shopkeeper was surprised; 'How's this,' said he, 'haven't I done well by you this week?' 'Yes, sir,' answered the boy; 'I never expect io find a kinder master.' 'Do you find fault with the pay?' 'No, sir,' answered Seth, 'it is good pay.' 'Well, what's the difficulty then?' The poor boy hesitated to give his reason. Perhaps the man guessed what it was, for he said, 'Come, come Seth, you won't leave me I know; I'll raise your wages.' 'O, sir,' answered the brave boy respectfully, 'you are very good to me, very good, sir; but I cannot be a dramseller. I am afraid of the wages, for I cannot forget that the Bible says, 'The wages of sin is death.'

Seth left. The man afterwards said it was the greatest sermon he ever had preached to him; and it set him seriously to thinking about giving up the business; but he did not and his own family bore awful witness to the Bible declaration. A few years afterwards he died the miserable death of a drunkard, and within six months his son, in a fit of intoxication, fell into the river and was drowned. Is it not dangerous to tamper with the wages of sin on any terms?—Child's Paper.

"AUNT SALLY'S" FAITH.

"Aunt Sally" was a devout, working, trustful Christian. Her husband was a cripple, almost helpless, an unbeliever, and to some extent an opposer of religion. They lived alone. The severity of a northern winter was upon them, and in spite of her best exertions their stock of fuel was scarcely a day's supply.

"What can be done?" was the anxious inquiry of the unbelieving husband as they were rising from their bed. "The Lord will provide," was "Aunt Sally's" cheerful reply. "I know you always say so, and so it has always proved," was the answer of her unbelieving companion; "but I see no way in which we can be provided for now." "Nor do I," said "Aunt Sally." "But help will come. God will not desert us."

That winter's morning had not passed when their son, who had been a soldier in the Mexican war, entered the door. It had been long since they had heard from him, and they feared he was not alive. The sun went down upon an abundant supply of fuel, cut in the forest by the strong arms of the soldier-boy, and drawn to the door by means of his procuring. The unbelieving husband and father declared he would never be distrustful again.

"Aunt Sally" has long since gone to her rest. But she lived to witness the Christian faith and hope and the peaceful death of her companion, whom she had nursed with devoted care, and for whom, amid many discouragements, she had long and earnestly prayed. She worked, and prayed, and trusted. When we, like her, work and pray, it is our privilege to trust.—Am. Mess.

MY LITTLE SISTER'S GRAVE.

Amid the mountains far away,
Where trees in beauty wave,
And gushing fountains sparkle forth,
Is little Sarah's grave.

They lain her there one dreary day,
When winter winds blew chill,
And icy fetters locked the streams,
And bound the sparkling rill.

I saw her lying cold and still
As though she was asleep;
But when I learned that she was dead,
I turned away to weep.

Her little hands were folded soft
Across her marble breast,
As in the cold, cold, silent grave
They laid her down to rest.

And yet, the hand that plucked the bud,
And bore it hence away,
Had left a sweet smile lingering,
Around those lips of clay.

And when I wept, they said the grief
Of childhood ne'er was deep,
And seemed to think that I for her
Would soon forget to weep.

But when the balmy breath of Spring
Unlocked the sparkling rill,
And wild flowers blossomed in the glen,
And grass grew on the hill—

I wandered through the wildwood bowers,
And culled the blossoms fair;
But ah, the sweetest bud of all
I found not blooming there.

'Twas then I missed the little hand
My own so oft had led
Whilst playing 'mong the fragrant flowers
As time unheeded sped.

Long years have past since that loved one
Was carried to the tomb,
And yet her memory lingers near
To cheer me through the gloom.

Her image still in memory lives,
Enshrined upon my heart,
Nor would I bid that treasure dear,
For one short hour depart.

Then who can tell how pure and deep
Affection's fount may be:
Who knows, how oft the mourners weep
When none but God can see? O. A. P.

Life Believers in New York.

Life only in Christ, is the grandest and most glorious truth ever brought to the ears of mortal man. The friends of this heavenly message, in New York and vicinity, have engaged DODWORTH HALL, 806 Broadway, for meetings on the "first day of the week," for the year to come. Preaching morning and evening, uniformly, every Lord's day, at the usual hours of public services. Seats free.

JOSEPH T. CURRY is expected to preach there each Lord's day during the month of April.

TERMS:—Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar FOR SIX MONTHS; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York city, 48 cents additional. Persons sending five new subscribers, with advance pay, will be entitled to a sixth copy for their services.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, any where out of the United States. Anywhere in the United States, the subscriber may just as well pay the postage at his own Post Office, as to send the amount to us, and subject us to the trouble of doing it here. It is far less trouble to the subscriber than to us, and we must absolutely decline doing it for any within the States. Let this be remembered.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed—

"Geo. Storrs,

NEW YORK."

Where a letter contains business matter and matter for the paper, or for private use, let it be so written that we can separate the two without infringing on either. This is essential to the business of the Office, and let none neglect it.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written with care, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also, in ordering papers sent, the name of the Post Office, County, and State must be given, and written plainly; and if change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

GREEK PHILOSOPHY VS. GOD'S WORD.

Christianity has been so long and so completely held under the influence of Pagan teaching that it appears almost impossible, to superficial thought, that the doctrine of the soul's immortality is false. And yet, those historians who countenance the common belief often throw a gleam of light on the dark picture, and show us that there was a struggle between the ancient Scripture doctrine of man's mortality and its heathen rival ere the latter succeeded in permanently displacing the truth. Neander, in speaking of that bright particular star which, in the first half of the third century, shone with all the radiance that Greek speculative philosophy could emit—we refer to the great Origen—says: "In what high consideration he stood with the churches of these countries [Palestine, Arabia, Phœnicia, and Achaia] is evident from the fact that on every important ecclesiastical question on which it was difficult to come to a decision the opinion of Origen was asked even by synods of bishops. A case of this sort, in which Beryllus, the bishop of Bostra in Arabia, submitted to be taught by him, was noticed on a former occasion. We may here mention another instance: a controversy had been excited by a party among the Arabian Christians asserting that the human soul died with the body, and that, together with the body, it was not to be revived till the resurrection,—an ancient Jewish notion. Perhaps, too, among these tribes, who by their situation were brought into frequent contact with Jews, it was no new doctrine, but one which had prevailed there from ancient times; and perhaps (if indeed the general voice was thus early pronounced against them) it was the influence of Origen,—in whose system the doctrine of the natural immortality of the soul, which is akin to God, held an important place, —that first gained a general reception for the latter doctrine, and caused the small party who still adhered to the old opinion to be regarded as heretical. This explains how the convention of a great synod came to be thought necessary for the purpose of settling these disputes. As they could not come to any agreement, Origen was sent for; and by his arguments the opponents of the soul's natural immortality were brought to confess and to renounce their error." To his parenthetic observation above, —"if indeed the general voice was thus early pronounced against them"—Neander attaches the following note: "Eusebius (l. VI. c. 37) may perhaps judge concerning the controversies of these times too much according to his own subjective views and orthodoxy of his age, when he represents the defenders of this opinion as men generally acknowledged to be teachers of error and propagators of a new doctrine." Neander's Church History, Vol. II. pp. 480, 1.

We thus see how man's faith in the truth of God was gradually weakened and finally overthrown by Greek philosophers. Origen, who seems to have had the honor of striking the final blow, held a great many absurd ideas, all growing out of the serpent's lie, the most foolish and hurtful of which was his doctrine of the soul's pre-existence in a higher state from which it feel into its present condition. This doctrine is held by Dr. Edward Beecher as the only solution of the doctrine of endless misery. When will men throw aside fable and step on to the broad platform of the Scriptures. Man is mortal, but life and immortality have been offered in Christ Jesus, who is the resurrection and the life. Praise YAHVEH!

NO RESURRECTION: NO FUTURE LIFE.

BY THOMAS READ.

In accordance with the too common belief, the resurrection sinks into a small matter. For if all the saints entered into their happiness at death, what matters it whether in the body or out of the body? And if our souls are so much higher in the grade of being than our bodily organization, why clog our spiritual natures, with the grosser material form, impeding their motions, and diminishing their powers? And which will not, according to the prevalent belief, add to their glory or their happiness. If the common theory were true, it would not be a resurrection of the dead at all; but a reunion of the living soul; containing all the essential characteristics of the man; his moral powers, his knowledge, his emotions; which have never died! with the re-made body. Reunion would seem to be the more appropriate name. For if man's higher nature never died; man, the whole man, could not be raised again from the dead. Who has not heard the phrase—"the soul and body shall be reunited," used instead of the scriptural phrase, that "the dead shall rise again"? But if immortality be only in Christ Jesus; and if Jesus Christ is the resurrection and the life; then is the resurrection of the dead the most important doctrine of the Bible, and it assumes that pre-eminence that Jesus Christ and Paul ascribe to it when they make our whole future existence to depend upon it. Without it, the very purpose for which God made the world, and introduced the mediatorial system, to purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works, and to establish an everlasting kingdom wherein dwelleth righteousness, where Christ should sit upon the throne of his father David, would be entirely frustrated; Christ would have died in vain; the devil would have triumphed; and death would have gotten a complete victory; establishing a universal and everlasting dominion over the sons of men. But it is not so; Christ has burst the bars of death, risen triumphantly into heaven, and in Christ shall all be made alive. Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory over death, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Death is swallowed up in victory.

This is Paul's opinion; for making the resurrection of Christ a pledge of our resurrection, he says: 1 Cor. xv. 16, 18—"If the dead rise not....then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Their faith was vain, the penalty of sin, which is death, the entire cessation of life and consciousness, has consigned them to everlasting nothingness; they are irretrievably perished. Again he says, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. Of what advantage are my sufferings and conflicts....if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." V. 23. Therefore (because there is a resurrection of the dead) be ye steadfast....forasmuch as ye know your labor is not in vain in the Lord. V. 58.

Now, if we believe that Paul was inspired when he wrote this, then is there no intermediate state of consciousness, and the soul is not naturally immortal. There is no possibility of evading these conclusions, but by denying the inspiration of the scriptures. Again Paul says—

Rom. viii. 23.—"Waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body....when we shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God." Paul was already a child of God, by faith, but he had to submit to the bondage of corruption in the grave, not his body merely, but himself, therefore he waited for a fuller manifestation of the sons of God, and the glory that shall there be revealed. When? At the redemption of his body, when Christ should quicken, or enliven his mortal body; that is, at the resurrection of the dead.

THE SAINTS DID NOT EXPECT THEIR REWARD TILL THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Rev. xi. 15, 18. The seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever ....And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou should give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great.

1 Pet. i. 3, 4, 13. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, (or hope of life) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you....ready to be revealed in the last time. Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

Peter then did not expect the reward till the resurrection of the dead.

Phil. iii. 8, 9, 11. I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things....that I may win Christ, and be found in him....having the righteousness which is through the faith of Christ....if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead.

Then Paul did not look for his reward until his mortal body should put on immortality.

2 Tim. iv. 8. I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteusness, which the Lord the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only but unto all them that love his appearing.

Titus ii. 12, 13. We should live soberly ....looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

These passages all prove that the reward was not to be expected till the Resurrection. Christ says, "I am the resurrection and the life." Resurrection and life are co-existent, and inseparable. If no resurrection, no future life. Luke xviii. 30. Those who had forsaken all for God's sake, should receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come, life everlasting.

1 Cor. i. 7, 8. Paul thanks God for the spiritual gifts of his Corinthian brethren, and says they are "waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Again; 1 Thess. ii. 19. For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?

If these Thessalonians would be in the presence of Christ before his coming, would Paul have waited till the coming of Christ before he began to rejoice? Verily, nay.

1 Thess. iii. 12, 13. The Lord make you ....to abound in love:....to the end he may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, with all his saints. 1 Thess. v. 23. "I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

As at death we end our probationary state, if Paul believed they entered into the promised reward, or any part of it immediately after death, it would have been enough for Paul to have prayed for them to be preserved to that period, as that would have sealed their everlasting destiny. But as Paul did not believe it, he very consistently prayed that they might be preserved blameless till the resurrection.

1 Thess iv. 13, 17. "I would not have you be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent (anticipate) them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words."

Here Paul, in the most solemn manner, declares by the word of the Lord, by express revelation, the living at the time of Christ's coming, should arise, should meet Jesus just after the saints who were asleep had awoke to consciousness, and all at one time to meet together and continue always with Christ, and then know for the first time, after finishing their course with joy, the eternal fiat securing their eternal inheritance.

"Wherefore comfort one another with these words?" By what words? That immediately upon death your souls will go to heaven? No, no. But comfort the friends of the dead with the assurance that "the dead shall rise again."

1 Pet. iii. 12, 14. "Seeing then....that the elements shall melt with fervent heat.... what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God,....be dilligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless ....when the heavens shall be dissolved." Can I make this plainer? I leave it in almost the very words of revelation, only leaving out the extraneous parts to show the connexion.

1 John ii. 28. And now, little children, abide in him that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming. 1 John iii. 2; We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is.

In all these texts, the time of the rejoicing of the saints is expressly declared to be at the coming of Christ. There is not the slightest allusion to an intermediate state of consciousness. All the expressions employed most clearly prove that the apostles believed in no such state of conscious enjoyment.

POPULAR ASSUMPTIONS AND BRIEF REPLIES.

1. It is asserted that thought is not a property of matter. If this means a table, a stone and an apple cannot think, we find no fault with the statement; but if means that animalized LIVING matter, for instance brain, cannot evolve mental phenomena, we ask the proof. Has the Creator said so? Is it a self-evident proposition that Omnipotence cannot cause animalized and organized living matter to judge, reason, love, and hate? When it is demonstrated that this is impossible, and, that it is impossible, nothing less than the testimony of God himself can be accepted as final proof, it will be time to pass on in quest of a second cause to explain the existing results, both, we may say, in relation to man and the lower animals. The philosophic rule of Sir Isaac Newton, in obeying which he made his grand physical discoveries, is most applicable here, "When one cause is sufficient to account for an effect, no more are to be admitted."

To all appearance, judging from the development of brain, and the corresponding mental functions and results,—from the facts of madness, either complete or partial,—from idiocy, and from the suspension of consciousness by pressure on the brain, and many other circumstances,—we say, judging from all these, there appears to be ground, broad and firm, for the conclusion to rise upon, that thought, passion, desire, and the like, as naturally proceed from matter when it assumes the form of brain, as perfume arises from it when it exists in the form of a rose, or galvanism when it coheres in the form and subject to the arrangements of the battery. To all appearance this is the case, and, since it is the product of Heaven's power, it must be an infinitely wise ordination, and on our part it is the office of piety to acknowledge the device of his wonder-working hands.

In asserting that brain thinks, &c., in man and in the lower tribes, we do not wish to be misunderstood, for, strictly speaking, it is not the brain of a man, but rather the living being man himself, that thinks and wills by his brain. A brain by itself, that is, disjoined from the human system of which it is only a part, cannot act in this way, any more than feet can walk, or lungs breathe, or ears hear, or a stomach digest; but if we rightly consider we will discover, as already suggested, that the proper view of the matter is this, that it is the creature man who walks by his feet, breathes by his lungs, &c.; and the being man is a compound of these organs, with many more, capable of executing the various mechanical, physiological, mental or cerebral functions, peculiar to his order of animated existence.

2. We are told man's spirit thinks. We answer, it is quite an assumption that he has a spirit such as he is supposed to possess; it is another that a spirit must be a living substance, and that, if even alive, thought must be among its attributes. Who, with an authority that we may not wisely and virtuously question, declares that man's spirit thinks, and wills, and desires? When will the distinction be drawn between a man and the spirit of a man?—between the life-giving breath and the Breather?

3. It is asserted that the man and his outward materal parts are entirely different, as may be detected in the phraseology, my hands, my feet, my head, my eyes, &c.; the "my," it is affirmed, is the spirit on its throne within owning these as its organs or members, and this spirit is alone worthy of being called the the man. Well, if this reasoning is solid, what originates the my, or what is it that says my, in the expressions "my soul, my spirit?" If the "my hands," for instance, prove these members do not essentially belong to the human being, but are, as it were, accidentally conjoined with him in the meantime, then the my soul and my spirit prove the same as to the popular soul and spirit; and if a man is not a corporeal agent, nor a spirit, what is he? Every orthodox believer in the common doctrine about the human spirit, uses parallel phraseology to that on which such stress is fallaciously placed, when he speaks, as every one must do, of his reason, his will, his imagination, his desire. How very absurd to demand, is there a being different from this reason, will, imagination, and desire, who yet owns them all, and employs them to gain his ends? If the evidence is good in the first case, it is equally powerful in the second. A little reflection, we respectfully submit, would convince most persons of the language we have presented being just that of a human agent announcing property in his own members, parts, faculties, and in himself. If we say my hands, we also say my-self, and the being who underlies the my is the same being who underlies and originates the self. It is in fact a self claiming property in a self—a man declaring himself to belong to himself. The divine being is an absolute unity, yet he says "my soul," and is not the soul of God, just, the Eternal himself? When he uses the words "my soul" the phraseology is equal to I, as is detectable in the verse, "my soul," or I, "shall have no pleasure in him."

4. Men, it is again affirmed, will live for ever because they are spirits. Who has not heard the language, "a spirit cannot die?" Now we beg to answer, that the Bible no where declares man to be a spirit, and the same book never asserts that a spirit must live for ever. Angels are spirits, and who would suspend their duration on the order, or kind of being conferred on them, and not on the will, and power, and promise of the Supreme.

5. "Men are in the image of God, and therefore they must be spirits." Where is this laid down in the Book, from which, of course, it is professedly derived? So far from God making man a spirit, when he produced him in his image, the Record instructs us, he was formed of the "dust of the ground." Gen. ii. 7, iii. 19. As all Bible students know, we are never expressly informed in what this image consisted, and to assume that it was in the point of spirit, or, what is no less common in that of immortality, is to do what the whole volume palpably condemns. Man is of dust, and was at the very first merely a candidate for an eternity of being, as may be easily discovered by an unprejudiced examination of the arrangements in Eden, and the trial to which our first parents were subjected there. The language "image of God," in which man as man is still found (James iii. 9, 1 Cor. xi. 7), seems to have a primary special reference to the dominion which was to be exercised by him over the interior tribes, like that which the Everlasting maintains in the boundless universe, for so soon as it is said, "let us make man in our image," it is added "and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air," &c. Gen. i. 26.

But whatever it may consist in, or however numerous may be its elements, it is demonstrable that it describes man not as a spirit, for he only has a spirit, being himself of the dust entirely; moreover it cannot lawfully be understood to intimate that he is immortal, since he has never been any thing else, in all the dispensations under which he has been placed, than a candidate for eternal life. One simple statement of what man is, and the position he occupies in the universe, is worth a thousand inferences drawn from the words "image of God," or a thousand conjectures as to what their meaning may be. Such direct intimations are abundant in the Volume, and they are to teach us in interpreting "image of God," what its import cannot be: patience and application may enable us to acquire a satisfactory apprehension of its signification.

M.

MAY WE RECEIVE THE HOLY SPIRIT?

Were it not that some take the ground that there is no Spirit but the word, I should not perhaps trouble you with these few lines. I look upon such brethren not as being destitute of God's Holy Spirit, but holding an error on that point; they do not appreciate the great blessing they ought to enjoy, besides being better fitted to do the will of the Master; and they grieve the Holy Spirit whereby they are sealed unto the day of redemption.

To our Lord Jesus Christ the Holy Spirit was given without measure. Thus Isaiah says when speaking of Christ, "And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding; the spirit of counsel and might; the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord; and shall make him of quick understanding, and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears."

Now if our Father in heaven saw it necessary and proper to shower down such an abundandance of his Holy Spirit upon our Lord, to sustain, and enable him to do his Father's work; to give him understanding, to give him counsel and might and wisdom, (for Jesus himself testifieth, "Of mine own self I can do nothing"), is it not reasonable to expect that he will do as much at least as to give his church a portion of that heavenly influence? Are we to be laborers with Christ in the work of saving sinners? Are we to be the salt of the earth, a city on an hill, the light of the world, with nothing but the word? Let us see what saith Jesus. "The great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." How is that? Drink what? Why, drink by virtue of faith on the Son of God. Read the next verse. "He that believeth on me as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." Bless the Lord, our Messiah, for such words as these. "This spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive."

Should this meet the eye of any poor starving, thirty souls, to them I want to say, Come to the great fountain of life, and drink. Believe on the Lord of glory, and drink. Take the cup at the hand of the Lord, and drink of the well of salvation. What says Jesus? "Whosoever drinketh [mark the expression] of the water that I shall give him, the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." The promise comes from one who spake as never man spake. He speaks in wisdom. He speaks in understanding. He speaks in the knowledge of God. Sinner, where are you traveling? Take the Bible. Sit down now and turn to John iv., and read to the 16th verse. Ponder it well, and if you are thirsty you will find a well deeper than Jacob's, and nothing to draw with. But if you ask of Jesus, he will give you living water,—water of life, and you may continue to drink until you press your way into the kingdom of heaven. "He that hath ears to hear let him hear." Oh for ears to hear in these days of apostasy! Oh that more of the blessed Holy Spirit of God might be poured out upon the church and ministry! that they might lift up their voice like a trumpet, cry aloud and spare not, but show the people their sins.

Do any say that the Holy Spirit was only for the apostles' days? But the apostle's declaration is good for all time, when he says, "They that do follow after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh, but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit." So then he adds, "They that are in the flesh cannot please God." Again. "Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his; for as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God." Again, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God." Likewise he says, "The Spirit helpeth our infirmities; for we know not what to pray for as we ought, but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered." Again. "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh."

Now this is wholesale language, and cannot be narrowed down to the limits of the days of the apostles only, but reaches to the end of this age. For, says Peter, "The promise is to you and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." What is that which is promised to us and our children and all that the Lord our God shall call? I answer, it is the promise that he will pour out his Holy Spirit on us and our children, and all that are afar off, and reaches to the time when the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come.

But I will not prolong this article. Enough has been said. We are in the rocks and quicksands of the last days. Lord, give us thy Spirit to guide us to the end. Men, women and children are going out of life, and no hope beyond the grave. Scarcely any one speaks to them of the Lord of glory, our LIFE-GIVER. They need instruction, the kind word, the friendly hand, the name of Christ spoken in the spirit of Jesus. The doom of the ungodly, the sleep that never awakes, the blotting out of existence, should be brought to bear upon their minds. Then the contrast, the turning to the Lord, the Holy Ghost, his work on the heart, the promised life, beyond the grave, the inheritance, etc. Let us talk to our neighbors and friends whom we meet every day. Are we doing our duty to those around us? should be the question of us all. Oh that the Lord would pour out his Spirit abundantly before the harvest is past, the summer ended, and our friends and children not saved.

EXPECT SUCCESS.

He that expects success is on the high road to it. He that desponds and doubts is already overcome. Such is the voice alike of phylosophy and history. Faith in the spiritual, confidence in the natural, are the very soul of victory. He that would achieve any great triumph in either sphere must go to the conflict, looking for success.

This fact may be illustrated by an infinite variety of examples in various fields of human effort. In none is it more conspicuous than in those contests among men in which everything would seem to depend on mere physicial force—the contests of war. There have been, from age to age, leaders who have had the power of inspiring their followers with an undoubting expectation of success. The history of such leaders is a record of victories—of victories obtained not by a superiority of physicial force, though the contests were purely physicial, but of victories achieved by the few over the many by the power of a confident expectation of triumph. Thus was it with Alexander of Macedon. Thus was it with Cæsar of Rome, and with the great Napoleon of France; and thus has it been with all eminent conquerers. Their followers regardless of inequality in numbers rushed to battle with an unwavering confidence that was in itself victory.

Why is it that in the spiritual warfare now waged by us for Christ and his kingdom, so little is accomplished? Why are our victories so few, our spoils so meagre? Is it not because we are not looking for success? Is it not because a listless, hopeless, spiritless inactivity, a very negation of bold expectancy, has become our customary mood, almost our nature? We expect nothing, and we get what we expect. We venture nothing, and make nothing. Like the pitiful sluggard and coward of the parable, we bury our talent, lest if exposed to risk it bring us no gain, and then congratulate ourselves that we hold our own.

Early in the present century, when evangelical religion in Eastern Massachusetts was all undermined, and many churches had forsaken the old paths, two Baptist churches in Boston sustained a united prayer-meeting. This meeting dwindled and thinned, and congealed in spirit, until it became a question whether it had not better be discontinued. A meeting was held to consider the question of its suspension. Its supporters had grown almost hopeless of success, and were ready to yield their ground and retire from the conflict. It was urged that it was vain to maintain the form of godliness, when the reality was wanting. At this juncture, an aged negro woman, once a slave in Carolina, arose, and looking the reverend speaker in the face inquired, "Is God dead?" She alone of the faithful few assembled there retained her courage and her hopefulness. Confident of victory in the end, she was prepared for no surrender or retreat; and why? Her eye was fixed with an unwavering faith on her invincible leader—God was not dead! The words of that humble negro servant to rally and re-inspirit the little band of fainting disciples, for they were pointed to Him whose banner ever waves to victory. Melted and stimulated, they went

GREEK PHILOSOPHY VS. GOD'S WORD.

Christianity has been so long and so completely held under the influence of Pagan teaching that it appears almost impossible, to superficial thought, that the doctrine of the soul's immortality is false. And yet, those historians who countenance the common belief often throw a gleam of light on the dark picture, and show us that there was a struggle between the ancient Scripture doctrine of man's mortality and its heathen rival ere the latter succeeded in permanently displacing the truth. Neander, in speaking of that bright particular star which, in the first half of the third century, shone with all the radiance that Greek speculative philosophy could emit—we refer to the great Origen—says: "In what high consideration he stood with the churches of these countries [Palestine, Arabia, Phœnicia, and Achaia] is evident from the fact that on every important ecclesiastical question on which it was difficult to come to a decision the opinion of Origen was asked even by synods of bishops. A case of this sort, in which Beryllus, the bishop of Bostra in Arabia, submitted to be taught by him, was noticed on a former occasion. We may here mention another instance: a controversy had been excited by a party among the Arabian Christians asserting that the human soul died with the body, and that, together with the body, it was not to be revived till the resurrection,—an ancient Jewish notion. Perhaps, too, among these tribes, who by their situation were brought into frequent contact with Jews, it was no new doctrine, but one which had prevailed there from ancient times; and perhaps (if indeed the general voice was thus early pronounced against them) it was the influence of Origen,—in whose system the doctrine of the natural immortality of the soul, which is akin to God, held an important place,—that first gained a general reception for the latter doctrine, and caused the small party who still adhered to the old opinion to be regarded as heretical. This explains how the convention of a great synod came to be thought necessary for the purpose of settling these disputes. As they could not come to any agreement, Origen was sent for; and by his arguments the opponents of the soul's natural immortality were brought to confess and to renounce their error." To his parenthetic observation above,—"if indeed the general voice was thus early pronounced against them"—Neander attaches the following note: "Eusebius (l. VI. c. 37) may perhaps judge concerning the controversies of these times too much according to his own subjective views and orthodoxy of his age, when he represents the defenders of this opinion as men generally acknowledged to be teachers of error and propagators of a new doctrine." Neander's Church History, Vol. II. pp. 480, 1.

We thus see how man's faith in the truth of God was gradually weakened and finally overthrown by Greek philosophers. Origen, who seems to have had the honor of striking the final blow, held a great many absurd ideas, all growing out of the serpent's lie, the most foolish and hurtful of which was his doctrine of the soul's pre-existence in a higher state from which it feel into its present condition. This doctrine is held by Dr. Edward Beecher as the only solution of the doctrine of endless misery. When will men throw aside fable and step on to the broad platform of the Scriptures. Man is mortal, but life and immortality have been offered in Christ Jesus, who is the resurrection and the life. Praise Yahveh!

NO RESURRECTION: NO FUTURE LIFE.

BY THOMAS READ.

In accordance with the too common belief, the resurrection sinks into a small matter. For if all the saints entered into their happiness at death, what matters it whether in the body or out of the body? And if our souls are so much higher in the grade of being than our bodily organization, why clog our spiritual natures, with the grosser material form, impeding their motions, and diminishing their powers? And which will not, according to the prevalent belief, add to their glory or their happiness. If the common theory were true, it would not be a resurrection of the dead at all; but a reunion of the living soul; containing all the essential characteristics of the man; his moral powers, his knowledge, his emotions; which have never died! with the re-made body. Reunion would seem to be the more appropriate name. For if man's higher nature never died; man, the whole man, could not be raised again from the dead. Who has not heard the phrase—"the soul and body shall be reunited," used instead of the scriptural phrase, that "the dead shall rise again"? But if immortality be only in Christ Jesus; and if Jesus Christ is the resurrection and the life; then is the resurrection of the dead the most important doctrine of the Bible, and it assumes that pre-eminence that Jesus Christ and Paul ascribe to it when they make our whole future existence to depend upon it. Without it, the very purpose for which God made the world, and introduced the mediatorial system, to purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works, and to establish an everlasting kingdom wherein dwelleth righteousness, where Christ should sit upon the throne of his father David, would be entirely frustrated; Christ would have died in vain; the devil would have triumphed; and death would have gotten a complete victory; establishing a universal and everlasting dominion over the sons of men. But it is not so; Christ has burst the bars of death, risen triumphantly into heaven, and in Christ shall all be made alive. Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory over death, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Death is swallowed up in victory.

This is Paul's opinion; for making the resurrection of Christ a pledge of our resurrection, he says: 1 Cor. xv. 16, 18—"If the dead rise not....then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Their faith was vain, the penalty of sin, which is death, the entire cessation of life and consciousness, has consigned them to everlasting nothingness; they are irretrievably perished. Again he says, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. Of what advantage are my sufferings and conflicts....if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." V. 23. Therefore (because there is a resurrection of the dead) be ye steadfast....forasmuch as ye know your labor is not in vain in the Lord. V. 58.

Now, if we believe that Paul was inspired when he wrote this, then is there no intermediate state of consciousness, and the soul is not naturally immortal. There is no possibility of evading these conclusions, but by denying the inspiration of the scriptures. Again Paul says—

Rom. viii. 23.—"Waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body....when we shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God." Paul was already a child of God, by faith, but he had to submit to the bondage of corruption in the grave, not his body merely, but himself, therefore he waited for a fuller manifestation of the sons of God, and the glory that shall there be revealed. When? At the redemption of his body, when Christ should quicken, or enliven his mortal body; that is, at the resurrection of the dead.

Rev. xi. 15, 18. The seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever ....And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou should give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great.

1 Pet. i. 3, 4, 13. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, (or hope of life) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you....ready to be revealed in the last time. Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

Peter then did not expect the reward till the resurrection of the dead.

Phil. iii. 8, 9, 11. I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things....that I may win Christ, and be found in him....having the righteousness which is through the faith of Christ....if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead.

2 Tim. iv. 8. I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteusness, which the Lord the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only but unto all them that love his appearing.

Titus ii. 12, 13. We should live soberly ....looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

These passages all prove that the reward was not to be expected till the Resurrection. Christ says, "I am the resurrection and the life." Resurrection and life are co-existent, and inseparable. If no resurrection, no future life. Luke xviii. 30. Those who had forsaken all for God's sake, should receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come, life everlasting.

1 Cor. i. 7, 8. Paul thanks God for the spiritual gifts of his Corinthian brethren, and says they are "waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Again; 1 Thess. ii. 19. For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?

If these Thessalonians would be in the presence of Christ before his coming, would Paul have waited till the coming of Christ before he began to rejoice? Verily, nay.

1 Thess. iii. 12, 13. The Lord make you ....to abound in love:....to the end he may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, with all his saints. 1 Thess. v. 23. "I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

As at death we end our probationary state, if Paul believed they entered into the promised reward, or any part of it immediately after death, it would have been enough for Paul to have prayed for them to be preserved to that period, as that would have sealed their everlasting destiny. But as Paul did not believe it, he very consistently prayed that they might be preserved blameless till the resurrection.

1 Thess iv. 13, 17. "I would not have you be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent (anticipate) them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words."

Here Paul, in the most solemn manner, declares by the word of the Lord, by express revelation, the living at the time of Christ's coming, should arise, should meet Jesus just after the saints who were asleep had awoke to consciousness, and all at one time to meet together and continue always with Christ, and then know for the first time, after finishing their course with joy, the eternal fiat securing their eternal inheritance.

"Wherefore comfort one another with these words?" By what words? That immediately upon death your souls will go to heaven? No, no. But comfort the friends of the dead with the assurance that "the dead shall rise again."

1 Pet. iii. 12, 14. "Seeing then....that the elements shall melt with fervent heat.... what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God,....be dilligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless ....when the heavens shall be dissolved." Can I make this plainer? I leave it in almost the very words of revelation, only leaving out the extraneous parts to show the connexion.

1 John ii. 28. And now, little children, abide in him that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming. 1 John iii. 2; We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is.

In all these texts, the time of the rejoicing of the saints is expressly declared to be at the coming of Christ. There is not the slightest allusion to an intermediate state of consciousness. All the expressions employed most clearly prove that the apostles believed in no such state of conscious enjoyment.

POPULAR ASSUMPTIONS AND BRIEF REPLIES.

1. It is asserted that thought is not a property of matter. If this means a table, a stone and an apple cannot think, we find no fault with the statement; but if means that animalized LIVING matter, for instance brain, cannot evolve mental phenomena, we ask the proof. Has the Creator said so? Is it a self-evident proposition that Omnipotence cannot cause animalized and organized living matter to judge, reason, love, and hate? When it is demonstrated that this is impossible, and, that it is impossible, nothing less than the testimony of God himself can be accepted as final proof, it will be time to pass on in quest of a second cause to explain the existing results, both, we may say, in relation to man and the lower animals. The philosophic rule of Sir Isaac Newton, in obeying which he made his grand physical discoveries, is most applicable here, "When one cause is sufficient to account for an effect, no more are to be admitted."

To all appearance, judging from the development of brain, and the corresponding mental functions and results,—from the facts of madness, either complete or partial,—from idiotcy, and from the suspension of consciousness by pressure on the brain, and many other circumstances,—we say, judging from all these, there appears to be ground, broad and firm, for the conclusion to rise upon, that thought, passion, desire, and the like, as naturally proceed from matter when it assumes the form of brain, as perfume arises from it when it exists in the form of a rose, or galvanism when it coheres in the form and subject to the arrangements of the battery. To all appearance this is the case, and, since it is the product of Heaven's power, it must be an infinitely wise ordination, and on our part it is the office of piety to acknowledge the device of his wonder-working hands.

In asserting that brain thinks, &c., in man and in the lower tribes, we do not wish to be misunderstood, for, strictly speaking, it is not the brain of a man, but rather the living being man himself, that thinks and wills by his brain. A brain by itself, that is, disjoined from the human system of which it is only a part, cannot act in this way, any more than feet can walk, or lungs breathe, or ears hear, or a stomach digest; but if we rightly consider we will discover, as already suggested, that the proper view of the matter is this, that it is the creature man who walks by his feet, breathes by his lungs, &c.; and the being man is a compound of these organs, with many more, capable of executing the various mechanical, physiological, mental or cerebral functions, peculiar to his order of animated existence.

2. We are told man's spirit thinks. We answer, it is quite an assumption that he has a spirit such as he is supposed to possess; it is another that a spirit must be a living substance, and that, if even alive, thought must be among its attributes. Who, with an authority that we may not wisely and virtuously question, declares that man's spirit thinks, and wills, and desires? When will the distinction be drawn between a man and the spirit of a man?—between the life-giving breath and the Breather?

3. It is asserted that the man and his outward materal parts are entirely different, as may be detected in the phraseology, my hands, my feet, my head, my eyes, &c.; the "my," it is affirmed, is the spirit on its throne within owning these as its organs or members, and this spirit is alone worthy of being called the the man. Well, if this reasoning is solid, what originates the my, or what is it that says my, in the expressions "my soul, my spirit?" If the "my hands," for instance, prove these members do not essentially belong to the human being, but are, as it were, accidentally conjoined with him in the meantime, then the my soul and my spirit prove the same as to the popular soul and spirit; and if a man is not a corporeal agent, nor a spirit, what is he? Every orthodox believer in the common doctrine about the human spirit, uses parallel phraseology to that on which such stress is fallaciously placed, when he speaks, as every one must do, of his reason, his will, his imagination, his desire. How very absurd to demand, is there a being different from this reason, will, imagination, and desire, who yet owns them all, and employs them to gain his ends? If the evidence is good in the first case, it is equally powerful in the second. A little reflection, we respectfully submit, would convince most persons of the language we have presented being just that of a human agent announcing property in his own members, parts, faculties, and in himself. If we say my hands, we also say my-self, and the being who underlies the my is the same being who underlies and originates the self. It is in fact a self claiming property in a self—a man declaring himself to belong to himself. The divine being is an absolute unity, yet he says "my soul," and is not the soul of God, just, the Eternal himself? When he uses the words "my soul" the phraseology is equal to I, as is detectable in the verse, "my soul," or I, "shall have no pleasure in him."

4. Men, it is again affirmed, will live for ever because they are spirits. Who has not heard the language, "a spirit cannot die?" Now we beg to answer, that the Bible no where declares man to be a spirit, and the same book never asserts that a spirit must live for ever. Angels are spirits, and who would suspend their duration on the order, or kind of being conferred on them, and not on the will, and power, and promise of the Supreme.

5. "Men are in the image of God, and therefore they must be spirits." Where is this laid down in the Book, from which, of course, it is professedly derived? So far from God making man a spirit, when he produced him in his image, the Record instructs us, he was formed of the "dust of the ground." Gen. ii. 7, iii. 19. As all Bible students know, we are never expressly informed in what this image consisted, and to assume that it was in the point of spirit, or, what is no less common in that of immortality, is to do what the whole volume palpably condemns. Man is of dust, and was at the very first merely a candidate for an eternity of being, as may be easily discovered by an unprejudiced examination of the arrangements in Eden, and the trial to which our first parents were subjected there. The language "image of God," in which man as man is still found (James iii. 9, 1 Cor. xi. 7), seems to have a primary special reference to the dominion which was to be exercised by him over the inferior tribes, like that which the Everlasting maintains in the boundless universe, for so soon as it is said, "let us make man in our image," it is added "and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air," &c. Gen. i. 26.

But whatever it may consist in, or however numerous may be its elements, it is demonstrable that it describes man not as a spirit, for he only has a spirit, being himself of the dust entirely; moreover it cannot lawfully be understood to intimate that he is immortal, since he has never been any thing else, in all the dispensations under which he has been placed, than a candidate for eternal life. One simple statement of what man is, and the position he occupies in the universe, is worth a thousand inferences drawn from the words "image of God," or a thousand conjectures as to what their meaning may be. Such direct intimations are abundant in the Volume, and they are to teach us in interpreting "image of God," what its import cannot be: patience and application may enable us to acquire a satisfactory apprehension of its signification.

MAY WE RECEIVE THE HOLY SPIRIT?

Were it not that some take the ground that there is no Spirit but the word, I should not perhaps trouble you with these few lines. I look upon such brethren not as being destitute of God's Holy Spirit, but holding an error on that point; they do not appreciate the great blessing they ought to enjoy, besides being better fitted to do the will of the Master; and they grieve the Holy Spirit whereby they are sealed unto the day of redemption.

To our Lord Jesus Christ the Holy Spirit was given without measure. Thus Isaiah says when speaking of Christ, "And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding; the spirit of counsel and might; the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord; and shall make him of quick understanding, and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears."

Now if our Father in heaven saw it necessary and proper to shower down such an abundandance of his Holy Spirit upon our Lord, to sustain, and enable him to do his Father's work; to give him understanding, to give him counsel and might and wisdom, (for Jesus himself testifieth, "Of mine own self I can do nothing"), is it not reasonable to expect that he will do as much at least as to give his church a portion of that heavenly influence? Are we to be laborers with Christ in the work of saving sinners? Are we to be the salt of the earth, a city on an hill, the light of the world, with nothing but the word? Let us see what saith Jesus. "The great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." How is that? Drink what? Why, drink by virtue of faith on the Son of God. Read the next verse. "He that believeth on me as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." Bless the Lord, our Messiah, for such words as these. "This spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive."

Should this meet the eye of any poor starving, thirty souls, to them I want to say, Come to the great fountain of life, and drink. Believe on the Lord of glory, and drink. Take the cup at the hand of the Lord, and drink of the well of salvation. What says Jesus? "Whosoever drinketh [mark the expression] of the water that I shall give him, the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." The promise comes from one who spake as never man spake. He speaks in wisdom. He speaks in understanding. He speaks in the knowledge of God. Sinner, where are you traveling? Take the Bible. Sit down now and turn to John iv., and read to the 16th verse. Ponder it well, and if you are thirsty you will find a well deeper than Jacob's, and nothing to draw with. But if you ask of Jesus, he will give you living water,—water of life, and you may continue to drink until you press your way into the kingdom of heaven. "He that hath ears to hear let him hear." Oh for ears to hear in these days of apostasy! Oh that more of the blessed Holy Spirit of God might be poured out upon the church and ministry! that they might lift up their voice like a trumpet, cry aloud and spare not, but show the people their sins.

Do any say that the Holy Spirit was only for the apostles' days? But the apostle's declaration is good for all time, when he says, "They that do follow after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh, but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit." So then he adds, "They that are in the flesh cannot please God." Again. "Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his; for as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God." Again. "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God." Likewise he says, "The Spirit helpeth our infirmities; for we know not what to pray for as we ought, but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered." Again. "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh."

Now this is wholesale language, and cannot be narrowed down to the limits of the days of the apostles only, but reaches to the end of this age. For, says Peter, "The promise is to you and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." What is that which is promised to us and our children and all that the Lord our God shall call? I answer, it is the promise that he will pour out his Holy Spirit on us and our children, and all that are afar off, and reaches to the time when the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come.

But I will not prolong this article. Enough has been said. We are in the rocks and quicksands of the last days. Lord, give us thy Spirit to guide us to the end. Men, women and children are going out of life, and no hope beyond the grave. Scarcely any one speaks to them of the Lord of glory, our LIFE-GIVER. They need instruction, the kind word, the friendly hand, the name of Christ spoken in the spirit of Jesus. The doom of the ungodly, the sleep that never awakes, the blotting out of existence, should be brought to bear upon their minds. Then the contrast, the turning to the Lord, the Holy Ghost, his work on the heart, the promised life, beyond the grave, the inheritance, etc. Let us talk to our neighbors and friends whom we meet every day. Are we doing our duty to those around us? should be the question of us all. Oh that the Lord would pour out his Spirit abundantly before the harvest is past, the summer ended, and our friends and children not saved.

EXPECT SUCCESS.

He that expects success is on the high road to it. He that desponds and doubts is already overcome. Such is the voice alike of phylosophy and history. Faith in the spiritual, confidence in the natural, are the very soul of victory. He that would achieve any great triumph in either sphere must go to the conflict, looking for success.

This fact may be illustrated by an infinite variety of examples in various fields of human effort. In none is it more conspicuous than in those contests among men in which everything would seem to depend on mere physicial force—the contests of war. There have been, from age to age, leaders who have had the power of inspiring their followers with an undoubting expectation of success. The history of such leaders is a record of victories—of victories obtained not by a superiority of physicial force, though the contests were purely physicial, but of victories achieved by the few over the many by the power of a confident expectation of triumph. Thus was it with Alexander of Macedon. Thus was it with Cæsar of Rome, and with the great Napoleon of France; and thus has it been with all eminent conquerers. Their followers regardless of inequality in numbers rushed to battle with an unwavering confidence that was in itself victory.

Why is it that in the spiritual warfare now waged by us for Christ and his kingdom, so little is accomplished? Why are our victories so few, our spoils so meagre? Is it not because we are not looking for success? Is it not because a listless, hopeless, spiritless inactivity, a very negation of bold expectancy, has become our customary mood, almost our nature? We expect nothing, and we get what we expect. We venture nothing, and make nothing. Like the pitiful sluggard and coward of the parable, we bury our talent, lest if exposed to risk it bring us no gain, and then congratulate ourselves that we hold our own.

Early in the present century, when evangelical religion in Eastern Massachusetts was all undermined, and many churches had forsaken the old paths, two Baptist churches in Boston sustained a united prayer-meeting. This meeting dwindled and thinned, and congealed in spirit, until it became a question whether it had not better be discontinued. A meeting was held to consider the question of its suspension. Its supporters had grown almost hopeless of success, and were ready to yield their ground and retire from the conflict. It was urged that it was vain to maintain the form of godliness, when the reality was wanting. At this juncture, an aged negro woman, once a slave in Carolina, arose, and looking the reverend speaker in the face inquired, "Is God dead?" She alone of the faithful few assembled there retained her courage and her hopefulness. Confident of victory in the end, she was prepared for no surrender or retreat; and why? Her eye was fixed with an unwavering faith on her invincible leader—God was not dead! The words of that humble negro served to rally and re-inspirit the little band of fainting disciples, for they were pointed to Him whose banner ever waves to victory. Melted and stimulated, they went forward, and a glorious revival before long made them to sing for joy.

What we now need is hopefulnes. We must forget ourselves and our past unfruitfulness, and looking to our Great Captain, go forward anticipating success. For this hopefulness there are abundant grounds in the word of God. Why then may we not exercise it? Without it we are stripped of our strength as completely as was Samson when his locks were shorn.—Selected.

Christian Liberty and Oneness.

BY JAMES CRAWFORD.

"All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets."

The passage before us, is one of unlimited application; and the universality of its application to every act of our life, is reason enough why it is given to us as an unerring guide, in order that men may become the children of God; and it is a just dictation to us in the obtaining that high position of Gospel Liberty. It is a fact the world over and admitted as such by all christians, (and all means the whole) there are as many different views, feelings, and gifts, in the church, as there are individuals of which it is composed. Such being the case, God in his mercy has given us this universal dictation in these words, "Do unto others as you would that others should do to you."

I will bring to your mind some cases, where this liberty is wanting, and you can see the injustice that is practiced, even in our (as we term them) free meetings. The 7th verse of this chapter begins as follows: "Ask, and ye shall receive." In obedience to this command, the church meet as usual for prayer and conference. Brother A. opens the meeting with prayer; he prayes with the utmost ease; he seems only to open his mouth, and words flow as freely and as eloquently as though he were speaking the divine mind just committed to memory. The saints are greatly benefitted from the freedom of his prayer and reception of the spirit. But follow him a little further, and he privately drops this remark: "An individual who cannot pray as I have prayed, or is not as gifted as I am in prayer, ought never to pray in public." Here he has trampled under foot the rule, above all rules, and would shut up the mouth of seven eights of the saints, to say nothing of the bitter tears and groans of God's people, caused by this prohibition.

Set Br. A. down, "as having a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge."

We pass A. and take up Br. B., who is often at the house of prayer. He thinks that A. prays too easy; that he is too eloquent; and that he is too grammatical to pray from the heart; and that his prayers have not a practical, or spiritual influence upon the minds of the people. Such a man, B. thinks should never pray in public until he has more of the Spirit than he has now. Thus A. is to be forever silenced, and all the members, so richly fed by his prayers, are left to grieve and to weep at the cruel proscription put upon him. In this case also, "Christ is wounded in the house of his friends" by B. not having attained to the first principles of "christian liberty."

We will suppose that B. is now in the assembly of the saints. From him we hear, in solemn tones, "Let us pray." He shuts his eyes as though it was a sin to behold the least ray of light; his hands are clinched, his arms are rigid, his words are slow, and he prays as though his all hung upon the correctness of his words, the height of his voice, and the length of his prayers. As he has made public his gift, to a limited extent, he is now up to be criticized by Br. C.; and C. objects in plain language, not to be misunderstood, to any such stiff, formal, loud, and long prayers: and he adds, If I could have my way, no such praying should ever be allowed here. So in this case, C. has rejected B., as well as B. has A. and the gifts of B. are now, by C., trampled as it were in the dust; and the greater part of the church have been deprived of the comforts of the gospel, through the able and spiritual labors of B.

In this instance, the mouth of Christ has been stopped; God has been dishonored; the church oppressed and insulted by C.'s "having a zeal for God, but not according to knowl edge."

The meeting continues. C. is upon his knees, and his voice is heard, even before any one knew that prayer was to be offered; he does not kneel erect; he leans very much forward; his head is low; his hands are spread apart as though he was just arising from a fall; his voice is low, his words are indistinct, his prayer is short, yet simple and childlike; and like the Brethren who have prayed before him, he is the instrument, in the hand of God, of doing much good; many of the saints can testify to the important labors of C.

Brother D., who is too apt to be found in the back seat, and cold hearted, as anti-liberty christians generally are, says to himself, if not to one of the same christian attainments, "If I could not pray better than that, I would not pray at all: such a man should not be allowed to take up the time." D. being in that state of unholy boldness, stood ready to do the evil one's bidding, and carry out the opinion of A. B. C. and his own, on the devil's proscription measures; and so break up the union of saints; stifle the gift of God, which is in them; cut off the members of Christ's body, and worse than cast them to the dogs, cast them to the devil; and all from not understanding what the will of the Lord is upon one of the plainest subjects in the word of God—"Gospel Liberty."

ERRATA.—In the article of Br. Lederer, on the Lord's Supper, last week, fifth column, inside, six lines from the top, read, hot stones, instead of "hot stoves."

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, APRIL 12, 1865.

THE PASSOVER FEAST, or Lord's Supper, was kept in this city, Monday evening last. The continuous rain, during the day and evening, doubtless prevented the attendance of some who "longed to be there;" but the number assembled was good; and the season, so far as we could judge from our own experience and the expressions of others, was one of much interest and great comfort. Praise be to God, and to the Lamb who hath bought us with his blood. May we go forth, in the loving and self-sacrificing spirit of our LIFE-GIVER, in the great work yet before us; waiting for him from heaven, when the antitypical feast will be celebrated by all the redeemed, with Christ at the head of his own table, in the kingdom of God. That day is fast approaching, and will soon be here. Happy day, when all the saints will see eye to eye, and rejoice forever in that communion of saints, which shall know no jar or interruption from any cause. Let us now learn the lesson of mutual forbearance and patience. Differ we may, now, but love we must, if we would be Christ-like and fitted to dwell among the glorified. Let us all cultivate personal piety, by seeking the fulness of God, even the indwelling of his Holy Spirit.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—We suppose all understand that we repudiate the system of dunning. The rule we follow is, when the time has expired, to which the subscriber has paid, we discontinue the paper till we hear from him again. A subscriber who intends to continue should notify us in time, else he may lose some numbers, and subject both himself and us to trouble. Several will find no paper reaches them, from this office, this week. We are sorry to have it so, but can not help it.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

The time for holding this Conference has been fixed for Sunday, April 23d, in DODWORTH HALL, 806 Broadway, New York. Services three or more times on the first day, and to be continued as far into the week as thought best; doubtless through Monday and Tuesday, if no more. Important matters will come up at this Conference relating to future operations and missionary work. All who feel an interest in these things should be present as early Monday as possible, as these matters will be under consideration Monday and Tuesday. We presume that most preachers will have appointments in other places which will prevent their attendance till Monday. On their account business matters will not be called up on "the first day."

The Peace News.

Before our paper will reach its subscribers, they will have learned the tidings of the utter overthrow and surrender of the main rebel army, under Gen. Robert E. Lee, now an accomplished fact. This defeat and surrender is, virtually, the end of the rebellion. The end of slavery and the slave power has come. Let us be thankful to God that such is likely to be the result of this terrible and bloody conflict; and may the nation learn righteousness from the judgments of God it has been called to pass through for our national sins. Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people: and though hand join in hand, in committing wickedness, sin shall not go unpunished. Let this nation accept its punishment, and beware of again joining hands to sustain any form of oppression or wickedness, lest a worse thing befall it. God will not be trifled with: that which a nation soweth it shall also reap; as well as the same is true of individuals.

How are we Baptized into Jesus Christ?

Some persons have a great deal to say about being "immersed into the Christ," by which they mean an immersion in water. Now until they can prove that "water" is "the Christ" they are at fault. A person may be baptized in water a hundred times and yet fail to get into Christ. On the other hand, a person may be baptized into Christ without touching water. The one baptism, the essential one, is the baptism of the Spirit. "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink One Spirit." 1 Cor. xii. 13.

We marvel that people do not recognize the worship of the Gospel dispensation. The Old covenant had "ceremonies of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary; for there was a tabernacle made....which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers baptisms, ordinances of the flesh, imposed on them until the time of amendment." Heb. ix. 1–10.

But when did the time of amendment come? Evidently, at the first Advent of the Anointed One. John the Baptist was the impersonation of the Old Covenant; Jesus of the New. John came baptizing with water—a fleshly ordinance. But Jesus came to do away with fleshly ordinances—came to introduce the spiritual, the acceptable worship in its pure simplicity. He went through all the forms and ceremonies of the Levitical economy, fulfilled them all in his person, and then nailed them to his cross.

Thus, when he came "to Jordan, unto John, to be baptized of him"—"John forbad him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? And Jesus answering, said unto him, Suffer now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." Matt. iii. 13–15. John knew that the real baptism was of the Spirit, and that his baptism was merely typical and to be superseded; but it appears that he did not realize the relation of Jesus to the Old Covenant. Hence Jesus said, "Suffer now;" i. e., As yet we are under the law which I have come "to fulfil," so that the untrammeled worship of the Spirit may be opened when the time shall come. After the baptism of Jesus, John's eyes were opened, and he said; "Behold the Lamb of God which beareth the sin of the world. This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man which is preferred before me: for he was before me. And I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth WITH THE HOLY SPIRIT." John i. 29–33.

Water baptism belonged to the law, and was the chosen rite by which proselytes were admitted into the Jewish congregation. "The rabbins unanimously assert that the baptism of proselytes had been practiced by the Jews in all ages, from Moses down to the time when they wrote." This being the case, it was natural for the disciples of Christ to use the rite of their fathers and of John the Baptist as a form of initiation into the christian religion; for their minds were not enlightened as to the full import of what they saw and heard of Christ. Just before his death, Jesus said unto them, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of the truth is come, he will guide you into all the truth." John xvi. 12, 13. Because of this weakness, Jesus did not interpose to prevent his disciples from baptizing; "though Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples." John iv. 2. So also when he gave them his last commission, Matt. xxviii. 19, he doubtless used the term "baptizo" as a familiar one for "initiate." His own idea was—Go, spread the glad news of redemption, and teach men how they may avail themselves of the offered mercies. We would say here, however, that we have long suspected this text to be an addition by some later hand than Matthew's. Neither Luke nor John mention the command to baptize, and the concluding passage in Mark xvi. 9–20, which takes in the command to baptize, is an undoubted addition. Griesbach, in his time, marked it "a probable ommission," and the great critic of the present day—Tischendorf omits it altogether. This leaves us the passage in Matthew as the solitary indication that Jesus ever commanded his disciples to baptize. The formula used, "the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost"—looks suspicious; especially in view of the fact that the only expression like it—"the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost," 1 John v. 7—is rejected by all the critics. We find about as much reason for the supposition that the phrase in Matthew is an addition to the original document as we do for indulging the same thought in relation to the last verse in the Gospel of John. But whether we are correct in our conjecture or not, we see nothing that does not chord with the grand key-note of the Gospel dispensation—"God is spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." John iv. 24. "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the Sons of God." Rom. viii. 14. To be baptized into Christ we must go—not to the water, but—to Christ himself. The Spirit is the thing. May we not only have it in its ordinary manifestion as a quickening influence, but may we be filled with it! May we have the baptism of fire!

Spiritual Generation.

One day, as I was traveling by steamboat from New Haven to New York, I seated myself on the after promenade deck, took my Bible from my traveling-satchel, and began to read. In a few moments a friendly-looking gentleman took a seat near me, and said, "You have a Bible, I perceive. Are you a clergyman?" "I am a preacher," I replied. "Of what denomination?" "I do not call myself by any special name, but men call me a Second-Adventist." "Do you believe in being born again?" "I believe in being begotten in this life, that I may be born to a future life in the resurrection at the last day." I then proceeded to explain my views of the matter. What he thought I do know, but he said very little thereafter. How much of God's truth do men lose by an unwillingness to investigate!

The work of the Spirit in this life, which is generally called "the new birth," is the commencement of the of the great saving process in the individual. But the work is misunderstood in consequence of a wrong term. It is not in any true sense a "birth;" it is a "generation." We are "begotten;" not "born." God is "our Father;" not our mother. Hence it is erroneous to say that we are born of God. We should say that we are begotten of God. The word gennas may be rendered either way, and the context and subject must decide whether it should be translated "begotten" or "born."

Spiritual generation, by which we are begotten from above, is referred to in many passages of Scripture, of which the following are the principal ones—mostly taken from the Apostle John. We give the true rendering throughout, to be compared with the common version. "Who were begotten, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." John i. 13. "Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be begotten from above, he cannot see the kingdom of God....That which is begotten of the flesh is flesh; and that which is begotten of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be begotten from above. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is begotten of the Spirit." iii. 3–8. "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that practiceth righteousness is begotten of him." 1 John ii. 29 "Whosoever is begotten of God doth not practice sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is begotten of God." iii. 9. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God: and every one that loveth him that begat loveth him also that is begotten of him." v. 1. "For whatsoever is begotten of God overcometh the world." 4. "We know that whosoever is begotten of God sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not." 18. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." 1 Pet. i. 3. "Being begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever."

The distinction we thus make has a very important bearing on the great truth of Life in Jesus Christ alone. As surely as natural birth must be preceded by natural generation, so must spiritual birth be preceded by spiritual generation. And as fleshly generation results in a fleshly birth into this life, so spiritual generation will result in a spiritual birth into the future life—for "it is raised a spiritual body." The Spirit of God is thus demonstrated to be the great essential, without which there is no life from the dead. All that get a resurrection from the dead, get it because they have been subjects of a spiritual generation which results in spiritual birth. The very fact of a resurrection will prove a relationship with God the Father. "They are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx.

"I feel what then shall raise me up,
The eternal Spirit dwells in me,
This is my confidence and hope,
That God I face to face shall see.
Amen, Come Lord Jesus!

Society of the Holy Childhood.

This Society, the head-quarters of which are in Paris, contemplates the providing of a fund for procuring the inestimable benefit of baptism to the children of heathens in danger of death. The Associates contribute their mite for this excellent object in honor of the Holy Childhood of Jesus Christ, who so loved little children. Hundreds of thousands of little ones, born amid the darkness of paganism, have been washed in the blood of the Lamb, and have become angels in heaven, through the agency of this Society. Its chief field of operation has hitherto been China, where so many thousands of infants are left to perish miserably by their unnatural parents. The members contribute only ten cents a year in gold, but the aggregate of the contributions are very large.

We are pleased to learn that our Most Reverend Archbishop has established this commendable Society in the Archdiocese, and has appointed, as its Director General, the Rev. B. S. Piot, of St. Charles College, Ellicott's Mills. We look for much good as likely to result from this pious Association, which is peculiarly appropriate to children of both sexes who, in becoming members, are nurtured from childhood in a zeal for the salvation of souls.

The Reverend Director General will soon issue circulars, and make an appeal to our people, and especially the children in the schools; and we are desired by the Most Reverend Archbishop, to bespeak the co-operation in so holy a work, of the reverend clergy, and of those having charge of colleges, schools, and academies.—Catholic Mirror.

Here we have the religion of form wrought to its last result; but who shall say that it is not just as reasonable as any other water religion? If grown folks can be saved by water, why not infants? and if infants in one country, why not infants in all? Ridiculous as is the foregoing scheme of the Papists it is scarcely more ridiculous in fact than many of the visionary and superstitious ideas of Protestants. There are Adventists in the West who, after scoffing at the baptism of infants, hold the most foolish ideas of their own. Not satisfied with one immersion in water, they are actually immersed a second time, because they have learned something more glorious than they knew at first. This makes baptism follow teaching, rather than teaching follow baptism. Besides, is not a second baptism an acknowledgment that the subject was out of Christ previously to second and after the first? And if the first baptism failed to induct into Christ, may not the second? O that men would perceive the real baptism—the Spirit! O that they would come to Christ, the real and only baptizer! How soon would they be relieved of their burdens of form and superstition—how soon would the heavy laden find rest from their own works, and the witness of the Spirit that they are the children of God! Not the earnest of water, but "the earnest of the Spirit"!

Resurrection and Life.

"Jesus said unto Martha, I am the resurrection and the life."—John xi. 21.

These interesting and hope-inspiring words, as they originally flowed from the lips of our benign Redeemer, must have dropped softly and soothingly on the broken heart of the sister of Lazarus. The brother whom she had loved had been committed to the dust; and although she had faith in his "resurrection at the last day," yet the idea of being separated from him during an interval, to her comprehension, so indefinitely prolonged, filled her with the deepest sorrow. The Saviour here compassionately reminds her that He was the author of the resurrection, and that his power to raise the dead could be exercised then as well as at the period she mentioned—"I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

It is not, however, with the effect of the Saviour's declaration on the mind of Martha to which we at present request attention, but to the meaning of the declaration itself—"I am the resurrection and the life." Concerning the import of the first part of this high title self-claimed by the Messiah, there has been little if any dispute. Most cordially do we indorse the exposition given of it by the excellent and popular commentator, Albert Barnes. In his note on the passage, he says, —"I am the resurrection; I am the author or cause of the resurrection. It so depends on my power and will that it may be said I am the resurrection. This is a most expressive way of saying that the whole doctrine of the resurrction came from him and the whole power to effect it was his."

With the second part of the Saviour's affirmation the case is entirely different. While the word "resurrection" is understood literally, the term life is interpreted figuratively, as indicating, not existence, but happiness. Humbly, yet firmly, do we pronounce such a method of exposition to be a reckless defiance of the laws of criticism, and the dictates of common sense. If the term resurrection is to be understood in its natural and common acceptation as denoting the raising of the dead, then why understand the term life in the very unnatural and uncommon sense of happiness? Most assuredly happiness is far from being synonymous with life; so much so indeed, that, as remarked by Dr. Whately, "in all ages and countries 'life,' and the words answering to it in other languages, have always been applied, in ordinary discourse, to a wretched life no less properly than a happy one." Clearly it is not of happiness but of life, that the Saviour is discoursing. Martha grieved not because her brother was unhappy, but because he was dead; therefore Jesus assures her that he was "the resurrection and the life," and though believers in him might die, he would nevertheless re-endow them with life. To interpret the term life, as here employed, to mean happiness, would be, to employ the words of Mr. Dobney, "not only gratuitous, but would spoil the beautiful propriety of our Lord's discourse on that sorrowful occasion, and make it altogether irrelevant." We by no means deny that the life, of which Jesus here styles himself the fountain, shall be one of the most exquisite enjoyment; this is positively affirmed in various passages of scripture, and from the necessity of the case it must be so; what we maintain is, that the term life can express no such idea.

We therefore prefer taking the term life, as it stands in this passage, in its natural and ordinary meaning, and understand our Lord as declaring that he was the only source of "the resurrection and the life." From the entire scope of the passage we are evidently to understand our Lord as referring to the life that is to be enjoyed at and subsequent to the resurrection—that everlasting, incorruptible existence on which the redeemed of the Lord are destined to enter, when at his return in the clouds of heaven he shall summon his sleeping ones from the tomb. This view of the passage most beautifully harmonizes with the whole teaching of the New Testament in relation to our Lord Jesus Christ. Often does he represent himself alone as the source of eternal life to perishing men. "I am the bread of life."—"As the living Father hath life in himself, so hath he given the Son to have life in himself."—"The Son quickeneth"—giveth life—"to whom he will.—Because I live ye shall live also"

The common belief that men have eternal existence, independent of Christ, that they are immortal by nature, thus denies the Saviour's claim here put forward for our acknowledgment, and robs him of his peculiar glory as the Life-imparting One. And our object in writing out these remarks is not for the mere controverting of opposite opinions; it is that the Messiah may appear in the true grandeur of his character—that men by so viewing him may be induced lovingly to contemplate him as "the resurrection and the life." Happy, thrice happy, they who look for "the blessed hope, even the glorious appearing of God our Saviour;" for "when he who is our life shall appear, then shall they also appear with him in glory."

Dialogue About Soul.

A.—They tell me that you deny man to have a soul. Many are horrified at such an opinion, and, to speak the truth, I am myself anxious for some explanation.

B.—You shall hear it, and in the clearest manner. Assuredly, I reject the doctrine that man has a soul. I believe, however, that he is a soul. Many are offended when they hear the language, they are souls, that the soul of man is just the man himself; but did they understand the Scriptures better, they would readily admit the expression to be correct. The doctrine that man is a soul, being new, or rather afresh disclosed, after having been long concealed under notions and conjectures borrowed from profane sources, that is, from uninspired writers and thinkers, it is not to be wondered that the phraseology sounds somewhat unpleasant, and that the idea is too often hastily condemned. Though strange—it may be startling—nevertheless it seems to me the truth of God.

A.—It is well known, B., that I have no sympathy with those who rashly condemn whatever sounds strange in their ears, and startles their prejudices. What shall we acquire, in addition to our earliest thoughts, if we are unwilling to hear, and to hear with patience? Please to explain to me the grounds of the distinction you have drawn? Why say you man is, instead of that he has a soul?

B.—You have heard me say that the doctrine of man being a soul is "the truth of God," and it shall be my aim to convince you of this out of his word. Without its sanction no doctrine connected with religion can last; it may be outwardly fair and tempting, but the rottenness of death is at its core, and will sooner or later appear on its surface.

A.—"To the law and to the testimony," then; I wait with anxiety.

B.—Read, if you please, along with me, Genesis ii. 7, "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul."

A.—Your doctrine does not appear to me in this text.

B.—You have only read the verse once; perhaps it may become more expressive if we examine it more minutely. I have frequently perused the text myself, and long, as I still judge, previous ideas about souls prevented me from discovering its striking import. It may happen you will yet utter a similar confession.

A.—Being prepared to learn, I shall hear you impartially.

B.—The verse before our eye, is a simple record of the first man's creation. He came not into being, as some affirm, by chance; he is no development of an inferior nature even; no flower of being, as it were, generated by the blind forces of nature; for the Lord God formed man; made him a distinct order of existence on the earth. How he came here, is answered by the Mosaic history; man is the result of eternal power and goodness in special operation. Observe the words before us are, "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground"—it was man that was erected from dust.

A.—His body, of course.

B.—My friend, you should carefully notice that body is not in the verse. It runs, the Lord God formed man, not the body of man, of the dust; and we are endeavoring to explain what is in the text, not to settle what ought to be added to it. The meaning of the Bible is the sense of the words as they stand. You will not, I trust, take these hints in a temper unworthy of yourself; they are the lessons which, through some painful experience, I have acquired myself, and I esteem them invaluable.

A.—By no means am I offended; I know that what you suggest is solid advice; but you are perplexing me.

B.—It was man, then, that the Lord God made of dust, of the dust of the ground, or of existing world matter, just as the other animals or plants had been reared out of the same elements, and each endowed with the attributes peculiar to its own individual nature. Under the inexplicable and resistless energy of the divine arm, a quantity of dust assumed the form of human organization, and the various senses and members which are familiar to ourselves. Eyes are ready to see, ears to hear, hands to touch, feet to walk, lungs to breathe, a heart to propel the blood, and a brain to originate thought, desire, and volition. The whole man is here; you see him, in imagination, stretched corpse-like on the plain, ready to begin his mysterious functions, in many respects similar, it must be admitted, to those of animals that had existed before him, but in other respects far loftier and more complete than theirs.

A.—Ready to begin his functions—but how? If this was all the man, where was the animating principle, the soul, that is needed to quicken the lifeless form?

B.—That is the very point we have reached. What shall animate this form? What shall set the machinery, if I may so speak, in motion? Thus continues the text, "And breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." God did not breathe a soul into the man—he breathed the breath of life into his nostrils. He caused the life-giving breath, the atmosphere which we still inhale for our preservation, to enter and expand his lungs, and in doing so Adam was quickened—life began its wonderful experiences and movements. At first the divine power forced the lungs to expand themselves; the process of breathing, and life, its result, proceeded thereafter by involuntary action. Such appears to me the explanation of the origin of human life; how life is so begun and sustained is a question, however, apparently beyond the reach of human faculties. There is nothing either here or any where else in the Bible, about a soul having been put into man, or, as some would express it, a soul conjoined with the material frame so as to produce a man by their union; on the contrary, we are distinctly assured, that on being made to breathe "man became a living soul." He received no living or life-giving soul from God. The dust-formed man, on being made alive, became, or turned into, a living soul; you can easily observe the wide distinction between a body getting a soul as its actuating force, and a man formed of world materials, becoming a living soul.

A.—Then you think the passage teaches man was a soul before he was made to live.

B.—That is exactly my idea. It was a soul God made from the dust of the ground, and when caused to become alive, Adam, the soul, was henceforth soul alive, or a living soul. When a mechanic puts a watch in motion, it surely is a watch before the motion begins; causing its machinery to operate, simply makes it a moving watch. So with man, he was constituted of dust; for a little while he continued lifeless ; when quickened by being made to breathe "the breath of life," or the life-affording breath, he became living man, or, living soul. Thus, in the language of Milton, "Man is a living being, intrinsically, and properly one and indivisible, not compound and separable, not according to the common opinion, made up and framed of two distinct and different natures, as of body and soul, but the whole man is soul, and the soul man ; that is to say, a body of substance individual, animated, sensitive, and rational."

Do Dogs Have Souls?

BY ELD. WILLARD GRIFFIN.

I have been asked the question, and I answer, Yes. The attributes of the human soul are thought, memory, reason, will, &c. These are possessed by dogs. In proof of which, I will state the following facts. I once had a dog which was in the habit of eating out of a wooden dish. On one occasion, when he was about to be fed, his dish could not be found, and he was fed without it. After several weeks, I one day insisted upon his finding his dish before being fed. He ran about the house several times, then went to the door, which was open, stood a minute and looked out into the fields, as if trying to recollect where he had left it, and then started off, went over a hill into a plowed field, dug up his dish, where he had buried it, and brought it home.

I have known a dog to open the door by putting his foot upon the thumb piece on the outside and lifting it with his nose on the inside. One of my acquaintances had a dog that was made to assist in doing the washing every Monday, by turning a wheel attached to a pounder in a barrel. At length, considering it a degredation to be employed in a business so un-dog-like, he devised a plan to shirk the responsibility. When Monday morning came he was among the missing, and did not return until evening; and so he continued to do regularly every week.

Two men were going up West Hartland mountain in a wagon; one of them had a dog, which was strolling along ahead of them; now and then darting out to chase a squirrel or partridge. About half way up the mountain, on the right hand, is a watering trough; on the left hand is a deep and dark ravine, through which, amidst rocks, trees, bushes, and briars, runs a stream of water. At the top of the mountain, half a mile from the watering trough, was a tavern. The owner of the dog, while expatiating upon his sagacity, threw his mittens down into the gorge as far as he could and told his doubting neighbor that when they arrived at the top of the mountain he would make his dog go back and find them. Accordingly when they reached the tavern he said to his dog, You go down to the watering trough, and down among the bushes, by the brook, you will find my mittens. The dog started off, and in less than half an hour returned with the mittens.

One of our farmers had a dog that had for many years been recognized as one of the family, and probably had never dreamed of seeking a home elsewhere. One evening a neighbor came in for a social chat; and in the course of conversation mention was made of the dog. His master said he was good for nothing, as he had got to be old, and he could not afford to keep him any longer; he was going to kill him. The neighbor said, don't kill him; give him to me, I'll take him. Well, said the farmer you may have him; and no more was said about him. After staying a while longer the neighbor rose to go home, when the dog, which till then had kept its place by the fire, started up, and, without any solicitation on the part of the neighbor followed him home, and remained with him, without ever manifesting any desire to go back to his former residence.

My grandfather had a dog which every winter evening kept his place on one corner of the hearth stone, where he lay, with his nose upon his paws, snuffing the warm radiations from a fire of logs that blazed brightly in the huge fireplace; and where the children would often laugh to hear him bark in his sleep; dreaming, perchance, of woodchucks, or red squirrels. One night as the family sat in a semicircle around the fire, while the cool refreshing streams of outer air, from between the logs of the cabin, were playing through their hair, and the November winds howling around the projecting corners, reminding them of the approach of a long and dreary winter, my grandfather remarked that "Lion" had got to be too old to keep through another winter, and he was going to kill him. When the family were about to retire to rest the dog went to the door and whined. He was let out with the expectation that he would soon return; but after waiting some time in vain to hear the scrape of his paw upon the door, they retired to rest. The next day the dog was missing. After several days my grandfather was wandering in the woods, when he discovered the dog snugly embedded in a heap of leaves, under a clump of bushes. He spoke to him kindly, and tried to coax him to leave his nest and go home with him; but he refused for some time, till after repeated assurances of safety and positive declarations that he should not be killed, he was at length induced to go home, where he lived till he died of old age.

Cronological Dates.

I am of the opinion that all the chief dates for ending the 6000 years, and the chronological periods, had better be given, so that all may have the means of choosing between them, that is, if they must have one. Dr. Elliot in 1864. Stevenson in 1866. Cumming and Shimeal, 1868. Baxter and Seiss, 1869 or 70. Bowen, 1873. Thurman, 1875. Dr. Gunner, 1877. Bliss and Dr. Hales, 1880.

Thus we have seven times before us, between this and 1880. These are fixed upon in nearly equal positiveness by the advocates of each. Some by a comparison of heathen and Bible Chronology with the precision of the equinoxes, as Shimeall, is sure he has demonstrated the correctness of 1868. Thurman, by setting aside all profane chronology, and all previous Biblical chronologers, and by a new calculation of eclipses, claims to have positively demonstrated the year 1875. Dr. Gunner, by a different process, equally sure, namely a chart thirty feet long, divided into six sections for millenaries, each into ten centuries, and these into years, and then taking up the dates of history, without forcing has wrought them into a mechanical and chronological demonstration of the year 1877, in harmony with Ptolemy's cannon, and the leading dates of most other chronologers.

Bliss, by another process, has taken up the principal chronologers, and comparing them together, and all with the Bible, fixed on the year 1880. This is the year that Dr. Hales has fixed on also for the end. Having read and examined them all but one—Dr. G's, and compared them with history and the Bible, I choose 1880 as the most likely, though not with the positiveness of either, though I could be, as easily so as any one of them.

I think that each is near enough right for all practical uses, and constitute together a great argument for the end nigh, and against a particular year as within their, or our knowledge yet. The particular time God the Father can alone make known when the time for it comes. All till then, may approximate it, but not reach it with certainty. After 1880, there is a great vacancy among chronologers for the end for over a 100 years; and this shows we are to expect it between this and 1880, or else we are nowhere near right. But all things show his coming and the end is at hand, and that some one of these dates is likely right All should be ready and watching, and waiting his return.

NOTE BY EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE.—We take the foregoing from the Advent Herald. We do not indorse any of those years as the end of the 6000 since creation. We give them as a matter of passing ideas on the subject. We have no evidence, nor have we ever seen any, that 6000 years will bring the end of this age, or world. There is no "Thus saith the Lord" for any such position. We believe, however, that the time for the "fifth kingdom"—which is the kingdom of Messiah —cannot be far off; because we must be in the feet, if not the toes of Daniel's image, Dan. ii., which is the point where tyranical governments are to be overthrown, "or dashed in pieces." Let us live in reference to that fact, now "nigh;" and leave speculations about the exact time to such as choose to waste their energies on impossible undertakings.

Destiny of our Earth and Race.

A passage of Scripture, very clear and conclusive in its teachings on this subject is Daniel vii. 13, 14, and 27. This chapter of Daniel is one of the most remarkable portions of God's blessed word. It is remarkable for many things. Chief among these are its clearness, its continuity, and its comprehensiveness....

There are three things especially deserving our attention, in the prophecy now before us. The first of these is the time to which it refers.

It is clearly post-resurrection. It describes a state of things that can be realized only after the second coming of Christ has taken place.

This is manifest from the language used in v. 13: "I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven." Compare this language with that in which our Saviour distinctly foretells his second coming, and the identity of the two descriptions becomes apparent. In Matt. xxiv. 30, we read, "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

In Matt. xxvi. 64, we read: "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." The language in both these passages is so identical with that which the prophet uses that it seems impossible to resist the conclusion that it must have the same meaning in Daniel and in Matthew. Daniel, indeed, speaks of "one like the Son of man;" but it is evident that this is only a figure of speech to denote the Son of man himself. And if you admit that the person referred to by the prophet and the Evangelist is one and the same, then you must admit that the time contemplated in these several passages is the same, also. And as no one can doubt that the time of which our Saviour speaks, in the passages quoted from St. Matthew, is post-resurrection, or the time of his second coming, the conclusion follows, inevitably, that the time of which Daniel speaks, in the passage we are considering, must be post-resurrection also, or time connected with the second coming of Christ into our world. And this makes clear our first point, which is the time referred to in this prophecy of Daniel.

The second important point to be noticed in connection with this prophecy, is the nature of the kingdom here described.

And so far as regards the bearing of this prophecy on our present subject, there is but a single point which it is important for us now to consider, and that is, who are the subjects of the kingdom here referred to. In Daniel vii. 27, it is spoken of as a kingdom which "all dominions" shall serve and obey. If this were all that was said about it, it would have been very difficult to throw much light on the particular point now before us. We should hardly have been able to affirm anything very clearly or definitely about it. But this is not all that is said about the subjects of this kingdom promised to the "Son of man," and to "the saints of the Most High," who are his resurrection people.

In the 14th verse, of this chapter, we have a much fuller designation given of the subjects of this kingdom. There we read, that "there was given Him," i. e. "the Son of man," "dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve Him." This cannot refer to the people whom Christ is now gathering to himself out of all lands. These, when Christ shall come again, will be in their resurrection state. They will constitute "the Church of the first-born." They will be "the saints of the Most High," spoken of in v. 27. With them "death will be swallowed up in victory;" "the corruptible will have put on incorruption; the mortal will have put on immortality." In that blessed state, to which they will then have attained, there will be found existing "neither Jew nor Gentile, neither male nor female." They will all be "made one with Christ." They will be "made perfect in Christ Jesus." With them all national distinction will be forever done away. The expressions, "people, nations, and languages," will not apply to them. It is clear, then, that they must all be set aside. It cannot be "the children of the resurrection," then, who are the subjects of this kingdom. And yet, clearly, it is the earth on which we dwell that is to be the theatre of this kingdom. For it is "under the whole heaven" (v. 27) that this kingdom is established. And it is "all people, nations, and languages," who are to be the subjects of this kingdom....

These "people, nations, and languages," answer to "the nations of them that are saved," of whom St. John speaks as "walking in the light" of that glorious city which is to be revealed when "the new heavens and the new earth" are made. Thus, then, we have clear light on our second point. We see who are the subjects of this promised kingdom, and so are able to judge as to what the nature of that kingdom will be.

The other point to be noticed, in the prophecy before us, has to do with the duration of this kingdom.

Various expressions are made use of in this prophecy in reference to this duration. In verse 14, it is said, of "the Son of man," that "his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

In verse 27, it is again said, of this kingdom, that it shall be "an everlasting kingdom." And in verse 18, it is declared, still more emphatically, that "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever." Nothing could be more decided than this. It denotes unending duration in the most absolute and unqualified sense. The terms "everlasting" and "forever" are sometimes used in a limited sense....If they refer to a man, a tree, or a nation, then the duration will be the life of the man, or the existence of the tree or the nation. But we have seen that the kingdom of which Daniel here speaks is connected with "the new heavens and the new earth," or the state of things that is to follow after the resurrection shall have taken place. But we know that that is a state of things which will never pass away. It will be, in the most absolute and unlimited sense, perpetual, or eternal. And if this be so, then the terms "everlasting" and "forever, even forever and ever," here applied to the promised kingdom, must be taken in their broadest, fullest, and most unqalified meaning. They denote a kingdom which will last through eternity. And if the kingdom here described is to be thus enduring, then it follows, irresistibly, that the earth, which is the theatre of that kingdom, must be equally enduring, and "the people, nations, and languages" who are to be the subjects of that kingdom, must run on in successive generations, through the same period of unending duration. And thus the prophecy contained in Daniel vii. solves, satisfactorily, the great problem of "The Destiny of our Earth and Race."—Selected.

Letters and Extracts.

From Sister N. M. Henry.

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, March 29, 1865.

TO THE READERS OF THE HERALD:—I thought that I would refrain from writing to the friends through the paper until my return to Bunker Hill; but circumstances have caused me to snatch up my pen in my impulsive manner and write, and if our good Editor thinks it just fit to be consigned to oblivion, why I am perfectly content, knowing his judgment to be correct in what is right and proper for his numerous class of readers.

Well, about the circumstances. A brother has just made me a flying visit, who "heard that Sister Henry was in town, and came on purpose to see how she looked." After shaking hands cordially, and assuring himself that there was nothing either very formidable or very vicious in my looks, but that I looked like any other little woman, sewing, he asked me, "Did you know Sis, you had lost your character?" Why, no; said I, "I was not aware that I had met with such a serious loss! Come tell us about it." "Is it the decision of a 'Convention,' or Caucus, or the vote of the community at large?" I was so vain as to think my character in, at least, average standing; every body treats me well, and are kind, and respectful. I have friends every where I go, both saint and sinner; good, bad, and indifferent, treat me with courtesy and kindness; and with four exceptions, (and they in every instance were professed Adventists) have I never received ill treatment. Let me "count my enemies" as Willis says. "Well Sis, that is easy done. I mean the counting; it was one man, and he a preacher, and once thought you was all right; but since you have written a certain article in the Herald of Life you are all wrong." Well, tell the brother for me, that all the trouble is, I have advanced a little; but I will reach out my hand and help him over the difficulties. Please not to impale me, as I have seen people do Beetles; for sure, when they think me fixed, I shall manage to quietly go off the hook, about my Master's business.

I have never yet, in public, preached the non-ressurrection. I want to be posted thoroughly first. Perhaps, I hear some Br. say, "That's just what you can't be, for the Bible does not teach it." Hold there! I am surprised at the amount of evidence there is on the side of no life out of Christ; and I am determined to exercise my sight to investigate not only that, but all other scriptural questions. But although I have not, as yet, spoken of it in public, yet I call the attention of others to it, in family conversation. What light I have received, I manage to let shine on other dark minds, dark in the sense in which mine was, six, or seven months ago.

Well, I have counted the cost. If it takes my good name, let it go; but I would just remind the brethern and sisters that are so "down on us," they thought it hard when they were treated in the same manner by the Churches for daring to believe that Br. Storrs was right in his views of "Destruction." To me, it seems as though some had better go to 'school' until they learn to spell c h a r i t y, charity; c o u r t e s y, courtesy; and when they get beyond that lesson, into reading, "In all things, whatsoever ye would men should do unto you, do ye even so to them," would be a good lesson.

My health is improving; but my sickness was so very serious, it takes time to get strong. The Lord has been good to me: praise his holy name. Let me have your prayers. Your Sister, in hope of Life through Christ.

SISTER HENRY will accept our thanks for her Photograph, which has just come to hand from Bunker Hill,—her home—in Ill. We judge it is a very good likeness. We would be glad to respond, but we have none of ourself on hand, and have not time to get any at present.—EDITOR.

A few words from Life Lover.

A friendly Christian greeting dear Editor, writers, and readers of the Herald of Life. Each week it comes to me laden with words of instruction, warning, encouragement and sympathy. How desirable to have such a medium through which we can converse with each other, though many a hill and dale, rock and stream intervene between us, rendering personal intercourse impracticable. How I love to embrace the dear scattered household, and commit their interests to Him who sustains the relation of a tender, loving Father to all the little flock, and to feel that others thus remember me, and that our petitions meet and mingle at the same mercy seat,

But methinks some of you have said, I wonder if "Life Lover" has not lost her interest in the glorious theme of life through Christ, as she speaks not to us as formerly? To this, my friends, I can answer emphatically, nay: though for the last few months wave after wave of perplexity and sadness have threatened to obliterate my hope, I have been enabled to cling to the LIFE-GIVER, and find myself to day sustained by his promise of a better life. And now that the cold winter is past, and nature begins to feel the genial mildness of spring, I feel a fresh impulse to put forth greater efforts for the attainment of that life to come. As I walk abroad, and behold the streams flowing unfettered once more, the earnest desire rises that all the ice of selfishness, worldly-mindedness, self-righteousness and pride may be melted from my heart, that I may be wholly free in Christ—filled to rejoicing every day with his life-giving Spirit. And as the swelling leaves and bursting buds will soon clothe the trees with beauty, my determination is, that the profession which I have made shall be adorned with works of faith and labors of love.

O my brethern and sisters who are seeking a close union with the living vine, have we realized as we should the importance of being fruit-bearing branches? My heart sighs as I look at the multitude of professing Christians, but look in vain for the fruit which will assuredly be brought forth by those who are really in sympathy with Jesus. Of Him, the epitome of whose life is given thus, "He went about doing good," let us learn—sitting daily at his feet, taking lessons of self-denial, activity, patience, meakness and holy boldness. The time hastens on; now it must be very near, when those who are found meet, by a life of faith and holy obedience, will receive a kingdom eternal, and a crown immortal, and a life evermore. Will these be ours? God grant it for Christ's sake. More anon.

LIFE LOVER.

Haverhill, Mass. Apr., 1865.

Cheer up, Pilgrim.

What, pilgrim, art thou faint and weary in the way to Zion? Is thy burden heavier than thou canst bear? Cast thy burden upon the Lord, he will sustain thee ; he will never suffer the righteous to be moved. Is the stormy wind and tempest abroad, and seest thou no shelter. God is thy refuge. Does thy vigor fail thee ; and dost thou faint for very feebleness ? God is thy strength. Do afflictions and sorrows gird thee round as a garment ; and findest thou no friend to aid thee ? God is a present help in time of trouble ; and they that come unto him, he will in no wise cast out. Pilgrim, be of good cheer ; hold thee on thy way. Is the river thou hast to cross deep and forbidding ? Listen to the voice of thy Lord, "When thou passeth through the waters, I will be with thee ; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee." Do trials and persecutions beset thee ? What readest thou ? "They that will be godly, in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution." If the sorrows and cares of the world press thee down, cast them all on God, for he careth for thee ; for the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting and his truth endureth to all generations ; and they that trust in him shall be as mount Zion which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever. Yours seeking for immortality.

MERCY A. CONILLARD.

Swanville, Me., March 26, 1865.

ELD. J. LEWIS, Otto, Ill., writes:—I received the Tracts and Books, for which I am thankful. The grand fact is, the glorious bible doctrine of no resurrection of the wicked; no life only through Christ; the kingdom not a church nor a sky-kingdom; the future abode of the saints to be on the earth renewed, &c., are gaining ground rapidly, (praise the Lord) and some of the Priests seem to think their craft is in danger; so they get up a cry of "Infidel, Mormon," with many a warning of "Don't go near the old one armed preacher: he is a dangerous man." We have more calls to preach than we can possibly attend to. Praise the good Lord for health and strength to travel and labor. Now if any of the preaching brethren would come out here and spend the summer with us, in this large field of labor, we doubt not, it would be for the glory of God. We talk of having a Grove-meeting some time in the course of the summer, and we want help. Who will come? Let us know soon, so that we can make arrangements in season. The Tracts sent us, are all out preaching. People come miles to get them. Dear Brethern, if you cannot come yourselves to travel and preach, send on the tracts, and we will scatter them.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Get up your Grove-meeting, give us timely notice, and some of us here in the East will (the Lord willing) be with you on that occasion, and a season longer. Illinois must have help. Who is ready to say to the Lord, "Here am I, send me." Somebody, we are sure, will appear soon with those words on their lips and that spirit in their hearts. It must be so.

The letter and money you speak of, from Summum, was not received, but we now send the paper to John D. Hughes, as you direct, and credit him with the $2 "lost."

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents : and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy —more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this [illegible] neer in this branch of the life views.

ued lifeless; when quickened by being made to breathe "the breath of life," or the life-affording breath, he became living man, or, living soul. Thus, in the language of Milton, "Man is a living being, intrinsically, and properly one and indivisible, not compound and separable, not according to the common opinion, made up and framed of two distinct and different natures, as of body and soul, but the whole man is soul, and the soul man; that is to say, a body of substance individual, animated, sensitive, and rational."

Do Dogs Have Souls?

BY ELD. WILLARD GRIFFIN.

I have been asked the question, and I answer, Yes. The attributes of the human soul are thought, memory, reason, will, &c. These are possessed by dogs. In proof of which, I will state the following facts. I once had a dog which was in the habit of eating out of a wooden dish. On one occasion, when he was about to be fed, his dish could not be found, and he was fed without it. After several weeks, I one day insisted upon his finding his dish before being fed. He ran about the house several times, then went to the door, which was open, stood a minute and looked out into the fields, as if trying to recollect where he had left it, and then started off, went over a hill into a plowed field, dug up his dish, where he had buried it, and brought it home.

I have known a dog to open the door by putting his foot upon the thumb piece on the outside and lifting it with his nose on the inside. One of my acquaintances had a dog that was made to assist in doing the washing every Monday, by turning a wheel attached to a pounder in a barrel. At length, considering it a degredation to be employed in a business so un-dog-like, he devised a plan to shirk the responsibility. When Monday morning came he was among the missing, and did not return until evening; and so he continued to do regularly every week.

Two men were going up West Hartland mountain in a wagon; one of them had a dog, which was strolling along ahead of them; now and then darting out to chase a squirrel or partridge. About half way up the mountain, on the right hand, is a watering trough; on the left hand is a deep and dark ravine, through which, amidst rocks, trees, bushes, and briars, runs a stream of water. At the top of the mountain, half a mile from the watering trough, was a tavern. The owner of the dog, while expatiating upon his sagacity, threw his mittens down into the gorge as far as he could and told his doubting neighbor that when they arrived at the top of the mountain he would make his dog go back and find them. Accordingly when they reached the tavern he said to his dog, You go down to the watering trough, and down among the bushes, by the brook, you will find my mittens. The dog started off, and in less than half an hour returned with the mittens.

One of our farmers had a dog that had for many years been recognized as one of the family, and probably had never dreamed of seeking a home elsewhere. One evening a neighbor came in for a social chat; and in the course of conversation mention was made of the dog. His master said he was good for nothing, as he had got to be old, and he could not afford to keep him any longer; he was going to kill him. The neighbor said, don't kill him; give him to me, I'll take him. Well, said the farmer you may have him; and no more was said about him. After staying a while longer the neighbor rose to go home, when the dog, which till then had kept its place by the fire, started up, and, without any solicitation on the part of the neighbor followed him home, and remained with him, without ever manifesting any desire to go back to his former residence.

My grandfather had a dog which every winter evening kept his place on one corner of the hearth stone, where he lay, with his nose upon his paws, snuffing the warm radiations from a fire of logs that blazed brightly in the huge fireplace; and where the children would often laugh to hear him bark in his sleep; dreaming, perchance, of woodchucks, or red squirrels. One night as the family sat in a semicircle around the fire, while the cool refreshing streams of outer air, from between the logs of the cabin, were playing through their hair, and the November winds howling around the projecting corners, reminding them of the approach of a long and dreary winter, my grandfather remarked that "Lion" had got to be too old to keep through another winter, and he was going to kill him. When the family were about to retire to rest the dog went to the door and whined. He was let out with the expectation that he would soon return; but after waiting some time in vain to hear the scrape of his paw upon the door, they retired to rest. The next day the dog was missing. After several days my grandfather was wandering in the woods, when he discovered the dog snugly embedded in a heap of leaves, under a clump of bushes. He spoke to him kindly, and tried to coax him to leave his nest and go home with him; but he refused for some time, till after repeated assurances of safety and positive declarations that he should not be killed, he was at length induced to go home, where he lived till he died of old age.

Cronological Dates.

I am of the opinion that all the chief dates for ending the 6000 years, and the chronological periods, had better be given, so that all may have the means of choosing between them, that is, if they must have one. Dr. Elliot in 1864. Stevenson in 1866. Cumming and Shimeal, 1868. Baxter and Seiss, 1869 or 70. Bowen, 1873. Thurman, 1875. Dr. Gunner, 1877. Bliss and Dr. Hales, 1880.

Thus we have seven times before us, between this and 1880. These are fixed upon in nearly equal positiveness by the advocates of each. Some by a comparison of heathen and Bible Chronology with the precision of the equinoxes, as Shimeall, is sure he has demonstrated the correctness of 1868. Thurman, by setting aside all profane chronology, and all previous Biblical chronologers, and by a new calculation of eclipses, claims to have positively demonstrated the year 1875. Dr. Gunner, by a different process, equally sure, namely a chart thirty feet long, divided into six sections for millenaries, each into ten centuries, and these into years, and then taking up the dates of history, without forcing has wrought them into a mechanical and chronological demonstration of the year 1877, in harmony with Ptolemy's cannon, and the leading dates of most other chronologers.

Bliss, by another process, has taken up the principal chronologers, and comparing them together, and all with the Bible, fixed on the year 1880. This is the year that Dr. Hales has fixed on also for the end. Having read and examined them all but one—Dr. G's, and compared them with history and the Bible, I choose 1880 as the most likely, though not with the positiveness of either, though I could be, as easily so as any one of them.

I think that each is near enough right for all practical uses, and constitute together a great argument for the end nigh, and against a particular year as within their, or our knowledge yet. The particular time God the Father can alone make known when the time for it comes. All till then, may approximate it, but not reach it with certainty. After 1880, there is a great vacancy among chronologers for the end for over a 100 years; and this shows we are to expect it between this and 1880, or else we are nowhere near right. But all things show his coming and the end is at hand, and that some one of these dates is likely right. All should be ready and watching, and waiting his return.

NOTE BY EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE.—We take the foregoing from the Advent Herald. We do not indorse any of those years as the end of the 6000 since creation. We give them as a matter of passing ideas on the subject. We have no evidence, nor have we ever seen any, that 6000 years will bring the end of this age, or world. There is no "Thus saith the Lord" for any such position. We believe, however, that the time for the "fifth kingdom"—which is the kingdom of Messiah—cannot be far off; because we must be in the feet, if not the toes of Daniel's image, Dan. ii., which is the point where tyranical governments are to be overthrown, "or dashed in pieces." Let us live in reference to that fact, now "nigh;" and leave speculations about the exact time to such as choose to waste their energies on impossible undertakings.

Destiny of our Earth and Race.

A passage of Scripture, very clear and conclusive in its teachings on this subject is Daniel vii. 13, 14, and 27. This chapter of Daniel is one of the most remarkable portions of God's blessed word. It is remarkable for many things. Chief among these are its clearness, its continuity, and its comprehensiveness....

There are three things especially deserving our attention, in the prophecy now before us. The first of these is the time to which it refers.

It is clearly post-resurrection. It describes a state of things that can be realized only after the second coming of Christ has taken place.

This is manifest from the language used in v. 13: "I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven." Compare this language with that in which our Saviour distinctly foretells his second coming, and the identity of the two descriptions becomes apparent. In Matt. xxiv. 30, we read, "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

In Matt. xxvi. 64, we read: "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." The language in both these passages is so identical with that which the prophet uses that it seems impossible to resist the conclusion that it must have the same meaning in Daniel and in Matthew. Daniel, indeed, speaks of "one like the Son of man;" but it is evident that this is only a figure of speech to denote the Son of man himself. And if you admit that the person referred to by the prophet and the Evangelist is one and the same, then you must admit that the time contemplated in these several passages is the same, also. And as no one can doubt that the time of which our Saviour speaks, in the passages quoted from St. Matthew, is post-resurrection, or the time of his second coming, the conclusion follows, inevitably, that the time of which Daniel speaks, in the passage we are considering, must be post-resurrection also, or time connected with the second coming of Christ into our world. And this makes clear our first point, which is the time referred to in this prophecy of Daniel.

And so far as regards the bearing of this prophecy on our present subject, there is but a single point which it is important for us now to consider, and that is, who are the subjects of the kingdom here referred to. In Daniel vii. 27, it is spoken of as a kingdom which "all dominions" shall serve and obey. If this were all that was said about it, it would have been very difficult to throw much light on the particular point now before us. We should hardly have been able to affirm anything very clearly or definitely about it. But this is not all that is said about the subjects of this kingdom promised to the "Son of man," and to "the saints of the Most High," who are his resurrection people.

In the 14th verse, of this chapter, we have a much fuller designation given of the subjects of this kingdom. There we read, that "there was given Him," i. e. "the Son of man," "dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve Him." This cannot refer to the people whom Christ is now gathering to himself out of all lands. These, when Christ shall come again, will be in their resurrection state. They will constitute "the Church of the first-born." They will be "the saints of the Most High," spoken of in v. 27. With them "death will be swallowed up in victory;" "the corruptible will have put on incorruption; the mortal will have put on immortality." In that blessed state, to which they will then have attained, there will be found existing "neither Jew nor Gentile, neither male nor female." They will all be "made one with Christ." They will be "made perfect in Christ Jesus." With them all national distinction will be forever done away. The expressions, "people, nations, and languages," will not apply to them. It is clear, then, that they must all be set aside. It cannot be "the children of the resurrection," then, who are the subjects of this kingdom. And yet, clearly, it is the earth on which we dwell that is to be the theatre of this kingdom. For it is "under the whole heaven" (v 27) that this kingdom is established. And it is "all people, nations, and languages," who are to be the subjects of this kingdom....

These "people, nations, and languages," answer to "the nations of them that are saved," of whom St. John speaks as "walking in the light" of that glorious city which is to be revealed when "the new heavens and the new earth" are made. Thus, then, we have clear light on our second point. We see who are the subjects of this promised kingdom, and so are able to judge as to what the nature of that kingdom will be.

The other point to be noticed, in the prophecy before us, has to do with the duration of this kingdom.

Various expressions are made use of in this prophecy in reference to this duration. In verse 14, it is said, of "the Son of man," that "his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

In verse 27, it is again said, of this kingdom, that it shall be "an everlasting kingdom." And in verse 18, it is declared, still more emphatically, that "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever." Nothing could be more decided than this. It denotes unending duration in the most absolute and unqualified sense. The terms "everlasting" and "forever" are sometimes used in a limited sense....If they refer to a man, a tree, or a nation, then the duration will be the life of the man, or the existence of the tree or the nation. But we have seen that the kingdom of which Daniel here speaks is connected with "the new heavens and the new earth," or the state of things that is to follow after the resurrection shall have taken place. But we know that that is a state of things which will never pass away. It will be, in the most absolute and unlimited sense, perpetual, or eternal. And if this be so, then the terms "everlasting" and "forever, even forever and ever," here applied to the promised kingdom, must be taken in their broadest, fullest, and most unqalified meaning. They denote a kingdom which will last through eternity. And if the kingdom here described is to be thus enduring, then it follows, irresistibly, that the earth, which is the theatre of that kingdom, must be equally enduring, and "the people, nations, and languages" who are to be the subjects of that kingdom, must run on in successive generations, through the same period of unending duration. And thus the prophecy contained in Daniel vii. solves, satisfactorily, the great problem of "The Destiny of our Earth and Race."—Selected.

Letters and Extracts.

From Sister N. M. Henry.

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, March 29, 1865.

TO THE READERS OF THE HERALD:—I thought that I would refrain from writing to the friends through the paper until my return to Bunker Hill; but circumstances have caused me to snatch up my pen in my impulsive manner and write, and if our good Editor thinks it just fit to be consigned to oblivion, why I am perfectly content, knowing his judgment to be correct in what is right and proper for his numerous class of readers.

Well, about the circumstances. A brother has just made me a flying visit, who "heard that Sister Henry was in town, and came on purpose to see how she looked." After shaking hands cordially, and assuring himself that there was nothing either very formidable or very vicious in my looks, but that I looked like any other little woman, sewing, he asked me, "Did you know Sis, you had lost your character?" Why, no; said I, "I was not aware that I had met with such a serious loss! Come tell us about it." "Is it the decision of a 'Convention,' or Caucus, or the vote of the community at large?" I was so vain as to think my character in, at least, average standing; every body treats me well, and are kind, and respectful. I have friends every-where I go, both saint and sinner; good, bad, and indifferent, treat me with courtesy and kindness; and with four exceptions, (and they in every instance were professed Adventists) have I never received ill treatment. Let me "count my enemies" as Willis says. "Well Sis, that is easy done. I mean the counting; it was one man, and he a preacher, and once thought you was all right; but since you have written a certain article in the Herald of Life you are all wrong." Well, tell the brothor for me, that all the trouble is, I have advanced a little; but I will reach out my hand and help him over the difficulties. Please not to impale me, as I have seen people do Beetles; for sure, when they think me fixed, I shall manage to quietly go off the hook, about my Master's business.

I have never yet, in public, preached the non-ressurrection. I want to be posted thoroughly first. Perhaps, I hear some Br. say, "That's just what you can't be, for the Bible does not teach it." Hold there! I am surprised at ths amount of evidence there is on the side of no life out of Christ; and I am determined to exercise my sight to investigate not only that, but all other scriptural questions. But although I have not, as yet, spoken of it in public, yet I call the attention of others to it, in family conversation. What light I have received, I manage to let shine on other dark minds, dark in the sense in which mine was, six, or seven months ago.

Well, I have counted the cost. If it takes my good name, let it go; but I would just remind the brethern and sisters that are so "down on us," they thought it hard when they were treated in the same manner by the Churches for daring to believe that Br. Storrs was right in his views of "Destruction." To me, it seems as though some had better go to 'school' until they learn to spell c h a r i t y, charity; c o u r t e s y, courtesy; and when they get beyond that lesson, into reading, "In all things, whatsoever ye would men should do unto you, do ye even so to them," would be a good lesson.

My health is improving; but my sickness was so very serious, it takes time to get strong. The Lord has been good to me: praise his holy name. Let me have your prayers. Your Sister, in hope of Life through Christ.

SISTER HENRY will accept our thanks for her Photograph, which has just come to hand from Bunker Hill,—her home—in Ill. We judge it is a very good likeness. We would be glad to respond, but we have none of ourself on hand, and have not time to get any at present.—EDITOR.

A few words from Life Lover.

A friendly Christian greeting dear Editor, writers, and readers of the Herald of Life. Each week it comes to me laden with words of instruction, warning, encouragement and sympathy. How desirable to have such a medium through which we can converse with each other, though many a hill and dale, rock and stream intervene between us, rendering personal intercourse impracticable. How I love to embrace the dear scattered household, and commit their interests to Him who sustains the relation of a tender, loving Father to all the little flock, and to feel that others thus remember me, and that our petitions meet and mingle at the same mercy seat,

But methinks some of you have said, I wonder if "Life Lover" has not lost her interest in the glorious theme of life through Christ, as she speaks not to us as formerly? To this, my friends, I can answer emphatically, nay: though for the last few months wave after, wave of perplexity and sadness have threatened to obliterate my hope, I have been enabled to cling to the LIFE-GIVER, and find myself to day sustained by his promise of a better life. And now that the cold winter is past, and nature begins to feel the genial mildness of spring, I feel a fresh impulse to put forth greater efforts for the attainment of that life to come. As I walk abroad, and behold the streams flowing unfettered once more, the earnest desire rises that all the ice of selfishness, worldly-mindedness, self-righteousness and pride may be melted from my heart, that I may be wholly free in Christ—filled to rejoicing every day with his life-giving Spirit. And as the swelling leaves and bursting buds will soon clothe the trees with beauty, my determination is, that the profession which I have made shall be adorned with works of faith and labors of love.

O my brethern and sisters who are seeking a close union with the living vine, have we realized as we should the importance of being fruit-bearing branches? My heart sighs as I look at the multitude of professing Christians, but look in vain for the fruit which will assuredly be brought forth by those who are really in sympathy with Jesus. Of Him, the epitome of whose life is given thus, "He went about doing good," let us learn—sitting daily at his feet, taking lessons of self-denial, activity, patience, meakness and holy boldness. The time hastens on; now it must be very near, when those who are found meet, by a life of faith and holy obedience, will receive a kingdom eternal, and a crown immortal, and a life evermore. Will these be ours? God grant it for Christ's sake. More anon.

LIFE LOVER.

Haverhill, Mass. Apr., 1865.

Cheer up, Pilgrim.

What, pilgrim, art thou faint and weary in the way to Zion? Is thy burden heavier than thou canst bear? Cast thy burden upon the Lord, he will sustain thee; he will never suffer the righteous to be moved. Is the stormy wind and tempest abroad, and seest thou no shelter. God is thy refuge. Does thy vigor fail thee; and dost thou faint for very feebleness? God is thy strength. Do afflictions and sorrows gird thee round as a garment; and findest thou no friend to aid thee? God is a present help in time of trouble; and they that come unto him, he will in no wise cast out. Pilgrim, be of good cheer; hold thee on thy way. Is the river thou hast to cross deep and forbidding? Listen to the voice of thy Lord, "When thou passeth through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee." Do trials and persecutions beset thee? What readest thou? "They that will be godly, in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution." If the sorrows and cares of the world press thee down, cast them all on God, for he careth for thee; for the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting and his truth endureth to all generations; and they that trust in him shall be as mount Zion which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever. Yours seeking for immortality.

MERCY A. CONILLARD.

Swanville, Me., March 26, 1865.

ELD. J. LEWIS, Otto, Ill., writes:—I received the Tracts and Books, for which I am thankful. The grand fact is, the glorious bible doctrine of no resurrection of the wicked; no life only through Christ; the kingdom not a church nor a sky-kingdom; the future abode of the saints to be on the earth renewed, &c., are gaining ground rapidly, (praise the Lord) and some of the Priests seem to think their craft is in danger; so they get up a cry of "Infidel, Mormon," with many a warning of "Don't go near the old one armed preacher: he is a dangerous man." We have more calls to preach than we can possibly attend to. Praise the good Lord for health and strength to travel and labor. Now if any of the preaching brethren would come out here and spend the summer with us, in this large field of labor, we doubt not, it would be for the glory of God. We talk of having a Grove-meeting some time in the course of the summer, and we want help. Who will come? Let us know soon, so that we can make arrangements in season. The Tracts sent us, are all out preaching. People come miles to get them. Dear Brethern, if you cannot come yourselves to travel and preach, send on the tracts, and we will scatter them.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Get up your Grove-meeting, give us timely notice, and some of us here in the East will (the Lord willing) be with you on that occasion, and a season longer. Illinois must have help. Who is ready to say to the Lord, "Here am I, send me." Somebody, we are sure, will appear soon with those words on their lips and that spirit in their hearts. It must be so.

The letter and money you speak of, from Summum, was not received, but we now send the paper to John D. Hughes, as you direct, and credit him with the $2 "lost."

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this [illegible] neer in this branch of the life views.

ued lifeless ; when quickened by being made to breathe "the breath of life," or the life-affording breath, he became living man, or, living soul. Thus, in the language of Milton, "Man is a living being, intrinsically, and properly one and indivisible, not compound and separable, not according to the common opinion, made up and framed of two distinct and different natures, as of body and soul, but the whole man is soul, and the soul man ; that is to say, a body of substance individual, animated, sensitive, and rational."

Do Dogs Have Souls?

BY ELD. WILLARD GRIFFIN.

I have been asked the question, and I answer, Yes. The attributes of the human soul are thought, memory, reason, will, &c. These are possessed by dogs. In proof of which, I will state the following facts. I once had a dog which was in the habit of eating out of a wooden dish. On one occasion, when he was about to be fed, his dish could not be found, and he was fed without it. After several weeks, I one day insisted upon his finding his dish before being fed. He ran about the house several times, then went to the door, which was open, stood a minute and looked out into the fields, as if trying to recollect where he had left it, and then started off, went over a hill into a plowed field, dug up his dish, where he had buried it, and brought it home.

I have known a dog to open the door by putting his foot upon the thumb piece on the outside and lifting it with his nose on the inside. One of my acquaintances had a dog that was made to assist in doing the washing every Monday, by turning a wheel attached to a pounder in a barrel. At length, considering it a degredation to be employed in a business so un-dog-like, he devised a plan to shirk the responsibility. When Monday morning came he was among the missing, and did not return until evening; and so he continued to do regularly every week.

Two men were going up West Hartland mountain in a wagon; one of them had a dog, which was strolling along ahead of them; now and then darting out to chase a squirrel or partridge. About half way up the mountain, on the right hand, is a watering trough; on the left hand is a deep and dark ravine, through which, amidst rocks, trees, bushes, and briars, runs a stream of water. At the top of the mountain, half a mile from the watering trough, was a tavern. The owner of the dog, while expatiating upon his sagacity, threw his mittens down into the gorge as far as he could and told his doubting neighbor that when they arrived at the top of the mountain he would make his dog go back and find them. Accordingly when they reached the tavern he said to his dog, You go down to the watering trough, and down among the bushes, by the brook, you will find my mittens. The dog started off, and in less than half an hour returned with the mittens.

One of our farmers had a dog that had for many years been recognized as one of the family, and probably had never dreamed of seeking a home elsewhere. One evening a neighbor came in for a social chat; and in the course of conversation mention was made of the dog. His master said he was good for nothing, as he had got to be old, and he could not afford to keep him any longer; he was going to kill him. The neighbor said, don't kill him; give him to me, I'll take him. Well, said the farmer you may have him; and no more was said about him. After staying a while longer the neighbor rose to go home, when the dog, which till then had kept its place by the fire, started up, and, without any solicitation on the part of the neighbor followed him home, and remained with him, without ever manifesting any desire to go back to his former residence.

My grandfather had a dog which every winter evening kept his place on one corner of the hearth stone, where he lay, with his nose upon his paws, snuffing the warm radiations from a fire of logs that blazed brightly in the huge fireplace; and where the children would often laugh to hear him bark in his sleep; dreaming, perchance, of woodchucks, or red squirrels. One night as the family sat in a semicircle around the fire, while the cool refreshing streams of outer air, from between the logs of the cabin, were playing through their hair, and the November winds howling around the projecting corners, reminding them of the approach of a long and dreary winter, my grandfather remarked that "Lion" had got to be too old to keep through another winter, and he was going to kill him. When the family were about to retire to rest the dog went to the door and whined. He was let out with the expectation that he would soon return; but after waiting some time in vain to hear the scrape of his paw upon the door, they retired to rest. The next day the dog was missing. After several days my grandfather was wandering in the woods, when he discovered the dog snugly embedded in a heap of leaves, under a clump of bushes. He spoke to him kindly, and tried to coax him to leave his nest and go home with him; but he refused for some time, till after repeated assurances of safety and positive declarations that he should not be killed, he was at length induced to go home, where he lived till he died of old age.

Cronological Dates.

I am of the opinion that all the chief dates for ending the 6000 years, and the chronological periods, had better be given, so that all may have the means of choosing between them, that is, if they must have one. Dr. Elliot in 1864. Stevenson in 1866. Cumming and Shimeal, 1868. Baxter and Seiss, 1869 or 70. Bowen, 1873. Thurman, 1875. Dr. Gunner, 1877. Bliss and Dr. Hales, 1880.

Thus we have seven times before us, between this and 1880. These are fixed upon in nearly equal positiveness by the advocates of each. Some by a comparison of heathen and Bible Chronology with the precision of the equinoxes, as Shimeall, is sure he has demonstrated the correctness of 1868. Thurman, by setting aside all profane chronology, and all previous Biblical chronologers, and by a new calculation of eclipses, claims to have positively demonstrated the year 1875. Dr. Gunner, by a different process, equally sure, namely a chart thirty feet long, divided into six sections for millenaries, each into ten centuries, and these into years, and then taking up the dates of history, without forcing has wrought them into a mechanical and chronological demonstration of the year 1877, in harmony with Ptolemy's cannon, and the leading dates of most other chronologers

Bliss, by another process, has taken up the principal chronologers, and comparing them together, and all with the Bible, fixed on the year 1880. This is the year that Dr. Hales has fixed on also for the end. Having read and examined them all but one—Dr. G's, and compared them with history and the Bible, I choose 1880 as the most likely, though not with the positiveness of either, though I could be, as easily so as any one of them.

I think that each is near enough right for all practical uses, and constitute together a great argument for the end nigh, and against a particular year as within their, or our knowledge yet. The particular time God the Father can alone make known when the time for it comes. All till then, may approximate it, but not reach it with certainty. After 1880, there is a great vacancy among chronologers for the end for over a 100 years; and this shows we are to expect it between this and 1880, or else we are nowhere near right. But all things show his coming and the end is at hand, and that some one of these dates is likely right All should be ready and watching, and waiting his return.

NOTE BY EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE.—We take the foregoing from the Advent Herald. We do not indorse any of those years as the end of the 6000 since creation. We give them as a matter of passing ideas on the subject. We have no evidence, nor have we ever seen any, that 6000 years will bring the end of this age, or world. There is no "Thus saith the Lord" for any such position. We believe, however, that the time for the "fifth kingdom"—which is the kingdom of Messiah—cannot be far off; because we must be in the feet, if not the toes of Daniel's image, Dan. ii., which is the point where tyranical governments are to be overthrown, "or dashed in pieces." Let us live in reference to that fact, now "nigh;" and leave speculations about the exact time to such as choose to waste their energies on impossible undertakings.

Destiny of our Earth and Race.

A passage of Scripture, very clear and conclusive in its teachings on this subject is Daniel vii. 13, 14, and 27. This chapter of Daniel is one of the most remarkable portions of God's blessed word. It is remarkable for many things. Chief among these are its clearness, its continuity, and its comprehensiveness....

There are three things especially deserving our attention, in the prophecy now before us. The first of these is the time to which it refers.

It is clearly post-resurrection. It describes a state of things that can be realized only after the second coming of Christ has taken place.

This is manifest from the language used in v. 13: "I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven." Compare this language with that in which our Saviour distinctly foretells his second coming, and the identity of the two descriptions becomes apparent. In Matt. xxiv. 30, we read, "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

In Matt. xxvi. 64, we read: "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." The language in both these passages is so identical with that which the prophet uses that it seems impossible to resist the conclusion that it must have the same meaning in Daniel and in Matthew. Daniel, indeed, speaks of "one like the Son of man;" but it is evident that this is only a figure of speech to denote the Son of man himself. And if you admit that the person referred to by the prophet and the Evangelist is one and the same, then you must admit that the time contemplated in these several passages is the same, also. And as no one can doubt that the time of which our Saviour speaks, in the passages quoted from St. Matthew, is post-resurrection, or the time of his second coming, the conclusion follows, inevitably, that the time of which Daniel speaks, in the passage we are considering, must be post-resurrection also, or time connected with the second coming of Christ into our world. And this makes clear our first point, which is the time referred to in this prophecy of Daniel.

And so far as regards the bearing of this prophecy on our present subject, there is but a single point which it is important for us now to consider, and that is, who are the subjects of the kingdom here referred to. In Daniel vii. 27, it is spoken of as a kingdom which "all dominions" shall serve and obey. If this were all that was said about it, it would have been very difficult to throw much light on the particular point now before us. We should hardly have been able to affirm anything very clearly or definitely about it. But this is not all that is said about the subjects of this kingdom promised to the "Son of man," and to "the saints of the Most High," who are his resurrection people.

In the 14th verse, of this chapter, we have a much fuller designation given of the subjects of this kingdom. There we read, that "there was given Him," i. e. "the Son of man," "dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve Him." This cannot refer to the people whom Christ is now gathering to himself out of all lands. These, when Christ shall come again, will be in their resurrection state. They will constitute "the Church of the first-born." They will be "the saints of the Most High," spoken of in v. 27. With them "death will be swallowed up in victory;" "the corruptible will have put on incorruption; the mortal will have put on immortality." In that blessed state, to which they will then have attained, there will be found existing "neither Jew nor Gentile, neither male nor female." They will all be "made one with Christ." They will be "made perfect in Christ Jesus." With them all national distinction will be forever done away. The expressions, "people, nations, and languages," will not apply to them. It is clear, then, that they must all be set aside. It cannot be "the children of the resurrection," then, who are the subjects of this kingdom. And yet, clearly, it is the earth on which we dwell that is to be the theatre of this kingdom. For it is "under the whole heaven" (v 27) that this kingdom is established. And it is "all people, nations, and languages," who are to be the subjects of this kingdom....

These "people, nations, and languages," answer to "the nations of them that are saved," of whom St. John speaks as "walking in the light" of that glorious city which is to be revealed when "the new heavens and the new earth" are made. Thus, then, we have clear light on our second point. We see who are the subjects of this promised kingdom, and so are able to judge as to what the nature of that kingdom will be.

The other point to be noticed, in the prophecy before us, has to do with the duration of this kingdom.

Various expressions are made use of in this prophecy in reference to this duration. In verse 14, it is said, of "the Son of man," that "his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

In verse 27, it is again said, of this kingdom, that it shall be "an everlasting kingdom." And in verse 18, it is declared, still more emphatically, that "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever." Nothing could be more decided than this. It denotes unending duration in the most absolute and unqualified sense. The terms "everlasting" and "forever" are sometimes used in a limited sense....If they refer to a man, a tree, or a nation, then the duration will be the life of the man, or the existence of the tree or the nation. But we have seen that the kingdom of which Daniel here speaks is connected with "the new heavens and the new earth," or the state of things that is to follow after the resurrection shall have taken place. But we know that that is a state of things which will never pass away. It will be, in the most absolute and unlimited sense, perpetual, or eternal. And if this be so, then the terms "everlasting" and "forever, even forever and ever," here applied to the promised kingdom, must be taken in their broadest, fullest, and most unqalified meaning. They denote a kingdom which will last through eternity. And if the kingdom here described is to be thus enduring, then it follows, irresistibly, that the earth, which is the theatre of that kingdom, must be equally enduring, and "the people, nations, and languages" who are to be the subjects of that kingdom, must run on in successive generations, through the same period of unending duration. And thus the prophecy contained in Daniel vii. solves, satisfactorily, the great problem of "The Destiny of our Earth and Race."—Selected.

Letters and Extracts.

From Sister N. M. Henry.

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, March 29, 1865.

TO THE READERS OE THE HERALD:—I thought that I would refrain from writing to the friends through the paper until my return to Bunker Hill; but circumstances have caused me to snatch up my pen in my impulsive manner and write, and if our good Editor thinks it just fit to be consigned to oblivion, why I am perfectly content, knowing his judgment to be correct in what is right and proper for his numerous class of readers.

Well, about the circumstances. A brother has just made me a flying visit, who "heard that Sister Henry was in town, and came on purpose to see how she looked." After shaking hands cordially, and assuring himself that there was nothing either very formidable or very vicious in my looks, but that I looked like any other little woman, sewing, he asked me, "Did you know Sis, you had lost your character?" Why, no; said I, "I was not aware that I had met with such a serious loss! Come tell us about it." "Is it the decision of a 'Convention,' or Caucus, or the vote of the community at large?" I was so vain as to think my character in, at least, average standing; every body treats me well, and are kind, and respectful. I have friends every-where I go, both saint and sinner; good, bad, and indifferent, treat me with courtesy and kindness; and with four exceptions, (and they in every instance were professed Adventists) have I never received ill treatment. Let me "count my enemies" as Willis says. "Well Sis, that is easy done. I mean the counting; it was one man, and he a preacher, and once thought you was all right; but since you have written a certain article in the Herald of Life you are all wrong." Well, tell the brothor for me, that all the trouble is, I have advanced a little; but I will reach out my hand and help him over the difficulties. Please not to impale me, as I have seen people do Beetles; for sure, when they think me fixed, I shall manage to quietly go off the hook, about my Master's business.

I have never yet, in public, preached the non-ressurrection. I want to be posted thoroughly first. Perhaps, I hear some Br. say, "That's just what you can't be, for the Bible does not teach it." Hold there! I am surprised at the amount of evidence there is on the side of no life out of Christ; and I am determined to exercise my sight to investigate not only that, but all other scriptural questions. But although I have not, as yet, spoken of it in public, yet I call the attention of others to it, in family conversation. What light I have received, I manage to let shine on other dark minds, dark in the sense in which mine was, six, or seven months ago.

Well, I have counted the cost. If it takes my good name, let it go; but I would just remind the brethern and sisters that are so "down on us," they thought it hard when they were treated in the same manner by the Churches for daring to believe that Br. Storrs was right in his views of "Destruction." To me, it seems as though some had better go to 'school' until they learn to spell c h a r i t y, charity; c o u r t e s y, courtesy; and when they get beyond that lesson, into reading, "In all things, whatsoever ye would men should do unto you, do ye even so to them," would be a good lesson.

My health is improving; but my sickness was so very serious, it takes time to get strong. The Lord has been good to me: praise his holy name. Let me have your prayers. Your Sister, in hope of Life through Christ.

SISTER HENRY will accept our thanks for her Photograph, which has just come to hand from Bunker Hill,—her home—in Ill. We judge it is a very good likeness. We would be glad to respond, but we have none of ourself on hand, and have not time to get any at present.—EDITOR.

A few words from Life Lover.

A friendly Christian greeting dear Editor, writers, and readers of the Herald of Life. Each week it comes to me laden with words of instruction, warning, encouragement and sympathy. How desirable to have such a medium through which we can converse with each other, though many a hill and dale, rock and stream intervene between us, rendering personal intercourse impracticable. How I love to embrace the dear scattered household, and commit their interests to Him who sustains the relation of a tender, loving Father to all the little flock, and to feel that others thus remember me, and that our petitions meet and mingle at the same mercy seat,

But methinks some of you have said, I wonder if "Life Lover" has not lost her interest in the glorious theme of life through Christ, as she speaks not to us as formerly? To this, my friends, I can answer emphatically, nay: though for the last few months wave after wave of perplexity and sadness have threatened to obliterate my hope, I have been enabled to cling to the LIFE-GIVER, and find myself to day sustained by his promise of a better life. And now that the cold winter is past, and nature begins to feel the genial mildness of spring, I feel a fresh impulse to put forth greater efforts for the attainment of that life to come. As I walk abroad, and behold the streams flowing unfettered once more, the earnest desire rises that all the ice of selfishness, worldly-mindedness, self-righteousness and pride may be melted from my heart, that I may be wholly free in Christ—filled to rejoicing every day with his life-giving Spirit. And as the swelling leaves and bursting buds will soon clothe the trees with beauty, my determination is, that the profession which I have made shall be adorned with works of faith and labors of love.

O my brethern and sisters who are seeking a close union with the living vine, have we realized as we should the importance of being fruit-bearing branches? My heart sighs as I look at the multitude of professing Christians, but look in vain for the fruit which will assuredly be brought forth by those who are really in sympathy with Jesus. Of Him, the epitome of whose life is given thus, "He went about doing good," let us learn—sitting daily at his feet, taking lessons of self-denial, activity, patience, meakness and holy boldness. The time hastens on; now it must be very near, when those who are found meet, by a life of faith and holy obedience, will receive a kingdom eternal, and a crown immortal, and a life evermore. Will these be ours? God grant it for Christ's sake. More anon.

LIFE LOVER.

Haverhill, Mass. Apr., 1865.

Cheer up, Pilgrim.

What, pilgrim, art thou faint and weary in the way to Zion? Is thy burden heavier than thou canst bear? Cast thy burden upon the Lord, he will sustain thee ; he will never suffer the righteous to be moved. Is the stormy wind and tempest abroad, and seest thou no shelter. God is thy refuge. Does thy vigor fail thee ; and dost thou faint for very feebleness? God is thy strength. Do afflictions and sorrows gird thee round as a garment ; and findest thou no friend to aid thee? God is a present help in time of trouble ; and they that come unto him, he will in no wise cast out. Pilgrim, be of good cheer ; hold thee on thy way. Is the river thou hast to cross deep and forbidding? Listen to the voice of thy Lord, "When thou passeth through the waters, I will be with thee ; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee." Do trials and persecutions beset thee? What readest thou? "They that will be godly, in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution." If the sorrows and cares of the world press thee down, cast them all on God, for he careth for thee ; for the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting and his truth endureth to all generations ; and they that trust in him shall be as mount Zion which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever. Yours seeking for immortality.

MERCY A. CONILLARD.

Swanville, Me., March 26, 1865.

ELD. J. LEWIS, Otto, Ill., writes:—I received the Tracts and Books, for which I am thankful. The grand fact is, the glorious bible doctrine of no resurrection of the wicked; no life only through Christ; the kingdom not a church nor a sky-kingdom; the future abode of the saints to be on the earth renewed, &c., are gaining ground rapidly, (praise the Lord) and some of the Priests seem to think their craft is in danger; so they get up a cry of "Infidel, Mormon," with many a warning of "Don't go near the old one armed preacher: he is a dangerous man." We have more calls to preach than we can possibly attend to. Praise the good Lord for health and strength to travel and labor. Now if any of the preaching brethren would come out here and spend the summer with us, in this large field of labor, we doubt not, it would be for the glory of God. We talk of having a Grove-meeting some time in the course of the summer, and we want help. Who will come? Let us know soon, so that we can make arrangements in season. The Tracts sent us, are all out preaching. People come miles to get them. Dear Brethern, if you cannot come yourselves to travel and preach, send on the tracts, and we will scatter them.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Get up your Grove-meeting, give us timely notice, and some of us here in the East will (the Lord willing) be with you on that occasion, and a season longer. Illinois must have help. Who is ready to say to the Lord, "Here am I, send me." Somebody, we are sure, will appear soon with those words on their lips and that spirit in their hearts. It must be so.

The letter and money you speak of, from Summum, was not received, but we now send the paper to John D. Hughes, as you direct, and credit him with the $2 "lost."

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with no regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this [illegible] neer in this branch of the life views.

THE CAPTIVE MAIDEN.

"The Syrians brought away captive out of the Land of Israel, a little maid."

War was in the land! O'er hill and valley
Sounded, long and loud, the battle-trumpet's
Pealing notes; calling the people to drive
Back the heathen horde, that would molest the Heritage of God's own chosen ones,—the Land to Israel given. The marshaled hosts were Gathered for the fray. The champing war-steed,—
Rearing proudly forth his plumed rider,— Rushed with hot and eager haste to meet the Invading foe.

The crash and din was heard
Afar. Fierce raged the conflict. Shield, spear, and Glittering crest flashed, quivering in the sun-light.
Israel was sore pressed, and cried to God,—
That God who never yet was sought in vain.
He bared his arm; and 'mid confusion dire,
The uncircumcised,—that thought to lay the Coast of Israel waste,—were vanquished, put to Worst, before the angry face of Israel's
God.

Yet one small town was sacked. And forth they Led among the captives, one, a little Maid. To Naaman's wife, the little one was Brought, to wait her will. Now Naaman, Captain
Of the king of Syria's host, was leprous.
Long had he sought, and sought in vain, for aught
To heal the grievous plague. Alone he dwelt;
Nor dared to intrude his tainted presence in
The home where health and beauty lingered but
To mock and aggravate his deepening woe.
The captive maiden,—e'en in her distress,—
Could see the brooding cloud which, like a dark
And heavy pall, hung o'er that sorrowing house.
And, pitying, thus she spoke, "Would God my lord
Could see the prophet who in Israel dwells,
For he the foul disease could take away."
These words were told unto the king. And straight,
With royal pomp, in haste he sent the lord
The boon to crave. Then Israel's king was wroth,
And deemed he sought occasion to invade
The land.

The prophet heard and answered, "Let Him come to me, and he shall know there is A God in Israel." With chariot then,
And horses, Naaman came and stood before
The prophet's gate. Now mark the word he sent.
"Go, dip in Jordan seven times, and like
The flesh of little child, pure, sweet, and fair,
Thy flesh shall be." "And is that all?" he cried
In rage. "In Jordan bathe! Surely the streams
Of Syria's fertile, palmy vales, that glide
From Lebanon's bold, snow-capped mountain's side
Will better heal; I will NOT thus go dip
In Jordan's tide." But better thoughts prevailed,
And going down, his pestilential, scared,
And loathsome form, was laid beneath the sweet,
Cool, rippling wave, seven times, and he came forth
Renewed. With body whole, and soul oerwhelmed,
He vowed that ne'er again to other gods
Would he bow down. He found that Israel's God
Was God alone.

'Tis thus the message comes
To us. Sin, deep and dark, covers as with
The leprous spot the soul that wanders far
In by and hidden paths. But Jesus says,
"Come, wash in my redeeming blood. Then fair
And white as spotless wool, your souls shall be."
But unbelief—proud, stubborn, blind—will not Accept the proffered aid. O! let us not Neglect the call. But purified from sin
And stain, will bow before the feet of Him,
Who shed for us his blood on Calvary's tree.

MARIE S.

"ALL MAY BE ONE."

"That they all may be one; as thou Father, art in me and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."—John xvii. 21.

Before Jesus ascended to heaven, he offered up one fervent petition to his Father in behalf of his humble followers. It was, so to speak, his last words; embodying his dying counsel—left on record to the Church, an everlasting memorial of the desire of their sovereign Head. The petition was, "That they all may be one." As if He had said, "Father I have, left the glories of heaven; I have descended upon the sin polluted earth, and I have planted the tree of love. Let the plant be watered with the dew of heaven, let the sun shed his reviving beams upon it, and let it flourish and bring forth fruit abundantly in the vineyard of the Lord."

That his mission might be demonstrated to be from God, he instituted a new order of things. Love is to succeed to hatred; peace to war; good will to malice; and all the principles of human nature are to be roused. Instead of being arrayed in hostile parties, like the men of the world; instead of the maxims of human society governing their actions, the heavenly maxims of rendering good for evil, a blessing for a curse, were to be implicitly followed. Society was to be purified, renovated, and fitted for heavenly mansions.

All the combinations or compacts of men have been based on principles of supreme selfishness; but the Lord from heaven forms a compact for the purposes of disinterested benevolence. All the associations of men are constituted of jarring elements; but this association is based on a principle of pure and perfect love. Other organizations are sustained by the power of the sword; this is not to be defended by carnal weapons. The kingdom of Christ is not of this world; hence, his servants will not fight. It is to be an exhibition of the sovereign power of love to melt the heart and subdue the obstinate and rebellious spirit. It is to be one grand demonstration to the world of the excellence of divine love, as illustrated in the followers of Christ. It is to exemplify that disposition of the heart, that action in the life which will be diametrically opposite to the natural inclinations of man.

The Union between the members of Christ's Church is not to be measured by the standard of earthly associations. Nay, it transcends even the bands of angelic communion, and rises to that divine standard of fellowship which exists between the Father and the Son of his love. That holy, divine union, that eternal oneness which obtained between God and his Son, was to characterize the disciples of Christ. Was there ever a jarring feeling between them? Have there ever been conflicting interests? Never. A union of purpose; a harmony of feeling; an identity of interests have ever been manifest between the Father and the Son; full, perfect, eternal love; an unbroken fellowship; an intimate, indissoluble union has forever bound their affections in perpetual unanimity.

This, then, is the standard of Church fellowship. This divine union is the model for union among the members of the Church; this infinite and eternal love is to be the spirit by which the Church are to be actuated. No discordant principles are for a moment to be tolerated; no more splitting asunder and arraying themselves under different banners, and having a collision of interests, than exists between the Eather and his dearly beloved Son. No more disaffection, nor party strife, than is found at the throne of God. As Jesus and his Father are one, so are all the followers of Christ to be one.

As the work of redemption is accomplished by the united energy, the combined and harmonious effort of the Father and his Son, so the instrumentality of the Church is to be developed in the concentrated energy and harmonious action of all its members. Inasmuch as no associations of men have ever been free from conflicting elements, the Church exemplifying a holy, heavenly union, will stand forth as a living embodiment of love; a practical demonstration of the power of the gospel to subdue the evil passions of men. Indeed so perfect will be the renovation and transformation, so unearthly the band of union, that the association will bear the impress of the heavenly; the stamp of the divinity.

O my beloved Brn., when I think of the fervent prayer of the great Captain of our salvation that believes in him might be one in the same manner as He and his Father are one; when I meditate on that divine standard of fellowship and communion, I am lead to fear that the Church is not at present in that state of pure and perfect love to Christ and all his followers, that the prayer of the blessed Saviour implies. Is it not high time to rally around the banner of the cross, with such a sipirit of entire consecration as shall dispel every unhallowed affection, and create a bond of union that will be perpetuated in the kingdom of God.

ANGLO-SAXONS: RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

The following extract is from a work published some years since by the Chevalier Bunsen, on "Signs of the Times: Letters to Ernst Moritz Arndt, on the Dangers to Religious Liberty in the Present State of the World;" and is a tribute to the Anglo-Saxon race:

"Now if we take a comprehensive survey of the development of the human mind and Christian nations during the last eleven centuries, the fact instantly arrests our eye, that the Anglo-Saxon race is that which has exhibited the greatest amount of creative and constructive energy, and, moreover, in a continually increasing ratio of importance to the history of the world at large. This was first exhibited by the West Frisian branch in the free states of Holland; and if at first their own institutions displayed some remnants of the spirit of religious intolerance, forgetting they had revolted and combated against the intolerance of Spain, this blot was gradually effaced under the influence of the essential principles of liberty, so that we see them already in the seventeenth century the first nation in Europe to proclaim and practice toleration as the principle of a Christian state. Thus did they worthily atone before God and man for their former violence, in which, however, they no doubt rather saw the averting of unjustifiable attempts on the part of foreigners to disturb their tranquility, than a crime against religious toleration. But this atonement was first consecrated as a principle of universal authority by their noble brethren in England and America, who established it as a fundamental law that the State has no right or power to meddle with liberty of conscience, and thus uttered the most solemn acknowledgement that mutual toleration is the true and only valid proof of Christian faith before God and man.

"Here we encounter some curious coincidences of times and races. The bloody deed of pagan intolerance, whose adversary we this day commemorate, belongs to the middle of the eight century. Eight centuries later, it was the Anglo-Saxons of England who set bounds to the atrocious intolerance and persecutions of Spain; and it must be confessed that the intolerance of the Frisians was mere child's play compared to the Spanish methods of conversion, and the dark horrors of the Inquisition. And without all question this Inquisition, with its racks and scaffolds, had grown up out of the ecclesiastical system of Boniface. Long before the grand inquisitor, Torquemada, toward the end of the fifteenth century, brought the holy office into Spain, it had been employed from its seat in Rome against the Albigenses; and Pope Paul IV. celebrated the eight hundredth festival of St. Boniface with the universal introduction of that tribunal. Was Germany in that age less God-fearing than Spain, with its rigid exclusiveness, because in 1555 she signed the treaty of religious peace at Augsburgh? Would this treaty itself have been more, or less, Christian, and rich in blessing, if it had conceded a large measure of freedom? And is Spain, (in the year 1855,) more Christian, more moral, more happy than Germany, where, according to the expression of the Curia, "heretics rage unpunished?"

"It was thirty-three years later, in the summer of 1588, that the English Anglo-Saxons saved the mental and political freedom of Europe, and the honor of Christendom, by repulsing from their their shores the vaunted giant fleet of Spain, and rendering it possible for the hardly-pressed West Frisians victoriously to achieve their liberation from the Spanish yoke. Just one century after, in the year 1688, the same Anglo Saxions raised the principle of religious liberty into a fundamental law of England, when they put an end to ecclesiastical dominion by the expulsion of the Stuarts, who forgot their oaths and their national history.

"It was a great prince of these same West Frisians who naturalized on English soil the religious freedom already successfully conquered by the Dutch. But already, during the contest with the Stuarts, English heroes of the Spirit, themselves martyrs of religious intolerance, had, as Pilgrim fathers and apostles, laid the foundation of that mighty empire beyond the Atlantic, which, on the declaration of its independence, proclaimed the principle of religious liberty, no longer of mere toleration."

COLONIZATION: LIBERIA.

We never had any favor for Colonization as a means of abolishing Slavery; and ever regarded it, while it made that a pretence for its work, as a deception and a fraud on the anti-slavery sentiment which had begun to develop itself at the time the Colonization Societies came into existence. But as God can cause the wrath of man to praise him, so He can and often does cause the schemes of wicked and unprincipled men to do it. In the scheme of Colonization there was a strange mixture of good and evil designs. The good men engaged in it with intentions of good: the evil men with the design to strengthen slavery by removing one cause of disquiet to the slave—the free colored people—and and as a sop to the rising spirit of anti-slavery which was gathering strength in the North. But those times are past, and we are rejoiced to know that God has caused the scheme, whatever were the intentions of its promoters, to work good to Africa.

The following extracts from the Annual Report of the Vt. Colonization Society will be read with interest. It says:

"Forty-two years ago an adopted son of Vermont, the brave and pious Ashmun, landed from the brig Strong, on Cape Messuardo, with a little band of sable men and women. He shared their perils, instructed them in their great work, and led them in their defence against hostile barbarians. On every side, except by sea, he was surrounded by people who had superadded to the common vices of a savage state, all those that savages were capable of learning from long intercourse with pirates and slaves traders. His little band pitched their tents upon a coast which had been for a century the chief seat of slave-trade, and from which, but the year before, 'twenty thousrnd slaves had been shipped to hopeless bondage.'

"Who are these pilgrims? And for what purpose had they come, periling health and life, by land and sea, and among false brethren? They were the exiled children of Africa. They had come with an object before them, clear and well defined. They had come to establish a civilized nationality amid the scenes of cruelty and barbarism. How were they fitted for such a work? They had no prestige of social elevation here. Like the pilgrims of the Mayflower, the fathers of Liberia were few in number, and poor in the wealth of this world. But God had trained them for their work in the school of affliction, as He trained the Israelites in Egypt to qualify them to take possession of Canaan; and as he trained the Puritans to Christianize this continent. Some of these African pilgrims were intelligent Christian men. They carried with them the English language, bible, laws, manners and customs. They carried with them all the lessons in respect to civil, social and religious liberty, and the government of a State, which our fathers had learned in two hundred years. This garnered experience of the working of a republican government was all their own.

"The brief space of forty-two years has passed, and what do we see to-day as the result of these humble beginnings? We see the slave trade abolished over a section as large as the six New England States. The cries and groans of the pirate's victims have given place to the voice of Christian worship, and to the cheerful sounds of voluntary industry. We see a stable and well ordered republic, with a constitution like our own, administered wholly by colored men. We see churches and schools, and a college, with twenty-three students and faculty of liberally educated colored men. We see thousands of re-captives, rescued from slave ships, associated with settlers, assimilated to Christian habits and received as citizens into the bosom of the State. We see there the steam engine, the sugar mill, the cotten gin, and the printing press.

"Such results has God wrought through the humble, but efficient agency of Colonization. And truly may we say, 'The people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death, Light is sprung up.' Matt. iv. 16. This language of inspiration, indicating a great change in the moral condition of a people, has seldom, if ever, found a more fitting application than in the case before us.

"May we not then—shall we not give thanks to God for the glorious results of our work, and take courage to labor and pray more, and to give more liberally for extending these benign results over that whole domain of sin and suffering? And to the doubting and prejudiced, who have opposed us, or stood aloof, we would put the question, 'What think ye of this, our work? If you do not approve it, has not God approved it, and set to it the seal of His approbation, as His chosen agency for the redemption of long neglected Africa?' We may thank God that we have been permitted to bear some humble part in this work. At the same time should feel humbled that we have done so little."

HUGH MILLER AND DRINK.—When employed as a mason, it was usual for his fellow-workmen to have as occasional treat of drink, and one day two glasses of whiskey fell to his share, which he swallowed. When he reached home he found, opening his favorite book—"Bacon's Essays"—that the letters danced before his eyes, and that he could no longer master the sense. "The condition," says he, "into which I had brought myself, was, I felt, one of degradation. I had sunk, by my own act, for the time, to a lower level of intelligence than that on which it was my privilege to be placed, and although the state could have been no very favorable one for forming a resolution, I in that hour determined that I never should again sacrifice my capacity of intellectual enjoyment to a drinking usage; and, with God's help, I was enabled to hold by the determination."

RESISTING TEMPTATION.—Frequent and fierce is the devil in his attacks, on all sides besieging our salvation. We therefore must watch and be sober, and every where fortify ourselves against his assault; for if he but gain some slight vantage ground, he goes on to make for himself a broad passage, and by degrees introduces all his forces.—Chrysostom.

A BLESSED ENCOMIUM.—Of the late Samuel Fletcher, Esq., of Manchester, England, a Christian merchant as eminently distinguished for his large and active benevolence as for his commercial prosperity, it is said:

"Had he allowed the sums lent to religion and humanity to accumulate he might easily have died a millionaire. But he not only put his money to a more profitable usury; he reaped at the very time a greater as well as a purer gratification than he could have done by seeing the glittesing heap grow larger. He was happy in having it to give; still happier in being willing to give it; and not least happy in this, that he left not one member of his family who wished that he had given less to the exchecquer of the poor, or to the treasury of God; or that he had died richer by any diminution of his alms to the poor, the halt, the blind, the orphan or the widow."

Children's Department.

"HE BLESSED THEM."

It is related of Washington Irving, that when he was a little boy about five years old, he saw Gen. Washington in New York; his nurse carried him into a store where the General was, and said, "Please your honor, this little fellow is named after you." The great and good man smiled on the child, and laid his hand on his head and blessed him. Mr. Irving lived to be an old man, and a very distinguished one; he was known over almost all the civilized world; he saw and talked with kings and great men—yet he remembered how Washington looked when he gave him his blessing—it must have been very pleasant to him in his old age, when he was honored at home and abroad, to remember that the great Father of his country laid his hand on his head, and blessed him when he was a little boy.

Almost two thousand years ago, there was one on earth greater than Gen. Washington, yes infinitely greater than all men or angels; this was Jesus Christ, the Son of God. He was all powerful: He could raise the dead, cast out devils, still the raging tempests. He created worlds and all things were made by him. He was as good as he was great; for he came on earth to suffer and die, that we might be saved, and after he was dead he rose from the grave and went to his glorious and happy home in heaven.

Once while He was on earth, some little children were brought to the good Lord Jesus, and he took them in his arms, and laid his sacred hands on their heads, and blessed them. How do you suppose these children must have felt when they were old enough to know that they had once been in the arms of him who was their Saviour? If they were Christians, their feelings must have been joyful and awful beyond description. Let us imagine that they lived to be old men, and after having been separated many years, they met again near the spot where the divine Saviour had blessed them when they were little children. One man older than the rest speaks and says: "O, my brothers, do you remember the time when our Lord Jesus took us in his arms and blessed us? You were very young; you hardly remember how he looked and spoke; I was a little older, and will remind you of what happened." "O, brother," replied the youngest, "could we ever forget the light of those divine eyes, which sunk into our souls never to be darkened through time or eternity? Their heavenly brightness has been our guide through all our wanderings; the impression of the sacred hands rests forever on our heads; that gracious blessing sounds evermore in our ears, sweeter than the voice of a silver trumpet! O, that our pilgrimage was done, that we might see once more, and forever, the face of our blessed Lord and Saviour! O, my brethern, we are more favored than all the children of men: we have rested on the bosom of our Lord—we have felt the beatings of his sacred heart—we have seen his eyes beaming on us, and heard his voice. He blessed us when we were little children, and we can now rejoice in the thought that we have tried to serve him on earth, and that we shall glorify him through all eternity." Such might be some of the reflections of these old men. What little child does not wish that he had been one whom the Saviour so kindly took into his arms and blessed? Little children, though you cannot see him, the Saviour is ready to take you all into his arms and bless you, as he did the little Jewish children, nearly two thousand years years ago.—Selected.

THE STORY OF BETHANY.

My young friends, do you realize how much is contained in this wonderful story? The first we learn in regard to it is, that Jesus being in Bethany a certain woman named Martha received him into her house. She also had a sister who was so captivated with Jesus' conversation that she sat at his feet eager to catch every word that fell from his sacred lips; while her sister was bustling about to prepare, perhaps, a sumptuous entertainment, she was lost to the thought of what they should eat or drink. Jesus, who knew the thoughts of her heart, readily discovered that she was feeding upon bread that would never perish; hence his reply to Martha, when she pettishly said to him, Do you not care that Mary has left me to get supper alone? bid her to help me. How affectionately, yet faithfully did Jesus rebuke her saying, O Martha you are troubled about many things, but Mary has chosen a privilege which she shall enjoy and no one shall take it from her.

The next we learn of these sisters they are in affliction: a beloved Brother is sick, and they send for Jesus. The tender affection existing between them is plainly seen in the message, "He whom thou lovest is sick." Jesus did not go even when he knew the loved one was dead, and the sorrowing Sisters were following to the grave the lifeless form of their Brother Lazarus.

Now why did he not go? His remark to his disciples shows the reason. I am glad I was not there, that ye may believe. We find him making a similar remark to Martha when she objected to removing the stone from the grave, fearing that decomposition had taken place. He said, if you will believe you shall see the glory of God. Believe what? Believe in him as the resurrection and the life. And when the buried form of their brother, bound about with grave clothes, arose from the tomb at the command of Jesus, think you not that they had some idea of the power of Jesus? Would Martha again object to the removal of a stone from a grave when Jesus commanded it? O, with what gratitude did they return to their desolate home, with their Brother made alive from the dead. Do you not imagine that the name of Jesus was ever on their, lips as they gathered around their evening fireside, or partook of the good things God had provided? Lazarus must ever have been to them a memento of Jesus' power and love: how much more than if He had gone to Bethany when sent for, and restored him to health, and above all, the glorious doctrine of the resurrection could not have been demonstrated to eye witneses, and fixed indelibly upon their minds, and through them transmitted to coming generations.

He must find them manifesting their desire to comfort and bless Him who had done so much for them. A supper is prepared, Jesus and Lazarus are seated at the hospitable board, while Martha serves with her wonted ability and eagerness to please. Mary believing Christ's words, that He was to be made an offering for sin, and rise again the third day, came behind him, and brake a box of costly ointment and poured it on his head. How rich the opportunity; how freely bestowed this costly offering. Some present were offended at the waste of the ointment. Jesus fully commended what she had done, knowing the thoughts of her heart, and that to anoint his body for the burial she had used it; and also that wherever this gospel was preached this story would be told of her. That we have this to contemplate, eighteen hundred and sixty five years after, is a standing proof of His prophetic power, and that his words will not fail. Though heaven and earth should pass away, yet His words will not pass away.

Let us my young friends, believe and obey his word, that when Christ who is our life shall appear, we shall be with him in glory.

AUNT LUCRETIA.

ABRAHAM'S TRIAL

In the night God spake to Abraham. He spoke terrible words this time. He told Abraham to take Isaac, his dear son, whom he loved so much, and go with him a long way from home, to the top of a high mountain, and build an altar, and offer him for a burnt offering.

Could Abraham do this? It does not seem as if he could. But you know he had always obeyed God instantly. Would he now?

The Bible says, "And Abraham rose up early in the morning and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him."

Yes Abraham would obey God perfectly. He did not hesitate. He did not loiter. He did not wait till late in the afternoon. He rose up early in the morning and went. He did not, probably, tell Sarah where he was going, or what he was going to do. Isaac knew his father was going to offer an offering to the Lord, for he saw the wood and all the preperations.

They were to journey three days. It was a sorrowful time for Abraham; but Isaac, I suppose, talked pleasantly along with his father and the servants, little thinking what was to come. At last, on the third day, they saw a mountain in the distance, and Abraham knew that was the place. Then he stopped, and took the wood and laid it on Isaac's shoulders, and he took fire and a knife in his hand; and they went on, telling the servants to wait until they came back. As they were walking along together, Isaac spoke to his father, "My father, behold the fire and wood; but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" His father did not tell him. He said, "My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering." So they went silently on, until they came to the top of the mountain.

Do you know what mountain that was? It was called Moriah. On that mountain the city of Jerusalem was afterwards built, and there Jesus, our Saviour, the Lamb of God, was crucified.

When they reached the top, Abranam and Isaac heaped up stones, and made an altar, then Abraham told Isaac that he was to be God's lamb. He bound his hands and feet with cords, and laid him on the wood.

How could Abraham do so? Because he had trusted God so entirely, that he would do anything God bade him. How could Isaac let his father bind him and kill him, without saying a word? Because he had always been taught to obey his father and his father's God, without a question. Why did God try Abraham so, and tell him to do so dreadful a thing? I will try to explain this to you. God wished to teach Abraham more about himself than he had ever known yet.

Just as Abraham was lifting up the knife to kill Isaac, God spoke to him, and told him to stop. "Lay not thy hand upon the lad," he said, "neither do thou anything unto him; for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not witheld thy son, thine only son, from me." So Abraham unbound Isaac, and offered a sheep, that he found near by, which God had sent there on purpose. It was caught by its horns in a bush.

Then God spake again with Abraham, and promised to bless him with the richest blessings, because he had trusted him so perfectly. I suppose too, that God now showed Abraham the things that would come to pass in that mountain. I suppose he told him that he would some day give his only Son, his well beloved Son, to die a cruel death, on that very spot, for the salvation of sinners. As Isaac went up the mountain, carrying the wood, so would God's precious Son carry the heavy cross. As Abraham himself lifted the knife to slay his darling child, so God would permit wicked men to kill his holy Son, and would seem to be cruel to him, and all this he would do so that sinners might be forgiven, and made holy, and fit for the kingdom of heaven. O, how good is God! How wonderfully good! And Abraham, hearing this, could not be sorry that he had suffered so those three sad days, for he had learned a great deal of the kindness and mercy that is in the heart of God. He had obeyed God, too, and had been blessed for it. And after all, he was not going home alone, to tell Sarah that she had now no child. No; Isaac was going with him, alive and well. I don't think Abraham ever wished he had been spared that trial.

We may always obey God, and trust him, for he always loves us, and is seeking our good. He means only kindness when he tries us most severely. You may trust him to save you and forgive your sins, for he loves you so much that he gave his Son to die for you. Your mothers may give you to him without fear. He has been planning your eternal life thousands of years. We need never be afraid of God, but only afraid of ourselves that we shall not be sorry for our sins, and love and obey him with all our hearts He says, "I love them that love me."—Selected.

THE PASSOVER IN PHILADELPHIA.

Br. Storrs:—The brethren in this City, believing in the yearly observance of the Lord's Supper upon the anniversary of the Passover, met on Monday evening, 10th inst., at Cor. of Ninth and Callowhill Streets, and kept the feast in christian remembrance of the event and word which authorized its establishment; and joyful apprehension of the coming glory, which its perpetuation ever leads us hopefully to anticipate. Some thirty-five were present.

The evening being stormy, quite a number were kept away. Perhaps ten or twelve more might be counted as holding to this mode of obeying the Head of the church in this commemorative and expectant ordinance.

It is proper that we should mention that quite a goodly number of our brethren who meet with us, believe in the holding of this service more frequently, and not, specially, upon the anniversary of the "Last Supper," which the Lord, after his great desire, ate with his disciples, before he went hence. But I may remark, with assurance, that there is no quarrel among us. We have different opinions, in the meeting on this and other topics; but we hold to liberty of conscience, among ourselves.

But to return to our report. The occasion was one of great interest and solemn joy. I have never been so fully impressed with the festive character of the service. Or perhaps more properly, that the children of God should rejoice when they meet to celebrate the great redemptive position of Christ, "our passover" who is "sacrificed for us." It was a season of unmingled joy. The "passover time," which we enjoyed at Kast Hall, Boston, last year was good; but this excelled it altogether. We feasted together in the name of the Lord. It was the blessed reflection upon the work of our Saviour and the contemplation of the future feast; the marriage festival of the Lamb.

The meeting was opened by reading the scriptures, prayer, and singing several songs, of Zion; after which followed some speaking, in which great facts of scripture were noticed; the deliverance of Israel, celebrated by the Passover referred to, especially when God "rolled off the reproach of Egypt," at Gilgal: then free interchange of thought, upon the theme of redemption, while we partook of a plain, simple repast. And we were very happy. I never did enjoy an occasion of the kind so well (I mean the Lord's Supper service), and it appeared to be the sentiment of all, that we had nothing to do but to rejoice. At the close, we solemnly passed the unleavened bread, which we broke; and also drank of the cup, after the Lord's command, and by the consecration he has appointed; then singing a beautiful hymn, we retired.

One feature of the service to me gave evidence of the fact that the Lord was indeed remembered; which was, that the poor and the sick who could not be present were remembered, and spoken of. I felt, as others did, a union with the dear saints of like precious faith and confession all over the land. May the Great Master grant his blessing to the scattered flock.

OUR ANNUAL FEAST.

Dorchester, Mass., April 11, 1865.

Last evening, although quite stormy, about forty followers of Christ, repaired to Kast Hall, Boston, to commemorate the sufferings and death of our blessed Jesus. It was a season long to be remembered. The Spirit of Christ came down on the little flock gathered together. We felt especially strengthened by the Lord.

Gathering around the board we partook of a simple repast, indulging meanwhile in social conversation. It was an occasion of peculiar interest. Love and harmony reigned triumphant. There was nothing to mar or disturb the beauty of the scene; but love beamed from the countenances of all present. After prayer and suitable remarks, the "broken bread," and "wine" were passed, and we all partook of the emblems of the Lord's body. A holy calm pervaded the scene, as we ate the bread and drank the wine in remembrance" of Him. Hymns were sung, tesmonies were given, all breathing the same spirit of love and concord. All seemed to be desirous of living nearer to Christ, than ever before. As we sat around the board, the thought came vividly to my mind, of the great gathering we should have in the kingdom of God, at the "marriage supper of the Lamb," where we should meet Jesus our blessed Life-giver, the prophets, apostles, and all the holy ones of old; and my thoughts wandered to many, now sleeping in Jesus, that we should see around the table of our Lord. It was a pleasant interview, last evening, with some I had not seen for some time; but oh, how sweet will be the meeting with those that now lie sweetly sleeping in Jesus! The thought of that great meeting gave me joy; for I thought that there, we no more should watch with aching hearts the fading form, the weary sigh, no more should see our highest hopes dashed to the earth in one short hour, but we should meet the loved and lost, in that better land, and should see them radiant in beauty, blooming with immortality; should clasp them to our heart in one long embrace, and never part again.

Communion was always an interesting ordinance to me; but last evening it was unusually so. It was the most interesting season of my life, and one I shall always look back to with feelings of joy. I felt while eating the broken bread, the emblem of our Lord's body, that I was eating by faith, the "bread that from Heaven came down." I realized, to a full extent, the words of Jesus, "I am the bread of life." I laid hold of his promise with increased confidence, "He that cometh to me, shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me, shall never thirst." The words of Jesus were sweet to me, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." A sweet solemnity rested upon the company assembled as we thus feasted on Jesus' love. A little past nine o'clock we parted, many if not all satisfied that their time had been well spent, and resolving in the strength of Jesus, to walk "after the Spirit" more than ever before; to consecrate themselves more fully to the service of Christ, and to press forward with renewed vigor, for the prize at the end of the race. Thus ended one of the happiest seasons of my life, the recollection of which, will not soon be effaced from my memory.

THE END OF THE WICKED.

Rev. Samuel Bourn, England, about a century ago, in a discourse on "The Gospel Doctrine of Future Punishment," brought out, distinctly, that the end of the wicked will be extinction of being. We never saw any of his writings till some years after we preached our "Six Sermons" on the question, and had published several editions of them. We give the following extracts from Bourn's discourse, which will go to show that truth has had its struggles for life in the past, though often strangled by Popish superstitions. Bourn speaks as follows:

The Gospel Doctrine of a total everlasting destruction is much more adapted to bring sinners to repentance than the doctrine of endless misery and torment: because they may be convinced of the reason and justice of the former; but never can be so, of the latter. And it is of the greatest importance that men be convinced, not only that they shall suffer for their sins, but also that they shall suffer justly, and no more than their guilt deserves. It is indeed highly requisite, that men should have a profound reverence for the Supreme Being, and a fearful apprehension of the punishment due to wickedness: but it is equally requisite, that this fear be built upon a reasonable foundation, and a persuasion of the justice of that punishment: it ought to be the fear of a most righteous and merciful Governor, who punishes in due measure, and to answer a wise and benificent purpose; not of an unjust and merciless tyrant, "who punishes without measure or end to satisfy implacable and eternal resentment." The former is a motive proper to bring sinners to repentance, convincing them, that if they persist in their wickedness, it will become right and fit in the great Governor of the world, and requisite to the ends of his goodness, to punish and destroy them for ever, in order to put an end to their wickedness; and for an example to others. But the doctrine of an eternal preservation in the most dreadful torments is not proper to bring men to repentance, or to promote virtue in the world. On the contrary, this anti-christian doctrine hath actually produced much wickedness, and of the worst kind, and hath served also to harden men in it....

The only way to promote sobriety, justice, humanity, and every virtue in the world, is by representing truly and recommending strongly the characters of the Deity and his government, as contained in the real doctrines of our Saviour and his Apostles: that he is the most just and merciful Father and Governor of all mankind; who will by no means clear the guilty, or suffer the impenitent workers of iniquity to escape, but will assuredly punish them with an everlasting destruction from his own presence and by his own glorious power; but who in all the measures of his government intends the best ends, and to promote the good of the whole; to destroy for ever, not to preserve for ever, the souls of the wicked; to make virtue and happiness, not wickedness and misery, everlasting. This belief of religion will have a most happy effect, in reclaiming men from vice and exciting them to virtue, and is every way proper to engage our reverence of God and our charity to all men, to make us love the Lord our God, and serve him with all our heart, and soul, and mind, and strength; which is our highest excellence and happiness.

To sum up the whole in a few words. To increase wickedness and misery in the creation, and to make them endless, is the work and design of the devil. To impute the same design to the all-perfect, and ever-blessed God, is no better than the greatest impiety. And to imagine that such a doctrine can do any good in the world, is great weakness and folly. Some men are amazingly forward, even while they praise God with their mouth, to harbor and an ill opinion of him in their hearts, and suspect him of having unjust or cruel designs. The timidity and melancholy of some, and the artifice and tyranny of others, lay the ground work of such diabolical delusions. But Christians should know better: and if they have been taught otherwise, if they are yet ignorant of the truth as it is in Jesus, and have not the knowledge of God their most righteous Governor and merciful Father in heaven, it is high time they should learn to understand their own religion.

The true doctrine of the Gospel is most honorable to the Supreme Governor of the world, maintains the perfect consistency of his justice and mercy, and shows that the measures of his goverment are calculated to prevent, destroy, and extirpate wickedness and misery, to purge at last the whole creation from every evil, to collect together, as our Saviour expresses it, all things that offend and them which do iniquity, and cast them into a furnace of fire, where they shall be utterly consumed and never more exist. John, the forerunner of Christ, describes him by the sublime character and office of being the minister of divine justice and mercy to mankind, whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather the wheat into his garner, but burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire, that is, utterly destroy it: then wickedness and misery shall cease for ever, death shall be destroyed, and destruction itself come to an end.

The practical language of the New Testament corresponds to the doctrine as before explained: and it remains that we attend to the Gospel admonitions, to choose the way of life, that our souls may live, and to avoid the fatal paths that lead to eternal destruction. The gate of the former is strait and the way narrow, and it is requisite to strive to gain that important pass. But if it was the dearest possession in the world, if it was a right hand or eye, that is an obstacle preventing our entrance into life eternal; it is better to part with it and cast it from us, than with it to perish for ever. For what is a man profited, if he could gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, his own life and being for ever? Or what can possibly be given to a man of equal value in exchange for his own life and being? It is not a few years in this world, but life and death absolute and eternal which are set before us. This is the very condition of our existence: there is no possibility of avoiding the momentous choice: and there is some difficulty in determining aright; and more in adhering to that determination.

But the first thing requisite is to convince ourselves thoroughly of the vast importance of our present conduct, and to have our minds awake and eyes open to look before us, and attend to the final consequences of things. As it is not easy for children to be persuaded, or bring themselves to apprehend, what is requisite or pernicious to their future health and life in this world; so men are not easily aware of the eternal consequences of their present actions. There are so many things to bribe their judgment, or divert their attention, or benumb their hearts, or alter their resolutions, that the gate is found to be wide and the way broad that leadeth to destruction, and many go in thereat; and it is not without some difficulty that any are reclaimed and brought back into the way of life. Are there few that be saved?—is a question to which no answer ought to be expected, but those persuasions to use our best endeavors, and those descriptions of the qualifications requisite to salvation, which are to be found so frequent, so clear, and so cogent, in the writings of the Gospel, that we would flee from the wrath to come, and let the goodness and patience of of God lead us to repentance; and not, after the hardness and impenitence of our hearts, treasure up for ourselves wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; but on the contrary, by a patienet continuance in well-doing, seek for honor and immortality, that we may gain eternal life; and that we do not through corrupt prejudices mistake the way of salvation, and what we must do to inherit eternal life; but if we would enter into life, keep the commandments of God; that we do not deceive ourselves with a vain show and empty professions, for God is not mocked, and whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he reap; he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption, but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap an incorruptible and immortal life.

Do ye not know, says the Apostle, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolators, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselvs with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. Our blessed Saviour hath most plainly and authentically specified the terms of our acceptance with God, and the duties requisite to salvation: and whosoever heareth his sayings and doeth them builds his hope of eternal life on an immovable foundation: but hearing and not doing, professing and not practicing, believing and not obeying, or to speak more properly, pretending to believe and to have faith separate from works of obedience, is only heaping up to ourselves the greater confusion and ruin.

The grand event, the sublime mystery of a world to come, and of eternal life and death, is revealed in the Gospel, with such perspicuity of doctrine and force of application, as cannot fail to impress an attentive mind, and have a powerful effect. The favor or displeasure of the Almighty Governor of the universe; glory and immortality, or destruction; everlasting life, or death eternal, are solemnly propounded to the belief, choice, and pursuit of mankind: and the way to avoid the one and obtain the other clearly described.

Let us wisely attend to these things, which are alone of infinite moment to us, and not let them slip out of our minds, or be choked with the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches, that we may escape the condemnation of the wicked, everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and may inheret that eternal life, which is the gift of God (and which may God of his infinite mercy grant to us) through Jesus Christ our Lord.

CHRISTIAN LOVE.

The gracious feeling of charity, or love, delights itself in God, and in the happiness of man. It is opposed to selfishness, which leads a person to make an idol of himself, and withhold supreme reverence from his Creator; to exclude all sympathy with his fellow-beings, and often to treat them with positive injustice and cruelty. To the absence of love for God we are authorized by Revelation to trace all blasphemy, impiety, and idolatry existing on earth; and to absence of all love for man we are warranted by the same authority, to trace envy, avarice, malignity, and oppression in its thousand forms. The gospel of Jesus is the grand antagonist of this baneful selfishness; it inculcates and inspires affection for God and man. Love is the very essence of religion. A Christian cannot be destitute of love for God and his fellow creature. When living christianity is thus synomymous with love we need not wonder that "charity" is so often inculcated in the sacred volume, and so highly extolled. Looking up to God, who himself is love, the inspired writers with one voice exclaim, "O love the Lord all ye his saints." Looking abroad on the Christian world, the inspired servants of the Redeemer proclaim these exhortations,—"Above all things have fervent charity," or love, "among yourselves." "Seeing you have purified your souls," or yourselves, "in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that you love one another with a pure heart fervently;" and the great command of our Master is, that we should "love our neighbors as ourselves;" be good Samaritans, as he taught us in his parable.

"The fruit of the Spirit is love." They who are in Jesus have his spirit, and brotherly kindness, and charity are among the beautiful and heavenly products of grace. Unless we live in love we are unpardoned,—we are not of God. Man-love springs up side by side with the love of God in the heart. Whosoever loves God, and this affection is wrought in us by understanding his love for us as it is manifested especially in Jesus, is constrained to feel kindly toward his brother. The benevolence of the gospel, is the product of the gospel. It is a love to man for God's sake; he is its spring, its support, and his glory is its aim. A fine illustration of this truth is given by Mr. Moffat, in his work on Africa, in the case of Africaner, whose life he records. Before his conversion, he was alike the enemy of God and man; fierce, savage, revengeful, and bloody, his name was terror, and like the lion of his native wilds, he roamed about only to plunder and destroy. But when the doctrine of the Cross melted his heart, there was a blessed transformation speedily accomplished. The lion became a lamb,—no more plundering, no more slaughter; the doctrine that moved him to love the merciful Jehovah, filled his bosom with benevolence to man. Having been born into the family of heaven, he loved the brethren with especial affection; the yearing of pure and holy philanthropy characterized his being. Oh! happy change; when will the world be filled with hearts like his?

As soon as we discover that a wrong has been done us, we naturally feel angry, and this feeling, if not crushed, will rise into revenge, and be manifested probably in some of the forms of retaliation in our power. We see this process exemplified in the inferior animals, when an injury has been inflicted by any of their number; and their Creator has actually endowed them with weapons, so to speak, by which to defend themselves, and chastise their enemies. The serpent has a sting, the bull horns, the tiger has claws, and in their case, in consequence of their constitution, the infliction of an injury and an effort at revenge, are purely instinctive and simultaneous. In savage life, and in some men who are supposed to be civilized, there is a striking and sad resemblance to the inferior creatures around them, they boil with rage, utter their wrath in horrid and often fiendish imprecations, they glory in returning the wrong in an aggravated form. Even though we may have no resemblance to these excessively wicked men, we all experience, at least for the moment, a desire, it may be feeble, yet still the desire is felt, to punish the person who willingly affords us pain. Now this feeling of resentment, and particularly if allowed to assume the form of revenge, is peculiarly abhorent from the genius of Christianity. We are to forgive our enemies; to love them, to pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us. We are to imitate our Master's example, who pardoned even the man who denied him with oaths; who, when on the cross, prayed for his murderers.

Love in the heart will expel all anger and malice, and terminate all evil speaking. Love cheers the home; love irradiates and tranquilizes the church. It is of divine power, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him. Heaven is the home, the temple of love; and in proportion as we love, we know the sympathies, the joys, and even the sublime sorrows of that distant shore.

I MUST PRAISE MORE.

The title of a recent article was, "I must Pray More;" and in it I expressed wonder that we pray so little, and gave reason why we should pray more. But it strikes me that we ought to praise more as well as pray more. I do not know how it is with others, but I know that I have a great deal for which to be thankful and to praise God. I feel that it will not do for me to spend all my breath in prayer. I should thus, it is true, acknowledge my dependence on God; but where would be the acknowledgement of his benefits couferred upon me? I must spend a part of my breath in praise. O! to be animated from above with that life, whose alternate breath is prayer and praise! God has been very good to me. Yes, he has exercised goodness towards me in all its various forms of pity, forbearance, care, bounty, grace and mercy; or to express all in one word, "God is love," and he has been love to me. I do not know why he should have treated me so kindly. I have sought, but can find no reason out of himself. I conclude it is because he "delighteth in mercy." His nature being love, it is natural for him to love his creatures, and especially those he has called to be his children. O! the goodness of God! The thought of it sometimes comes over me with very great power, and I am overwhelmed in admiration. Nothing so easily breaks up the fountain of tears within me. Those drops, if I may judge from my own experiences, were intended as much to express gratitude as grief. I think I shall be able without weariness, to spend eternity on the topic of Divine love and goodness.

Reader, can you not adopt my language as your own? Has not God been the same to you? And shall we not praise him? Shall all our devotion consist in prayer? Shall we be always thinking of our wants, and never of his benefits—always dwelling on what remains to be done, and never thinking of what has already been done for us—always uttering desire, and never expressing gratitude—expending all our voice in supplication and none of it in song? Is this the way to treat a benefactor? No indeed. It is not just, so to treat him; neither is it wise. It is very bad policy to praise no more than Christians in general do. They would have much more success in prayer, if one half the time they now spend in it were spent in praise. I do not mean that they pray too much, but that they praise too little. I suspect the reason why the Lord did such great things for the Psalmist was, that, while he was not by any means deficient in prayer, he abounded in praise, The Lord heard his psalms, and while he sung of mercy shown, showed him more. And it would be just so with us, if we abound more in praise and thanksgiving. It displeases God that we should be always dwelling on our wants, as if he had never supplied one of them. How do we know that God is not waiting for us to praise him for a benefit already conferred, before he will confer on us that other which we may be now so earnestly desiring him? It is wonderful how much more prone we are to forget the benefit received, than the benefit wanted—in other words, how much more inclined we are to offer prayer than praise. For one who offers genuine praise, there may be found ten that pray. Ten lepers lifted up their voices together in the prayer, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us," but only one of the ten "returned to give glory to God." The rest were satisfied with the benefit—this one only thought gratefully of the benefactor. His gratitude obtained for him, I doubt not, a greater blessing than ever his prayer had procured; and praise has often, I believe, in the experience of the people of God, been found more effectual for obtaining blessings than prayer. A person, being once cast upon a desolate island, spent a day in fasting and prayer for his deliverance, but no help came. It occurred to him then to keep a day of thanksgiving and praise, and he had no sooner done it than relief was brought to him. You see, as he began to sing of mercy exercised, the Lord heard the voice of his praise.

Christian reader, you complain perhaps that your prayer is not heard; suppose you try the efficacy of praise. Peradventure you will find that the way to obtain new favors is to praise the Lord for favors received. Perhaps if you consider his goodness, he will consider your wants. It may be you are a parent, and one child is converted, but there is another, concerning whom you say, "O that he might live before Thee!" Go now and bless the Lord for the conversion of the first, and it is very likely he will give thee occasion shortly to keep another day of thanksgiving for the salvation of the other. Some of us are sick. Perhaps it is because we did not praise the Lord for health. We forget that benefit. We We do not forget our sickness, O no. Nor is there any lack of desire in us to get well. We pray for recovery. And so we should; but it strikes me that we might get well sooner were we to dwell with less grief and despondency on our loss of health, and to contemplate with cheerful and grateful admiration, what God has done for our souls—the great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins; and how he spared not his own Son, that he might spare us; and give us now his Spirit, to be in us the earnest of heaven, our eternal home. If we were to think such thoughts, to the forgetfulness of our bodily ailments, I judge it would be better for the whole man, body and soul both, than any other course we can pursue. If the affliction should still continue, we should count it light, aye, should rejoice in it, because it is his will, and because he says he means to make it work our good.

There is nothing glorifies God like praise. "Whoso offereth praise, glorifieth me." Ps. i. 23. Prayer expresses dependence and desire; but praise, admiration and gratitude. By it men testify and tell all abroad that God is good, and thus others are persuaded to "taste and see that the Lord is good." Praise is altogether the superior exercise of the two. Prayer may be purely selfish in its origin, but praise is ingenious. Praise is the employment of heaven. Angels praise. The spirits of the just made perfect will praise. We shall not always pray, but we shall always praise. Let us anticipate the employment of heaven. Let us exercise ourselves unto praise.

Let us learn the song now, "O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness." But above all, "let the saints be joyful in glory: let them sing aloud upon their beds." I charge thee, my soul, to praise him, and he will never let thee want matter for praise. "While I live will I praise the Lord: I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being."—Nevins.

THE LITTLE BROWN CABIN.

Nestled under a craggy hill on the western bank of the Hudson stood a tiny brown cabin, hardly larger than a squirrel cage or chicken coop. It wore a peculiarly peaceful look,neat, quiet habitation, with a little skiff moored before the door, a huge cherry tree overshadowing the roof, a vegatable garden near, and the glittering river rolling before it.

When the spires and roofs of the neighboring city were mantled in the light of the decending sun, a gray twilight, "a shadowing shroud," seemed to rest upon the little cabin, and to divide it still more from the actual, living world.

Yet there was no darkness within, for it was illumined by the peace and love of God. Two old people lived in that quiet spot, very poor, but very happy. They earned a scanty subsistence by selling the vegetables they raised in the little garden which they had reclaimed from the neighboring marsh. The Bible taught them all that it was necessary for them to know. It was truly "a lamp to their feet, and a guide to their path."

When the work of the day was over, they sat in the door, and the old man, who was the better scholar of the two, read the words of Jesus to his wife. They both felt the power contained in them, and he once said, "They do me just as much good this day as they did the people to whom they were spoken."

They had saved money enough to buy themselves a plain Bible, when their old one was worn out. But their eye-sight failed, and the print was small. A lady, without knowing their especial need of it, sent them a quarto

THE PASSOVER IN PHILADELPHIA.

Br. Storrs:—The brethren in this City, believing in the yearly observance of the Lord's Supper upon the anniversary of the Passover, met on Monday evening, 10th inst., at Cor. of Ninth and Callowhill Streets, and kept the feast in christian remembrance of the event and word which authorized its establishment; and joyful apprehension of the coming glory, which its perpetuation ever leads us hopefully to anticipate. Some thirty-five were present.

The evening being stormy, quite a number were kept away. Perhaps ten or twelve more might be counted as holding to this mode of obeying the Head of the church in this commemorative and expectant ordinance.

It is proper that we should mention that quite a goodly number of our brethren who meet with us, believe in the holding of this service more frequently, and not, specially, upon the anniversary of the "Last Supper," which the Lord, after his great desire, ate with his disciples, before he went hence. But I may remark, with assurance, that there is no quarrel among us. We have different opinions, in the meeting on this and other topics; but we hold to liberty of conscience, among ourselves.

But to return to our report. The occasion was one of great interest and solemn joy. I have never been so fully impressed with the festive character of the service. Or perhaps more properly, that the children of God should rejoice when they meet to celebrate the great redemptive position of Christ, "our passover" who is "sacrificed for us." It was a season of unmingled joy. The "passover time," which we enjoyed at Kast Hall, Boston, last year was good; but this excelled it altogether. We feasted together in the name of the Lord. It was the blessed reflection upon the work of our Saviour and the contemplation of the future feast; the marriage festival of the Lamb.

The meeting was opened by reading the scriptures, prayer, and singing several songs, of Zion; after which followed some speaking, in which great facts of scripture were noticed; the deliverance of Israel, celebrated by the Passover referred to, especially when God "rolled off the reproach of Egypt," at Gilgal: then free interchange of thought, upon the theme of redemption, while we partook of a plain, simple repast. And we were very happy. I never did enjoy an occasion of the kind so well (I mean the Lord's Supper service), and it appeared to be the sentiment of all, that we had nothing to do but to rejoice. At the close, we solemnly passed the unleavened bread, which we broke; and also drank of the cup, after the Lord's command, and by the consecration he has appointed; then singing a beautiful hymn, we retired.

One feature of the service to me gave evidence of the fact that the Lord was indeed remembered; which was, that the poor and the sick who could not be present were remembered, and spoken of. I felt, as others did, a union with the dear saints of like precious faith and confession all over the land. May the Great Master grant his blessing to the scattered flock.

Dorchester, Mass., April 11, 1865.

Last evening, although quite stormy, about forty followers of Christ, repaired to Kast Hall, Boston, to commemorate the sufferings and death of our blessed Jesus. It was a season long to be remembered. The Spirit of Christ came down on the little flock gathered together. We felt especially strengthened by the Lord.

Gathering around the board we partook of a simple repast, indulging meanwhile in social conversation. It was an occasion of peculiar interest. Love and harmony reigned triumphant. There was nothing to mar or disturb the beauty of the scene; but love beamed from the countenances of all present. After prayer and suitable remarks, the "broken bread," and "wine" were passed, and we all partook of the emblems of the Lord's body. A holy calm pervaded the scene, as we ate the bread and drank the wine in remembrance" of Him. Hymns were sung, tesmonies were given, all breathing the same spirit of love and concord. All seemed to be desirous of living nearer to Christ, than ever before. As we sat around the board, the thought came vividly to my mind, of the great gathering we should have in the kingdom of God, at the "marriage supper of the Lamb," where we should meet Jesus our blessed Life-giver, the prophets, apostles, and all the holy ones of old; and my thoughts wandered to many, now sleeping in Jesus, that we should see around the table of our Lord. It was a pleasant interview, last evening, with some I had not seen for some time; but oh, how sweet will be the meeting with those that now lie sweetly sleeping in Jesus! The thought of that great meeting gave me joy; for I thought that there, we no more should watch with aching hearts the fading form, the weary sigh, no more should see our highest hopes dashed to the earth in one short hour, but we should meet the loved and lost, in that better land, and should see them radiant in beauty, blooming with immortality; should clasp them to our heart in one long embrace, and never part again.

Communion was always an interesting ordinance to me; but last evening it was unusually so. It was the most interesting season of my life, and one I shall always look back to with feelings of joy. I felt while eating the broken bread, the emblem of our Lord's body, that I was eating by faith, the "bread that from Heaven came down." I realized, to a full extent, the words of Jesus, "I am the bread of life." I laid hold of his promise with increased confidence, "He that cometh to me, shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me, shall never thirst." The words of Jesus were sweet to me, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." A sweet solemnity rested upon the company assembled as we thus feasted on Jesus' love. A little past nine o'clock we parted, many if not all satisfied that their time had been well spent, and resolving in the strength of Jesus, to walk "after the Spirit" more than ever before; to consecrate themselves more fully to the service of Christ, and to press forward with renewed vigor, for the prize at the end of the race. Thus ended one of the happiest seasons of my life, the recollection of which, will not soon be effaced from my memory.

THE END OF THE WICKED.

Rev. Samuel Bourn, England, about a century ago, in a discourse on "The Gospel Doctrine of Future Punishment," brought out, distinctly, that the end of the wicked will be extinction of being. We never saw any of his writings till some years after we preached our "Six Sermons" on the question, and had published several editions of them. We give the following extracts from Bourn's discourse, which will go to show that truth has had its struggles for life in the past, though often strangled by Popish superstitions. Bourn speaks as follows:

The Gospel Doctrine of a total everlasting destruction is much more adapted to bring sinners to repentance than the doctrine of endless misery and torment: because they may be convinced of the reason and justice of the former; but never can be so, of the latter. And it is of the greatest importance that men be convinced, not only that they shall suffer for their sins, but also that they shall suffer justly, and no more than their guilt deserves. It is indeed highly requisite, that men should have a profound reverence for the Supreme Being, and a fearful apprehension of the punishment due to wickedness: but it is equally requisite, that this fear be built upon a reasonable foundation, and a persuasion of the justice of that punishment: it ought to be the fear of a most righteous and merciful Governor, who punishes in due measure, and to answer a wise and benificent purpose; not of an unjust and merciless tyrant, "who punishes without measure or end to satisfy implacable and eternal resentment." The former is a motive proper to bring sinners to repentance, convincing them, that if they persist in their wickedness, it will become right and fit in the great Governor of the world, and requisite to the ends of his goodness, to punish and destroy them for ever, in order to put an end to their wickedness; and for an example to others. But the doctrine of an eternal preservation in the most dreadful torments is not proper to bring men to repentance, or to promote virtue in the world. On the contrary, this anti-christian doctrine hath actually produced much wickedness, and of the worst kind, and hath served also to harden men in it. . . .

The only way to promote sobriety, justice, humanity, and every virtue in the world, is by representing truly and recommending strongly the characters of the Deity and his government, as contained in the real doctrines of our Saviour and his Apostles: that he is the most just and merciful Father and Governor of all mankind; who will by no means clear the guilty, or suffer the impenitent workers of iniquity to escape, but will assuredly punish them with an everlasting destruction from his own presence and by his own glorious power; but who in all the measures of his government intends the best ends, and to promote the good of the whole; to destroy for ever, not to preserve for ever, the souls of the wicked; to make virtue and happiness, not wickedness and misery, everlasting. This belief of religion will have a most happy effect, in reclaiming men from vice and exciting them to virtue, and is every way proper to engage our reverence of God and our charity to all men, to make us love the Lord our God, and serve him with all our heart, and soul, and mind, and strength; which is our highest excellence and happiness.

To sum up the whole in a few words. To increase wickedness and misery in the creation, and to make them endless, is the work and design of the devil. To impute the same design to the all-perfect, and ever-blessed God, is no better than the greatest impiety. And to imagine that such a doctrine can do any good in the world, is great weakness and folly. Some men are amazingly forward, even while they praise God with their mouth, to harbor and an ill opinion of him in their hearts, and suspect him of having unjust or cruel designs. The timidity and melancholy of some, and the artifice and tyranny of others, lay the ground work of such diabolical delusions. But Christians should know better: and if they have been taught otherwise, if they are yet ignorant of the truth as it is in Jesus, and have not the knowledge of God their most righteous Governor and merciful Father in heaven, it is high time they should learn to understand their own religion.

The true doctrine of the Gospel is most honorable to the Supreme Governor of the world, maintains the perfect consistency of his justice and mercy, and shows that the measures of his goverment are calculated to prevent, destroy, and extirpate wickedness and misery, to purge at last the whole creation from every evil, to collect together, as our Saviour expresses it, all things that offend and them which do iniquity, and cast them into a furnace of fire, where they shall be utterly consumed and never more exist. John, the forerunner of Christ, describes him by the sublime character and office of being the minister of divine justice and mercy to mankind, whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather the wheat into his garner, but burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire, that is, utterly destroy it: then wickedness and misery shall cease for ever, death shall be destroyed, and destruction itself come to an end.

The practical language of the New Testament corresponds to the doctrine as before explained: and it remains that we attend to the Gospel admonitions, to choose the way of life, that our souls may live, and to avoid the fatal paths that lead to eternal destruction. The gate of the former is strait and the way narrow, and it is requisite to strive to gain that important pass. But if it was the dearest possession in the world, if it was a right hand or eye, that is an obstacle preventing our entrance into life eternal; it is better to part with it and cast it from us, than with it to perish for ever. For what is a man profited, if he could gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, his own life and being for ever? Or what can possibly be given to a man of equal value in exchange for his own life and being? It is not a few years in this world, but life and death absolute and eternal which are set before us. This is the very condition of our existence: there is no possibility of avoiding the momentous choice: and there is some difficulty in determining aright; and more in adhering to that determination.

But the first thing requisite is to convince ourselves thoroughly of the vast importance of our present conduct, and to have our minds awake and eyes open to look before us, and attend to the final consequences of things. As it is not easy for children to be persuaded, or bring themselves to apprehend, what is requisite or pernicious to their future health and life in this world; so men are not easily aware of the eternal consequences of their present actions. There are so many things to bribe their judgment, or divert their attention, or benumb their hearts, or alter their resolutions, that the gate is found to be wide and the way broad that leadeth to destruction, and many go in thereat; and it is not without some difficulty that any are reclaimed and brought back into the way of life. Are there few that be saved?—is a question to which no answer ought to be expected, but those persuasions to use our best endeavors, and those descriptions of the qualifications requisite to salvation, which are to be found so frequent, so clear, and so cogent, in the writings of the Gospel, that we would flee from the wrath to come, and let the goodness and patience of of God lead us to repentance; and not, after the hardness and impenitence of our hearts, treasure up for ourselves wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; but on the contrary, by a patienet continuance in well-doing, seek for honor and immortality, that we may gain eternal life; and that we do not through corrupt prejudices mistake the way of salvation, and what we must do to inherit eternal life; but if we would enter into life, keep the commandments of God; that we do not deceive ourselves with a vain show and empty professions, for God is not mocked, and whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he reap; he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption, but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap an incorruptible and immortal life.

Do ye not know, says the Apostle, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolators, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselvs with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. Our blessed Saviour hath most plainly and authentically specified the terms of our acceptance with God, and the duties requisite to salvation: and whosoever heareth his sayings and doeth them builds his hope of eternal life on an immovable foundation: but hearing and not doing, professing and not practicing, believing and not obeying, or to speak more properly, pretending to believe and to have faith separate from works of obedience, is only heaping up to ourselves the greater confusion and ruin.

The grand event, the sublime mystery of a world to come, and of eternal life and death, is revealed in the Gospel, with such perspicuity of doctrine and force of application, as cannot fail to impress an attentive mind, and have a powerful effect. The favor or displeasure of the Almighty Governor of the universe; glory and immortality, or destruction; everlasting life, or death eternal, are solemnly propounded to the belief, choice, and pursuit of mankind: and the way to avoid the one and obtain the other clearly described.

Let us wisely attend to these things, which are alone of infinite moment to us, and not let them slip out of our minds, or be choked with the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches, that we may escape the condemnation of the wicked, everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and may inheret that eternal life, which is the gift of God (and which may God of his infinite mercy grant to us) through Jesus Christ our Lord.

CHRISTIAN LOVE.

The gracious feeling of charity, or love, delights itself in God, and in the happiness of man. It is opposed to selfishness, which leads a person to make an idol of himself, and withhold supreme reverence from his Creator; to exclude all sympathy with his fellow-beings, and often to treat them with positive injustice and cruelty. To the absence of love for God we are authorized by Revelation to trace all blasphemy, impiety, and idolatry existing on earth; and to absence of all love for man we are warranted by the same authority, to trace envy, avarice, malignity, and oppression in its thousand forms. The gospel of Jesus is the grand antagonist of this baneful selfishness; it inculcates and inspires affection for God and man. Love is the very essence of religion. A Christian cannot be destitute of love for God and his fellow creature. When living christianity is thus synomymous with love we need not wonder that "charity" is so often inculcated in the sacred volume, and so highly extolled. Looking up to God, who himself is love, the inspired writers with one voice exclaim, "O love the Lord all ye his saints." Looking abroad on the Christian world, the inspired servants of the Redeemer proclaim these exhortations,—"Above all things have fervent charity," or love, "among yourselves." "Seeing you have purified your souls," or yourselves, "in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that you love one another with a pure heart fervently;" and the great command of our Master is, that we should "love our neighbors as ourselves;" be good Samaritans, as he taught us in his parable.

"The fruit of the Spirit is love." They who are in Jesus have his spirit, and brotherly kindness, and charity are among the beautiful and heavenly products of grace. Unless we live in love we are unpardoned,—we are not of God. Man-love springs up side by side with the love of God in the heart. Whosoever loves God, and this affection is wrought in us by understanding his love for us as it is manifested especially in Jesus, is constrained to feel kindly toward his brother. The benevolence of the gospel, is the product of the gospel. It is a love to man for God's sake; he is its spring, its support, and his glory is its aim. A fine illustration of this truth is given by Mr. Moffat, in his work on Africa, in the case of Africaner, whose life he records. Before his conversion, he was alike the enemy of God and man; fierce, savage, revengeful, and bloody, his name was terror, and like the lion of his native wilds, he roamed about only to plunder and destroy. But when the doctrine of the Cross melted his heart, there was a blessed transformation speedily accomplished. The lion became a lamb,—no more plundering, no more slaughter; the doctrine that moved him to love the merciful Jehovah, filled his bosom with benevolence to man. Having been born into the family of heaven, he loved the brethren with especial affection; the yearing of pure and holy philanthropy characterized his being. Oh! happy change; when will the world be filled with hearts like his?

As soon as we discover that a wrong has been done us, we naturally feel angry, and this feeling, if not crushed, will rise into revenge, and be manifested probably in some of the forms of retaliation in our power. We see this process exemplified in the inferior animals, when an injury has been inflicted by any of their number; and their Creator has actually endowed them with weapons, so to speak, by which to defend themselves, and chastise their enemies. The serpent has a sting, the bull horns, the tiger has claws, and in their case, in consequence of their constitution, the infliction of an injury and an effort at revenge, are purely instinctive and simultaneous. In savage life, and in some men who are supposed to be civilized, there is a striking and sad resemblance to the inferior creatures around them, they boil with rage, utter their wrath in horrid and often fiendish imprecations, they glory in returning the wrong in an aggravated form. Even though we may have no resemblance to these excessively wicked men, we all experience, at least for the moment, a desire, it may be feeble, yet still the desire is felt, to punish the person who willingly affords us pain. Now this feeling of resentment, and particularly if allowed to assume the form of revenge, is peculiarly abhorent from the genius of Christianity. We are to forgive our enemies; to love them, to pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us. We are to imitate our Master's example, who pardoned even the man who denied him with oaths; who, when on the cross, prayed for his murderers.

Love in the heart will expel all anger and malice, and terminate all evil speaking. Love cheers the home; love irradiates and tranquilizes the church. It is of divine power, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him. Heaven is the home, the temple of love; and in proportion as we love, we know the sympathies, the joys, and even the sublime sorrows of that distant shore.

I MUST PRAISE MORE.

The title of a recent article was, "I must Pray More;" and in it I expressed wonder that we pray so little, and gave reason why we should pray more. But it strikes me that we ought to praise more as well as pray more. I do not know how it is with others, but I know that I have a great deal for which to be thankful and to praise God. I feel that it will not do for me to spend all my breath in prayer. I should thus, it is true, acknowledge my dependence on God; but where would be the acknowledgement of his benefits couferred upon me? I must spend a part of my breath in praise. O! to be animated from above with that life, whose alternate breath is prayer and praise! God has been very good to me. Yes, he has exercised goodness towards me in all its various forms of pity, forbearance, care, bounty, grace and mercy; or to express all in one word, "God is love," and he has been love to me. I do not know why he should have treated me so kindly. I have sought, but can find no reason out of himself. I conclude it is because he "delighteth in mercy." His nature being love, it is natural for him to love his creatures, and especially those he has called to be his children. O! the goodness of God! The thought of it sometimes comes over me with very great power, and I am overwhelmed in admiration. Nothing so easily breaks up the fountain of tears within me. Those drops, if I may judge from my own experiences, were intended as much to express gratitude as grief. I think I shall be able without weariness, to spend eternity on the topic of Divine love and goodness.

Reader, can you not adopt my language as your own? Has not God been the same to you? And shall we not praise him? Shall all our devotion consist in prayer? Shall we be always thinking of our wants, and never of his benefits—always dwelling on what remains to be done, and never thinking of what has already been done for us—always uttering desire, and never expressing gratitude—expending all our voice in supplication and none of it in song? Is this the way to treat a benefactor? No indeed. It is not just, so to treat him; neither is it wise. It is very bad policy to praise no more than Christians in general do. They would have much more success in prayer, if one half the time they now spend in it were spent in praise. I do not mean that they pray too much, but that they praise too little. I suspect the reason why the Lord did such great things for the Psalmist was, that, while he was not by any means deficient in prayer, he abounded in praise. The Lord heard his psalms, and while he sung of mercy shown, showed him more. And it would be just so with us, if we abound more in praise and thanksgiving. It displeases God that we should be always dwelling on our wants, as if he had never supplied one of them. How do we know that God is not waiting for us to praise him for a benefit already conferred, before he will confer on us that other which we may be now so earnestly desiring him? It is wonderful how much more prone we are to forget the benefit received, than the benefit wanted—in other words, how much more inclined we are to offer prayer than praise. For one who offers genuine praise, there may be found ten that pray. Ten lepers lifted up their voices together in the prayer, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us," but only one of the ten "returned to give glory to God." The rest were satisfied with the benefit—this one only thought gratefully of the benefactor. His gratitude obtained for him, I doubt not, a greater blessing than ever his prayer had procured; and praise has often, I believe, in the experience of the people of God, been found more effectual for obtaining blessings than prayer. A person, being once cast upon a desolate island, spent a day in fasting and prayer for his deliverance, but no help came. It occurred to him then to keep a day of thanksgiving and praise, and he had no sooner done it than relief was brought to him. You see, as he began to sing of mercy exercised, the Lord heard the voice of his praise.

Christian reader, you complain perhaps that your prayer is not heard; suppose you try the efficacy of praise. Peradventure you will find that the way to obtain new favors is to praise the Lord for favors received. Perhaps if you consider his goodness, he will consider your wants. It may be you are a parent, and one child is converted, but there is another, concerning whom you say, "O that he might live before Thee!" Go now and bless the Lord for the conversion of the first, and it is very likely he will give thee occasion shortly to keep another day of thanksgiving for the salvation of the other. Some of us are sick. Perhaps it is because we did not praise the Lord for health. We forget that benefit. We We do not forget our sickness, O no. Nor is there any lack of desire in us to get well. We pray for recovery. And so we should; but it strikes me that we might get well sooner were we to dwell with less grief and despondency on our loss of health, and to contemplate with cheerful and grateful admiration, what God has done for our souls—the great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins; and how he spared not his own Son, that he might spare us; and give us now his Spirit, to be in us the earnest of heaven, our eternal home. If we were to think such thoughts, to the forgetfulness of our bodily ailments, I judge it would be better for the whole man, body and soul both, than any other course we can pursue. If the affliction should still continue, we should count it light, aye, should rejoice in it, because it is his will, and because he says he means to make it work our good.

There is nothing glorifies God like praise. "Whoso offereth praise, glorifieth me." Ps. i. 23. Prayer expresses dependence and desire; but praise, admiration and gratitude. By it men testify and tell all abroad that God is good, and thus others are persuaded to "taste and see that the Lord is good." Praise is altogether the superior exercise of the two. Prayer may be purely selfish in its origin, but praise is ingenious. Praise is the employment of heaven. Angels praise. The spirits of the just made perfect will praise. We shall not always pray, but we shall always praise. Let us anticipate the employment of heaven. Let us exercise ourselves unto praise.

Let us learn the song now, "O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness." But above all, "let the saints be joyful in glory: let them sing aloud upon their beds." I charge thee, my soul, to praise him, and he will never let thee want matter for praise. "While I live will I praise the Lord: I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being."—Nevins.

THE LITTLE BROWN CABIN.

Nestled under a craggy hill on the western bank of the Hudson stood a tiny brown cabin, hardly larger than a squirrel cage or chicken coop. It wore a peculiarly peaceful look, neat, quiet habitation, with a little skiff moored before the door, a huge cherry tree overshadowing the roof, a vegatable garden near, and the glittering river rolling before it.

When the spires and roofs of the neighboring city were mantled in the light of the decending sun, a gray twilight, "a shadowing shroud," seemed to rest upon the little cabin, and to divide it still more from the actual, living world.

Yet there was no darkness within, for it was illumined by the peace and love of God. Two old people lived in that quiet spot, very poor, but very happy. They earned a scanty subsistence by selling the vegetables they raised in the little garden which they had reclaimed from the neighboring marsh. The Bible taught them all that it was necessary for them to know. It was truly "a lamp to their feet, and a guide to their path."

When the work of the day was over, they sat in the door, and the old man, who was the better scholar of the two, read the words of Jesus to his wife. They both felt the power contained in them, and he once said, "They do me just as much good this day as they did the people to whom they were spoken."

They had saved money enough to buy themselves a plain Bible, when their old one was worn out. But their eye-sight failed, and the print was small. A lady, without knowing their especial need of it, sent them a quarto

Bible of clear, large type. O how they rejoiced in the gift!

"See what God has sent us," said old Mrs. Green, when we next visited them. If it had dropped at her feet from the skies, she would not have felt it to be more entirely the gift of God. They lived upon its promises. They were their support in life, their consolation in death.

The little brown cabin is now deserted. It is scarcely visible to the passer-by, for the shrubs and bushes that have grown in rank luxuriance around it. No smoke ever curls from its one small chimney. Many times has the cherry-tree borne fresh leaves, and shed them on a lonely roof. But the memory of their love to God and his holy word, their delight in all his precepts, has not passed from our minds. The example of that good old couple, so poor in this world's goods, and so rich in faith, may yet serve to stimulate those who, with greater religious privileges, have not yet learned to walk as closely with God, or with as unwavering footsteps as they.

A Great Dodge.

We received the following, a few days since, from the Editor of the Crisis We give it to our readers, followed by a few remarks by J. T. C.—Editor of Herald.

Br. Storrs:—Please grant me a favor through the columns of the Herald. In your paper dated April 5th, it is said:—"The Crisis at Boston, has shown a sort of joy at any reverses the government has met with," during "the terrible conflict" it has encountered against the rebellion.

Allow me to say that, for twenty-two years, I have had no sympathy with southern slavery; but have belived as John Wesley said, that it is "the sum of all villanies." It gives me joy when I see evidence that its end is at hand.

Your Bro. in Christ,
Miles Grant.

Note.—The Editor of the Crisis has a very singular way of showing his loyalty. He has transferred into his columns the sentiments of the enemies of our country, particularly from Canadian newspapers—sentiments too insulting for us to repeat. We would not pollute our columns with such vile trash. He has copied the sneers and taunts of our enemies and copied them with approval. Now he is very anxious to undo what he has done. This he would have a right to do if he confessed his error, but that is not his style. He shows his well-known proclivity of dodging in the foregoing note. The charge to which he responds says nothing of "Southern slavery," so that his disclaimer is of no avail. We repeat the charge. "The Crisis, at Boston, has, all through the terrible conflict the United States government has had with a most causeless and wicked rebellion, shown a sort of joy at any reverses the government has met with, and shown a readiness to reiterate the evil prognostications of its enemies."

We would suggest that Eld. Grant put his sentiments in his own paper, so that his readers may have the benefit even of the poor response which he has made. J. T. C.

The White Stone.

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give a white stone, and in the stone a new name written which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."—Rev. ii. 17.

In primitive times, when traveling was rendered difficult by want of places of public entertainment, hospitality was exercised by private individuals to a very great extent. Persons who had partaken of this hospitality, and those who practised it, frequently contracted habits of regard and friendship for each other; and it became a well-established custom, both among the Greeks and Romans, to provide their guests with some particular mark, which was handed down from father to son, and insured hospitality and kind treatment wherever it was presented. This mark was usually a small stone or pebble, cut in half, and upon the halves of which the host and the guest mutually inscribed their names, and then interchanged them with each other.

The production of this stone was quite sufficient to insure friendship for themselves or their decendants, whenever they travelled again in the same direction. While it is evident that these stones were required to be privately kept and the name written on them carefully concealed, lest others should obtain the privileges instead of him for whom they were intended, how natural is the allusion to this custom in the words: "I will give him to eat of the hidden manna;" and having done so, having recognized him as my guest, my friend, "I will give him a white stone, and in he stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it; a pledge of my friendship, sacred and inviolable, known only to himself."

The Third Quarterly Conference.

The time for holding this Conference has been fixed for Sunday, April 23d, in Dodworth Hall, 806 Broadway, New York. Services three or more times on the first day, and to be continued as far into the week as thought best; doubtless through Monday and Tuesday, if no more. Important matters will come up at this Conference relating to future operations and missionary work. All who feel an interest in these things should be present as early Monday as possible, as these matters will be under consideration Monday and Tuesday. We presume that most preachers will have appointments in other places which will prevent their attendance till Monday. On their account business matters will not be called up on "the first day."

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, APRIL 19, 1865.

No Paper Next Week.

Notwithstanding the Third Quarterly Conference is to be held next Sunday and onward, we had intended to issue our paper next week; but the solemnities attending this week of mourning, occasioned by the death of President Lincoln, has decided us to omit next week's issue, as we have done at each of the previous Conferences. An additional reason with the Editor, personally, is, sickness in his family. Week after next the paper will go out as usual, and we hope in better time than it has done for a few weeks past.

In the mean time, will the friends of the Herald of Life bear in mind that we shall need all the help they can afford to carry on its publication? A few have not yet paid their pledges. We hope they will find it convenient to do so soon; and that others, who are able, will not forget the Herald of Life in the distribution of their funds. There is to be no faltering in carrying forward the great work of spreading the glad tidings of life in Jesus Christ, and in him alone.

Our National Affliction.

The spirit of slavery, secession, and rebllion, has made a last desperate and satanic developement in that infamous and foul act of the assassin who took the life of President Lincoln the past week. Never, in eighteen hundred years, has a fouler and more malignant act of wickedness been committed than this assassination; yet it is only the culmination of the God-defying principle of slaveholding; and this terrible tragedy may have been necessary to open the eyes of this nation, and the civilized world, to the enormity of the crime of which we have been guilty in sustaining the horrid institution of chattel slavery. The monster has grown and been nourished by the nation till it sought to destroy the government itself, that the serpent might live. It has truly seemed as if satan had come down in great wrath, knowing that his time is short. The rebellion, and slavery its cause, was about being crushed; and the great and generous heart of President Lincoln was disposed to treat the overpowered rebels with the greatest lenity and mercy, such as no government of earth had ever extended to traitors. Generous to a fault, he had proposed the greatest mercy to them; but the satanic spirit of slavery and rebellion must, it seems, make one more developement of its horrid character in order to satisfy the public mind that justice, as well as mercy, must be respected. The foul deed of assassination has awaked the nation to the necessity of administring justice to such God-defying mortals as those who have joined hands to uphold "the sum of all villanies" by deeds of rebellion and the foulest murders that ever disgraced a people claiming to be civilized. This last tragedy has signed the death warrant of slavery more effectually than even the noble Proclamation of our late President He has died a martyr to the cause of human freedom; and his death reveals, as perhaps no other event could have done, the heartless and impious character of the system of slaveholding with which the country has so long been cursed. Its doom is now sealed; and woe to the man who shall hereafter open his mouth in defense of such a system of wickedness.

We do not go into the details of the late assassination, as all our readers will be fully informed on that subject before our paper can reach them, and will have joined in a nation's mourning, which becometh it under such fearful calamaties as we have been called to pass through. In the midst of the joy of all loyal hearts that the wicked rebellion was about at its end; and at a moment when the magnanimity of the President had been so conspicuously manifested, and the hearts of the people, who have had to confront the infamous rebels, were melting into a spirit of forgiveness towards the traitors, by the President's example; the spirit of the traitors bursts forth in the foul deed of assassination which has clothed every loyal heart with unfeigned sorrow; and mourning fills every honest habitation. This might have been necessary to keep the people from self-exlutation; to teach us our entire defence on God for all our mercies; chasten our joy on the prospect of the return of peace, and to teach us the lesson of proper humiliation for our past sins.

Our consolation, in the death of President Lincoln, is, that Yahveh, the Deliverer, reigneth: and that there is no counsel nor might against him, The wrath of man shall praise him, and the remainder He will restrain. The Lord liveth; and blessed be the God and rock of our life. Because He liveth, all those who love him shall live also. We are led more than ever to see the comfort, safety, peace, and security there is in trusting in him. The time is not far off when the wickedness of man will be made to cease and Jesus, the anointed of God, shall have the throne of David, and His empire and dominion be over all the earth, and all forms of evil will be made to cease to the ends thereof Happy those who are prepared for the ushering in of that day. Then shall every one, who has part under that reign, sit under his own vine and fig-tree having none to molest or make him afraid. The Lord hasten that day in its time.

The President's Death.

A PARALLEL.

Since the assassination of the illustrious William of Orange in 1584 no occurrence has paralleled the demoniacal murder of our beloved Chief Magistrate! Indeed, we do not recall an instance in the wide world of history which so nearly resembles it.

In intellectual attainments, versatile capacity, profound genius, political discernment, diplomatic skill (in this William was perhaps too close an adherent of Machiavel), and a certain magnetic personal influence, Abraham Lincoln could not, of course, be compared with William; but in pure patriotism, inflexible determination, unsullied integrity, hearty generousness, the willingness to forgive, and simple trust in God, the two men were much alike. They were both the instruments in the hands of Providence to confound tyranny, to rescue the oppressed, to vindicate the rights of humanity; they were both possessed of the unlimited confidence of those over whom they were called to preside; both taken away at an extremely critical moment; both the occasion of universal heart-breaking sorrow and fiery indignation; both the victims of a defeated and envenomed serpent-foe; in the one case the detested and ever-to-be-hated Papacy, and in the other the equally opprobrious Slave Oligarchy.

In one respect we trust the parallel will cease. Under William's leadership, seventeen provinces were united against the Imperial bigot of Spain; his death appeared to remove the great centralizing influence that was needed to preserve the Union, the great obstacle to the division which was accomplished afterwards when the ten Celtic provinces sunk back into the destructive embrace of Spain, while the seven Teutonic provinces held fast their integrity, and ultimately achieved a glorious and final independence. Abraham Lincoln's death will scarcely be productive of a like result; for in the person of Andrew Johnson the country has a strong tower against internal weakness and external force. All that could be accomplished under Lincoln and more will be done under Johnson. It really looks as if the words of the latter to the colored people of Tennessee were almost prophetic. When he asked, where the Moses could be found that would lead them out of the house of bondage? they replied, "You are our Moses!" and he answered, "I will." And we believe that he will fulfil his word. God reigns. J. T. C.

Abraham Lincoln.

The most pertinent and apt remark that we have yet met that has been occasioned by Abraham Lincoln's death, is that of Gen. Garfield, of Ohio. "They slew the noblest and gentlest heart that ever put down a Rebellion." The most noticeable quality of the deceased was his honesty. His western friends gave him the title of "Honest Old Abe," and he never forfeited it. Many great men have excelled him in other respects, but history will not offer an objection, if we place him in this respect among the highest names of earth.

"Princes and lords are but the breath of kings,
An honest man's the noblest work of God."

J. T. C.

Andrew Johnson.

We extract from Gen. Burnside's speech on Saturday, in this city, the following remarks which we believe to be correct.

"Gen. Burnside has known Mr. Johnson for two years most intimately, and asserted that during that entire time he never knew of his having the unhappy fault with which he has been charged; that there is no man more temperate habitually, and that his condition at the late inauguration ceremonies was induced solely by the necessity that required stimulants for his health, then recently so severely undermined by sickness. The assertions of Gen. Burnside were most positive, and were received by his audience with the utmost cordiality and confidence. None seemed to doubt that in the man upon whom our national calamity has thrown the burden of a nation's government, we are to have such a ruler as under God shall lead us in wisdom and righteousness; and if there be any that do yet doubt, let them accept the words of a General whose whole record entitles him to the heartiest and most implicit confidence." J. T. C.

Our New Chief Magistrate.

Andrew Johnson, late Vice-President of the United States, is now President. His course in administering the government is foreshadowed by a speech he made in Washington, when the news of the fall of Richmond was announced in that city. He said:

"You must indulge me in making one single remark in connection with myself. At the time the traitors in the Senate of the United States plotted against the Government, and entered into a conspiracy more foul, more execrable, and more odious than that of Cataline against the Romans, I happened to be a member of that body, and, as to loyalty, stood solitary and alone among the Senators from the Southern States. I was then and there called upon to know what I would do with such traitors, and I want to repeat my reply here. I said, If we had an Andrew Jackson he would hang them as high as Haman. But as he is no more, and sleeps in his grave in his own beloved State, where traitors and treason have even insulted his tomb and the very earth that covers his remains, humble as I am, when you ask me what I would do, my reply is, I would arrest them; I would try them; I would convict them; and I would hang them. As humble as I am and have been, I have pursued but one undeviating course. All that I have—life, limb, and property—have been put at the disposal of the country in this great struggle. I have been in camp, I have been in the field, I have been everywhere where this great Rebellion was; I have pursued it until I believe I can now see its termination.

Since the world began, there never has been a rebellion of such gigantic proportions, so infamous in character, so diabolical in motive, so entirely disregardful of the laws of civilised war. It has introduced the most savage mode of warfare ever practiced upon the earth. I will repeat here a remark for which I have been in no small degree censured. What is it, allow me to ask, that has sustained the nation in this great struggle? The cry has been, you know, that our Government was not strong enough for a time of Rebellion; that in such a time she would have to contend against internal weakness as well as internal foes. We have now given the world evidence that such is not the fact; and when the Rebellion shall have been crushed out, and the nation shall have once again settled down in peace, our Government will rest upon a more enduring basis than ever before. But, my friends, in what has the great strength of this Government consisted?

Has it been in one-man power? Has it been in some autocrat, or in some one man who held absolute government? No! I thank God I have it in my power to proclaim the great truth that this Government has derived its strength from the American people. They have issued the edict; they have exercised the power that has resulted in the overthrow of the Rebellion, and there is not another Government upon the face of the earth that could have withstood the shock. We can now congratulate ourselves that we possess the strongest, the freest, and the best Government the world ever saw. Thank God that we have lived through this trial, and that, looking in your intelligent faces here, to-day, I can announce to you the great fact that Petersburg, the outpost of the strong citadel, has been occupied by our brave and gallant officers, and our untiring, invincible soldiers. And not content with that, they have captured the citadel itself, the stronghold of the traitors. Richmond is ours, and is now occupied by the forces of the United States. Death to the conspirators —clemency to their victims.

One word more and I have done. It is this: I am in favor of clemency; but, in my opinion, evil-doers should be punished. Treason is the highest crime known in the catalogue of crimes; and for him that is guilty of it—for him that is willing to lift his impious hand against the authority of the Nation—I would say death is too easy a punishment. My notion is that treason must be made odious, that traitors must be punished and impoverished, their social power broken, though they must be made to feel the penalty of their crimes. Hence I say this—the halter to intelligent, influential traitors. But to the honest boy, to the deluded man, who has been deceived into the Rebel ranks, I would extend leniency. I would say return to your allegiance, renew your support to the Government and become a good citizen; but the leaders I would hang. I hold, too, that wealthy traitors should be made to remunerate those who have suffered as a consequence of their crimes. Union men who have lost their property, who have been driven from their homes beggars, and wanderers among strangers. It is well to talk about things here to-day, in addressing the well-informed persons who compose this audience. You can, to a very great extent, aid in molding public opinion, and in giving it proper direction. Let us commence the work. We have put down these traitors in arms; let us put them down in law, in public judgment, and in the morals of the world."

The same day of Mr. Lincoln's death, Mr. Johnson was inaugurated President, the oath of office being administered by Chief Justice Chase. After which, President Johnson spoke as follows:

"Gentlemen:—I must be permitted to say that I have been almost overwhelmed by the announcement of the sad event which has so recently occurred. I feel incompetent to perform duties so important and responsible as those which have been so unexpectedly thrown upon me. As to an indication of any policy which may be pursued by me in the administration of the Government, I have to say that that must be left for development as the Administration progresses. The message or declaration must be made by the acts as they transpire. The only assurance that I can now give of the future is reference to the past. The course which I have taken in the past in connection with this Rebellion must be regarded as a guaranty of the future. My past public life, which has been long and laborious, has been founded, as I in good conscience believe upon a great principle of right, which lies at the basis of all things. The best energies of my life have been spent in endeavoring to establish and perpetuate the principles of free government, and I believe that the Government, in passing through its present perils, will settle down upon principles consonant with popular rights, more permanent and enduring than heretofore. I must be permitted to say, if I understand the feelings of my own heart, I have long labored to ameliorate and elevate the condition of the great mass of the American people. Toil and an honest advocacy of the great principles of free government have been my lot. The duties have been mine—the consequences are God's. This has been the foundation of my political creed. I feel that in the end the government will triumph, and that these great principles will be permanently established. In conclusion, gentlemen, let me say that I want your encouragement and countenance. I shall ask and rely upon you and others in carrying the Government through its present perils. I feel in making this request that it will be heartily responded to by you and all other patriots and lovers of the rights and interests of a free people."

The New President.

SKETCH OF THE LIFE AND SERVICES OF ANDREW JOHNSON, OF TENNESSEE.

Andrew Johnson was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, December 29, 1808. When he had scarcely reached the age of four years, he lost his father, who died from the effects of an effort to save a friend from drowning. His mother was unable to afford her child any educational facilities whatever. He, therefore, never had the advantages of attending school. It is even said that during his younger years he was an inmate of the almshouse of Wake county, North Carolina, where he remained until his tenth year. At that age he was apprenticed to a tailor in his native city. He thus labored for seven years. His lack of schooling however, was in a great measure overcome by a strong desire to acquire knowledge, and he spent much of his leisure time in educating himself. An interesting anecdote is mentioned of his anxiety to learn to read. A gentleman of Raleigh was in the habit of visiting the tailor's shop and reading while the apprentice and journeymen were at work. He read well and generally made his selections from a volume of speeches of British statesmen. Young Johnson listened with great delight, and his first ambition was to be able to read and comprehend these speeches. He at once procured an alphabet and, with an instructor, attempted to learn to read. When at a loss to know a letter he applied for assistance to the journeymen with whom he worked. After acquiring his letters he asked the owner for the loan of the book he had so often heard read. The owner gave him the book and some instruction as to its use. He soon learned to read, and at night, after having finished his daily labor of ten or twelve hours, he spent two or three hours in study.

In 1824 he completed his apprenticeship and removed to Laurens Court House, South Carolina, where he worked as a journeyman. Whilst there he fell in love with a girl in the neighborhood and courted her. Mr Johnson tells the story himself. The young lady saw something more in him than her mother was able to discern. She engaged herself to him provided he could get her mother's consent. Andy went one Sunday to speak to the old lady. His heart failed him till towards night when he mustered up courage and popped the question to the mother. He says she broke out on him in a most terrible tirade of abuse, and said, "You trifling worthless vagabond, do you suppose I am going to let my daughter marry a wandering journeyman tailor? I know what you want; you are too lazy to work, and you are after my property." The old woman had four children and three negroes. This was her fortune. In utter despair young Johnson returned to the village mortified and crestfallen.

In May, 1826, he returned to Raleigh, where he procured work, and remained until September. At this time he removed to the West, taking with him his mother, who was entirely dependent upon him for a support. He stopped at Greenville, Tenn., and engaged in work. Remaining there about a year he married, and soon after went still further West. Failing to find a suitable place to settle, he returned to Greenville and commenced business. At this time Mr. Johnson's education was limited to reading. Under the instructions of his wife he speedily entered the higher branches. The only time he could devote to his studies was in the dead of night; but, forgetting the fatigues of his daily work in his thirst for knowledge, he overcame all the weakness of nature, and rapidly acquired a good fund of information. In 1828 Mr. Johnson was elected to his first office as alderman of the village. His satisfactory acquittal of himself in this office led to his re-election in 1829 and again in 1830. In the latter year he was elected Mayor and held that position for three years. In 1835 he was elected to the State Legislature. In the session of that year he took a bold stand against the measures of internal improvement proposed by some members, on the ground that it would entail upon the State a burdensome debt. The measure meeting the popular approval, in the election of the next year (1837) Mr. Johnson was defeated. In 1839 he was again a candidate. His predictions in opposition to the internal improvement bills having been realized, he was elected by a large majority. In 1840 he served as Presidential elector for the State at large on the democratic ticket. He canvassed a large portion of the State, meeting on the stump some of the leading Whig orators. In 1841 he was elected to the State Senate. In 1843 he was elected to Congress, serving by successive re-elections until 1853. During his career in that office he advocated the bill for refunding the fine imposed upon General Jackson at New Orleans in 1815, the annexation of Texas, the tariff of 1846, the war measures of Mr. Polk's administration, and a homestead bill. In 1859 he was elected Governor of Tennessee after an exciting canvass. He was re-elected in 1855 after another spirited contest. At the expiration of his second period as Governor, in 1857, he was elected to the Senate of the United States for the term ending March 3, 1863. He however, never completed his term. On March 4, 1862, he was confirmed by the Senate of the United States Military Governor of Tennessee with the rank of Brigadier general, with all the powers, duties and functions pertaining to that office, during the pleasure of the President, or until the loyal inhabitants of the State should organize a civil government, in accordance with the constitution of the United States. The designation of General Johnson for the position was considered by everybody as eminently proper, both in view of his peculiar fitness for the office and of his great popularity among all loyal people, besides his devotion to his own State. The Governor, by the acceptance of the office, necessarily vacated his position as Senator.

Mr. Johnson's administration in Tennessee was very generally approved, though it had some enemies. Under him, and with the assistance of the armies operating in Tennessee, order was restored in many sections of the State, and most of the inhabitants who remained loyal were protected.

On June 8, 1864, Mr. Johnson was chosen by the national republican convention as the candidate of the party for the Vice Presidency of the United States. In his letter of acceptance, in the following month, his expression of views were, in the main, in harmony with the settled opinions of a majority of the thinking minds of the country.

On March 4 last Mr. Johnson was regularly inaugurated as second to the good man whose death we lament.

Since Mr. Johson's induction into office as Vice President he has not been called upon to act in an official capacity, but a brief review of his career may enable us to draw some inferences in regard to his fitness for the vast public duties about to devolve upon him. He was born and reared amid the lowest poverty. It is evident if he had been without natural abilities of the rarest quality he never would have risen, particularly so high, above his trade. His master, though he failed to have him taught even the rudiments of an English education, at least trained him up to love the truth, work hard, and be straightforward with every one. By his own efforts he taught himself a little, and marrying, after his apprenticeship was completed, a woman who knew something about books, he was fairly started on the road to learning. Though Mr. Johnson is no scholar in the sense of books, his experience and observation have taught him more valuable lessons—a knowledge of men and strong common sense. His political bias was in early years exeedingly democratic. Previous to the breaking out of the present rebellion he was the idol of the Southern democracy; and had he permitted himself to float upon the wave of secession and treason there is not a doubt but he would have been placed at the head of that revolutionary movement, the Southern confederacy. But his devotion to his country—his whole country—impelled him to sever the bonds that connected him with a people whom he had for so long a period led and controlled, but who were snatched from his influence by the infamous crime of treason. These people he could still have wielded could his potent voice have reached them, but the monster of intolerance closed her jaws upon him. He was not permitted in Middle and West Tennessee to address the people. Had he attempted it a mob would have been ready, not only to stop his voice, but to take his life. Too well the leaders of rebellion in Tennessee knew his power over the people; and they were conscious that if he were permitted to make public speeches the people would rally around him—that he could preserve Tennessee from their fatal sway. He stood firm and yet stands firm, as a monument of loyalty and devotion to his country, while many of his cotemporaneous political lights have been forever extinguished and enshrouded in the perfidy of the conspiracy against the life of the nation. Among his old political friends he saw Isham G. Harris, the late Governor of Tennesssee; A. O. P. Nicholson, his colleague in the United States Senate; Andrew Ewing, Langdon C. Haynes and a host of others fall into the secession pit. Of his political opponents he saw E. H. Ewing, G. A. Henry, the "Eagle orator," his opponent the first time he was elected Governor of Tennessee, and who said, in the Bell and Everett Convention in Baltimore, that he wished he might be struck blind before he ever should see the Union dissolved; and even Bell, whose wisdom had shone as a beacon light to the nation for more than a quarter of a century, cower before the monster secession. But he, amid all this wreck, stood firm, keeping the glorious Union and the constitution of our fathers ever in view, and making them the polar star to which he steered amid the mighty convulsions and upheavings which beset him on every side; and he now appears upon the world's great stage as a living witness that public virtue and unselfish patriotism are not extinct even in those States that have innugurated this unholy war. While the names of many who formerly shone in the same sphere with him will be buried beneath a mausoleum of infamy, his will shine like the bright star of the morning, and be honored by generations yet unborn.—N. Y., Herald.

President Johnson's Position.

Since our other articles were in type the President has been waited upon by a large delegation of Citizens of Illinois, to whose address he replied as follows:

Gentlemen—I have listened with profound emotion to the kind words you have addressed to me. The visit of this large delegation to speak to me, through you, sir, these words of encouragement, I had not anticipated. In the midst of the saddening circumstauces which surround us, and the immense responsibility thrown upon me, an expression of the confidence of individuals, and still more of an influential body like that before me, representing a great commonwealth, cheers and strengthens my heavily burdened mind. I am at a loss for words to respond. In an hour like this, of deepest sorrow, were it possible to embody in words the feeling of my bosom, I could not command my lips to utter them. Perhaps the best reply I could make, and the most readily appropriate to your kind assurances of confidence, would be to receive them in silence. (Sensation.) The throbbings of my heart, since the sad catastrophe which has appalled us, cannot be reduced to words; and oppressed as I am with the new and great responsibility which has devolved upon me, and saddened with grief, I can with difficulty respond to you at all. But I cannot permit such expressions of the confidence reposed in me by the people to pass without acknowledgment.

To an individual like myself, who has never claimed much, but who has, it is true, receivd from a generous people many marks of trust and honor for a long time, an occasion like this, and a manifestation of public feeling so well timed are peculiarly acceptable. Sprung from the people myself, every pulsation of the popular heart finds an immediate answer in my own. By many men in public life such occasions are often considered merely formal. To me they are real. Your words of countenance and encouragement sink deep in my heart, and were I even a coward I could not but gather from them strength to carry out my convictions of right. Thus feeling, I shall enter upon the dischage of my great duty firmly, steadfastly—(applause)—if not with the signal ability exhibited by my predecessor, which is still fresh in our sorrowing minds. Need I repeat that no heart feels more sensibly than mine this great affliction.

In what I say on this occasion I shall indulge in no petty spite of auger, no feeling of revenge. But we have beheld a notable event in the history of mankind. In the midst of the American people, where every citizen is taught to obey law and observe the rules of Christian conduct, our Chief Magistrate, the beloved of all hearts, has been assassinated; and when we trace this crime to its cause, when we remember the source whence the assassin drew his inspiration, and then look at the result, we stand yet more astonished at this most barbarous, most diabolical assassination. Such a crime as the murder of a great and good man, honored and revered, the beloved and the hope of the people, springs not alone from a solitary individual of ever so desperate wickedness. We can trace its course through successive steps, without my enumerating them here, back to that source which is the spring of all our woes. No one can say that if the perpetrator of this fiendish deed be arrested he should not undergo the extremest penalty the law knows for crime; none will say that mercy should interpose.

But is he alone guilty? Here, gentlemen, you perhaps expect me to present some indication of my future policy. One thing I will say, every era teaches its lesson. The times we live in are not without instruction. The American people must be taught—if they do not already feel—that treason is a crime, and must be punished—(applause)—that the government will not always bear with its enemies—that it is strong, not only to protect, but to punish. (Applause.) When we return to the original code, and examine the catalogue of crimes, we there find arson laid down as a crime, with its appropriate penalty. We find there theft and robbery and murder given as crimes; and there, too, we find the last and highest of crimes—treason. (Applause.) With other and inferior offences our people are familiar. But in our peaceful history treason has been almost unknown. The people must understand that it is the blackest of crimes, and will be surely punished. (Applause.) I make this allusion not to excite the already exasperated feelings of the public, but to point out the principles of public justice which should guide our action at this particular juncture, and which accord with sound public morals. Let it be engraven on every heart that treason is a crime, and traitors shall suffer the penalty. (Applause.) While we are appalled, overwhelmed, at the fall of one man in our midst by the hand of a traitor, shall we allow men—I care not by what weapons—to attempt the life of the State with impunity? While we strain our minds to comprehend the enormity of this assassination, shall we allow the nation to be assassinated? (Applause.) I speak in no spirit of unkindness.

I leave the events of the future to be disposed of as they arise, regarding myself as the humble instrument of the American people. In this, as in all things, justice and judgment shall be determined by them. I do not harbor bitter or revengeful feelings towards any. In general terms, I would say that public morals and public opinion should be established upon the sure and inflexible principles of justice. (Applause.) When the question of exercising mercy comes before me it will be considered calmly, judiciously, remembering that I am the Executive of the nation. I know men love to have their names spoken of in connection with acts of mercy, and how easy it is to yield to this impulse. But we must not forget that what may be mercy to the individual is cruelty to the State. (Applause.) In the exercise of mercy there should be no doubt left that this high prerogative is not used to relieve a few at the expense of many. Be assured I shall never forgot that I am not to consult my own feelings alone, but to give an account to the whole people. (Applause.)

In regard to my future course I will now make no professions, no pledges. I have been connected somewhat actively with public affairs, and to the history of my past public acts, which is familiar to you, I refer, for those principles which have governed me heretofore and will guide me hereafter. In general I will say I have long labored for the amelioration and elevation of the great mass of mankind. My opinions as to the nature of popular government have long been cherished; and, constituted as I am, it is now too late in life for me to change them. I believe that government was made for man, and not man for government.

This struggle of the people against the most gigantic rebellion the world ever saw has demonstrated that the attachment of the people to their government is the strongest national defense human wisdom can devise. (Applause.) So long as each man feels that the interests of the government are his interests, so long as the public heart turns in the right direction, and the people understand and appreciate the theory of our government and love liberty, our constitution will be transmitted unimpaired. If the time ever comes when the people shall fail, the government will fail, and we shall cease to be one of the nations of the earth. After having preserved our form of free government, and shown its power to maintain its existence through the vicissitudes of nearly a century, it may be that it was necessary for us to pass through this last ordeal of intestine strife to prove that this government will not perish from internal weakness, but will stand to defend itself against all foes and punish treason. (Applause.)

In the dealings of an inscrutable Providence, and by the operation of the constitution, I have been thrown unexpectedly into this position. My past life—especially my course during the present unholy rebellion—is before you. I have no principles to retract. I defy any one to point to any of my public acts at variance with the fixed principles which have guided me through life. I have no professions to offer. Professions and promises would be worth nothing at this time. No one can foresee the circumstances that will hereafter arise. Had any man gifted with prescience, four years ago, uttered and written down in advance the events of this period, the story would have seemed more marvelous than anything in the "Arabian Nights." I shall not attempt to anticipate the future. As events occur, and it becomes necessary for me to act, I shall dispose of each as it arises, deferring any declaration or message until it can be written paragraph by paragraph in the light of events as they transpire.

The Assassination.

The following we are permitted to extract from a private letter of an Officer, who was ten months a prisoner, in Southern starvation prisons, and who has only a few weeks since been parolled from those rebel "hells." It speaks the feelings of a heart which has felt the horrors of the wicked rebellion on hearing the sad news of the assassination of the President.—EDITOR.

CAMP PAROLE, ANNAPOLIS, Md.
Apr. 15th 1865.

DEAR———:—What a tragedy! Our President and his chief State Minister assasinated! Assassinated on the very day four years after the Rebellion asserted itself by the capture Ft. Sumter. Verily we are great as the old Romans were! It is horribly tragical. We have treason down at last: we have our heel upon its throat: the entire Republic holds a grand Carnival of rejoicing over its expiring throes; when, alas! it seems to gather together all its dying energies to signalize its death by one infernal act, and its Conqueror pays with his life the penalty of his gigantic victory. What American Shakspeare will dramatize this wonderful story? There is a dramatic completeness to it that is superb. I hope the reflection is not unpatriotic and cold blooded, but I cannot help thinking with a sort of national pride of how the whole world will be startled when they hear of it. I accept it as a fact accomplished. Of course, take vengeance on the assasin. Hang him; shoot him; decapitate him; burn him, as the penalty of his high and mighty crime, and we shall mourn for the illustrious dead, knowing his merits and honoring him for the work he has accomplished. Envy and detraction will become silent and the nation will delight to do homage to its only President whose life was sacrificed in its defense.

But oh! how fearfully this event forces down upon upon us the conviction of our weakness and our ignorance in the hands of God. We were revelling over the evidence of our power and wisdom. Who, forty-eight hours ago, would have presumed to say, that Lincoln's work was done; that the Almighty had no more use for him? Even now who can predict the "coming man"? Who is he that is to complete the pacification of the country? What great part is this republic about to play in the world's history, that at the very height of our national jubilee, we are stricken with an undreamed, overwhelming calamity? Alas! we all have our destinies to accomplish; but time alone can reveal the mystery that shrouds each onward step. We must move on; and we peer into the darkness and say, We are on the path; it is straight ahead; or, it is upward. But how often do we find it winds around and seems even to go backward, or that it descends down into an abyss shrouded with as great mystery as before. God help us.

Our Relation to Human Government.

If there ever was an event calculated to arouse stolidity to thought, cowardice to courage, indifference to patriotism, and to point out in an unmistakable way the relation of Christ's followers to human government, the murder of the late President is such. For myself, I have to confess a past laxness of sympathy with our government in its bitter struggle with the dragon of slavery and rebellion. I had been led to put a wrong construction on the words of Jesus, and to suppose that the mind of Christ was antagonistic to war, both of unjust and aggressive war and of a purely defensive one. I did not distinguish the true meaning of the Saviour's commands—"Resist not evil"—"Put up thy sword"—"Love your enemies"—from the wrong conclusions which had been reached by narrow minds, and in common with many other unreflective, uninstructed, yet honest men, I advocated strict and unqualified non-resistance. I thank God, that for the last year or more, I have had my face turned in another direction, and I now rejoice in a more excellent view of my duties to human government. While I gaze into the glorified face of Jesus, my Master and Teacher, I see depicted there not only the serene and healthful features of love, but also the lofty lineaments of majesty and justice. I not only see Jesus the Saviour, but Christ the King; not only the helper of the helpless, the comforter of the comfortless, the health of the healthless, the life of the lifeless, but the terror of the terrorless, the breaker in pieces of the oppressor, the iron ruler of the incorrigible. I read of one who "shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked."

Some of us have been led into a mistake similar to that of the popular theologians. They read the prophet Isaiah—"Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save." Isa. lxiii. This they apply to the doctrine of Atonement; an exceedingly stupid application: nevertheless it is about as correct as the general tenor of orthodox interpretation at the present day. Now we affirm that Jesus the Atoner, the Reconciler, is not brought to view in the cited passage. It is Christ the King, the Avenger of his elect. The succeeding verses prove this: "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the winefat? I have trodden the winepress alone; and of the people there was none with me [his own single power is sufficient to overwhelm his enemies]; for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come." Compare Rev. xix. 11-15. "And I saw heaven opened, and behold, a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns; and he had a name written, that no man knew but he himself. And he was clothed with a vesture dipped [stained or sprinkled with, or] in blood; and his name is called The Logos of God....And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God."

We say that some of us have been led into an error somewhat similar to the erroneous interpretation referred to. We have considered Jesus only as meek and lowly, not as just and righteous; as a Saviour, not as a Governor. The time has fully come for a revolution in this matter. Away with your sickly sentiment and search for the solid rock of God's truth! We preach the coming King; let us then allow that he has the heart to destroy his enemies. The same one who said "Resist not evil" is yet to tread the winepress of fury and war. If the two principles of peace and war can lodge in the breast of Jesus without a conflict, what are we that we should put on airs of love and mercy when stern Justice commands, Arise and face iniquity! There is no more tender epithet in the word of God than that which indicates the sacrificial office of Jesus. He is the Lamb of God that beareth the sin of the world! And yet the Lamb slain can be roused into "wrath," for his enemies shall yet say—"Hide us from the wrath of the Lamb." Let us not forget that Abraham, the father of the faithful took the sword against tyranny and wrong, vindicated the right by slaying the enemy, and rescuing the captive, and when he returned from the slaughter of the kings was blessed by no less a personage than Melchizedek, priest of the most high God and the grand type of Jesus Christ. The Passover.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN, April 10, 1865.

The past day has been one of deep interest to me. Since the early morning my mind has been dwelling on the dealings of the Lord with his people of old, and of the great deliverance which he wrought for them, when with an high hand and outstretched arm he brought them forth from the house of their bondage, and saved them from the wrath of their enemies, leaving them to be destroyed. Vividly before my mind has been pictured the scenes enacted on that eventful night of the fourteenth day of the first month, a day to be observed by Israel "in their generations by an ordinance forever."

Egypt resting in imaginary security; her king impiously defying the God of the Hebrews, refusing to obey his commands and let his people go; while Israel with watchful eye and anxious heart stand waiting for that great manifestation of divine power which is to decide their destiny, and upon which hangs all their hopes of future safety and deliverance. The lamb has been slain; and the blood of the sacrifice marks many an humble dwelling throughout the land. Useless and foolish it may appear to those who understand not its import, but to this multitude of long-oppressed slaves of how much importance! Their life, their salvation depending upon its mystic power. As darkness deepens over the land, they are safely housed, and later, with girded loins, shoes upon their feet and staff in hand, in haste they eat the paschal lamb, with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, while at the same hour the destroying angel is prepairing to go forth over the land on his errand of judgment. On the midnight air wails of lamentation and mourning are heard, for in every house of the Egyptians, from Pharaoh's to his lowest subjects the stricken dead are found.

But Israel is saved. The blood upon the doorposts and lintels has been seen—the destroyer has passed over God's chosen ones. And now, even before the morning's dawn, by those who have so long denied them liberty, they are driven forth in haste out of the land. "It is a night to be much observed unto the Lord for bringing them out from the land of Egypt." "He brought them forth also with silver and gold, and there was not one feeble person among their tribes. Egypt was glad when they departed, for the fear of them fell upon them."

And they were not left to perish; "But he made his own people to go forth like sheep, and guided them in the wilderness like a flock. And he led them on safely, so that they feared not; but the sea overwhelmed their enemies. He spread a cloud for a covering, and fire to light them in the night. The people asked and he brought quails, and satisfied them with the bread of heaven. He opened the rock and the waters gushed; they ran in dry places like a river. For he remembered his holy promise, and Abraham his servant. And he brought forth his people with joy, and his chosen with gladness: And gave them the lands of the heathen; and they inherited the labor of the people; that they might observe his statutes and keep his laws. Praise ye the Lord."

And what do these things typify? and by them, what are we to learn? How has my heart been made glad, as in mind I have run over the plan, and come down to the great antitype—"the lamb slain from the foundation of the world,"—"Christ our passover sacrificed for us;" his blood shed for our redemption. Truly, I have felt that I could "keep the feast, not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleaved bread of sincerity and truth."

As these thoughts have filled my mind, my ears have been saluted from every quarter with the sounds of rejoicing. From over the hills and among these vallies, cities, towns, and villages, send forth their notes with joy. Roaring cannon and guns, pealing bells, whistles and gongs, have been called in requisition to demonstrate the heartfelt joy of the people at the prospect of the return of peace. And shall not I too rejoice? Yea, I do rejoice; for well I know that the Lord has set his seal to a work that has broken the "oppressors rod," and hath in our day delivered a people from bondage by his own hand, and humbled into the very dust a power that has bid him defiance to his face, violated every principle of justice and christianity, and that too in the light of God's word and under the sanctimonious garb of religion.

Not only of late, but for a long time have I seen, yes, and before I saw I believed (as who would not who believed in the God of the Bible,) that "success" would be on "the side of truth," and that "the Lord" would accomplish the work. Therefore, to-day, in view of the past and present deliverance, I feel like saying, with Moses and Miriam, "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. The Lord is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation; my father's God and I will exalt him. The Lord is a man of war; the Lord is his name. Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O Lord, hath dashed in pieces the enemy. And in the greatness of thine excellency thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee: thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? The Lord shall reign forever and ever." Amen.

But there is another and greater deliverance to come a little in the future, when an innumerable multitude of captives shall be given up and brought from the dominion and bondage of death. A mighty shout will go up then from ransomed millions, "O death where is thy sting, and where, O grave, thy victory?" Not one will be overlooked or forgotten in that day. Then, and not till then, will be fully known the efficacy of the blood of "Christ our passover." But it needs a pen mightier than mine to write on a subject so divine and glorious, and it seems almost like presumption for one so weak, so puny, so unworthy to approach it. Yet it is my hope, my joy, my consolation by day and by night; my whole being is permeated with it, and and how can I resist the influence? I only know that in that glad day, when shall be sung, not only the song of Moses, but also a new song; that of the Lamb. I shall be glad to join in the anthem of praise.

And now I think you will not doubt me when I tell you how sweetly I have been blessed of God, as here alone, after my family have retired, I have waited upon the Lord; have communed with the unseen, and partaken of the emblems of the broken body and spilled blood of my crucified, risen Redeemer. No doubt, a loved daughter would have joined me had I asked her, but this solemn, sacred hour I prefer to spend alone with the Lord. I trust I have been able "to discern the Lord's body," and have felt how blessed it is, by faith, to "eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of God," through whom alone I hope for life. As I contemplate the theme, language again fails me; but you, who know the Lord, "and what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints; and what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places," know what I would say.

Not always alone, do I expect to eat the Lord's supper. When the whole family of the redeemed are gathered into the kingdom of our Father; when the marriage supper of the Lamb is celebrated, and the new wine of the kingdom is drunken; when Jesus "shall gird himself and come forth and serve" his people, I hope to be there.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted intheir design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wher ever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with nt egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

THE CROSS AND THE CROWN.

As on the world's great stage I stood,
With no determined aim;
E'er watching those who in my range
Of observation came.

A little company I viewed,
Not having pomp or power;
But having this peculiar mark—
A heavy cross they bore.

So all unlike they seemed to be,
To every other class;
So patient, hopeful, and serene;
Prone to forgive and bless:

While those around with haughty mein,
And merry thoughtless jest,
Upon the sacred badge they held,
Scorn and contempt did cast.

I asked them why they differed so,
From all the giddy throng,
And why not cast aside the cause
Of worldlings' taunting song?

They told me of a crown of life,
Of glorious beauty too,
Reserved for all who will this lone
Cross-bearing way pursue.

They bade me view its charms; I looked,
And my far-gazing eye
Descried the bright unfading crown
Of immortality.

So far surpassing all beside,
Its glories seemed to be,
My very inmost soul was filled
With joyful extacy.

With rapture then I cried aloud,
O happy, favored throng,
Would I might join your humble band,
And with you march along.

Come, come said they, our King would have
All willing souls to bear
His cross while here they dwell, and then
The crown of life to wear.

I heard no more, but quickly found
Within their ranks a place,
And gladly now I onward go,
Adorning rich free grace:

Esteeming all the world's reproach,
As being nothing worth,
Compared with that bright crown I'll wear
Upon the glad new earth.

LIFE-LOVER.

THE GOSPEL.

The Gospel comprehends whatever is great, and fair, and good. The sublime, the beautiful and the useful, all unite in it. There is also one important sense in which it is ever new.

The Gospel of Christ, or the Covenant of Grace, is not merely remedial. It is more. It not only cures the disease of nature, but raises to a higher life. Christ is not a mere restorer. He raises the fallen to an unspeakably higher elevation than that from which they fell. He does much more than make up the loss they sustained in the apostacy. He causes them to realize infinite gain. He brings them back to a nearer relation to the Godhead, than that from which they broke away. "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound;" Rom. v. 15; and "much more they which receive abundance of grace," Rom. v. 17. There is no more triumphant thought suggested by our religion than this,—the superiority, in point of dignity and happiness, of that condition to which grace exalts us above that from which sin cast down. The good forfeited was such as Adam, a mere man like one of us would have earned, if he had been obedient. The good that awaits us, is the reward of the obedience of a Being infinitely more illustrious than was Adam. "The first man was of the earth, earthy;—the second man is the Lord from heaven; and as we have borne the image of the earthly, so shall we also bear the image of the heavenly."

To add to the Gospel of Christ may constitute as fatal a perversion as to subtract from it. It is not more mischievous to separate from the Gospel some of its essential principles than it is to incorporate with those principles others that do not naturally belong to it. A corrupted Gospel is as destructive as a discarded Gospel. It is as injurious to believe too much as it is to believe too little. If a man hold that we are justified partly by the faith of Christ, and partly by our own obedience, whether it be moral or ceremonial, he is fallen from grace equally as if he denied the necessity of any dependence on Christ. In either case, Christ has become of no effect to him. Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, not to help them to save themselves; not to do something towards saving them; not to save them in part, but by his blood and Spirit, to do all that was necessary to their salvation, and all that is involved in their salvation. Christ came not to make up the deficiencies of our righteousness, but to make out a complete righteousness for us; not to supply what is wanting in human merit, but himself alone to merit for us all we need or shall need through eternity. He, and he alone must be depended upon. His, and his only, must be all the glory.

There is nothing more remarkable in the Bible, nothing more admirable, nothing more distinctive of it as the word of God, and not the work of man, than the simplicity of the method of salvation which it reveals; and especially as it regards that which the sinner himself has to do. There is a mystery connected with the plan of salvation, it is true; mystery in the person of Christ, mystery in his sufferings, and mystery in the operations of the Holy Spirit; but mystery is not necessarily inconsistent with simplicity And besides, we have nothing to do with the mysteries of the method, but just to believe them as facts. It is not made our duty to unravel or comprehend, but to believe them. There is no more difficulty in believing a mysterious fact, than a fact not mysterious, if there be sufficient evidence of it. Our belief of a statement, depends not on the nature of it, but on the evidence which supports it.

The Gospel transcended expectation, and it surpassed conception. Even heaven, that was accustomed to God's benevolence, was amazed at it, and the angels have never yet recovered from the astonishment which seized them, when they first contemplated the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Yet wretched men affect to conceive that impostors have forged, or enthusiasts devised the Gospel; or at least they can see nothing marvelous in it. Oh, the human mind was no more capable of contriving the Gospel, than human hands were of spreading out and garnishing the heavens. Creation no more than redemption, bears the impress of Divinity.

It is a received principle among the skeptics, that of two miracles, one of which must be believed, we must choose the less, as being the least opposed to reason. On this principle, the infidel is bound to believe the Gospel. For to regard the Bible as false, would compel us to believe a more marvelous thing, than to receive it as true. It is far less improbable, than this narrative, with all its stupendous facts and revelations, should be true, than that any man, or set of men, should have been able to invent it. The latter supposition is too monstrous to be received by anything but a bad heart. If the Gospel came not from the inspiration of the Most High, will they that deny it tell us where it did come from? Since it professes to come from God, if it did not come from him, it proceeded from a gang of abominable impostors; and yet it contains, incontestably, the most pure and perfect system of ethics and theology that has ever been presented to the world. So that the purest and sublimest doctrines had their derivation from the boldest impiety, and that which has done more than all things put together, both to inform mankind of their duty, and to spur them on to its performance, was the work of some of the worst men that ever lived! Is not this a wonderful thing, a stupendous miracle? And yet the falsehood of the Gospel involves this, and the infidel must believe it. Or will it be said that the evangelists and apostles were weak and enthusiastic men—not preserved from old wives' fables, by any sound philosophy? Then enthusiasm, than which nothing is more easily detected, and nothing more wild and incoherent than its works, has produced a sober and harmonious system, which does not bear a single characterestic of that which produced it, nor has the smallest affinity with it; and a system which has sustained every attack made upon it for eighteen hundred years, and has at this moment, among its friends, a large majority of the wisest, most learned, most scientific, and most sober men on earth. Here is another miracle which the system of unbelief involves.—Selected.

"A BETTER RESURRECTION."

We extract the following from an article in "The Preacher and United Presbyterian," a paper published at Pittsburg, Pa. The reader will observe the faith of the servants of God at the time in which the Apocrypha was written.—EDITOR.

We have, in Hebrews xi. 35, plainly are ference to the history in the 2d Book of Maccabees: "And others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection." We know of no portion of Old Testament history to which this so fully applies as to the following, taken from 2 Maccabees, Chap. vii.: "It came to pass also, that seven brethren with their mother were taken, and were compelled by the king, against the law, to taste swine's flesh, and were tormented with scourges and whips. But one of them that spake first, said thus, What wouldst thou ask or learn of us? We are ready to die rather than to transgress the laws of our fathers. Then the king, being in a rage, commanded pans and caldrons to be made hot; which forthwith being heated, he commanded to cut out the tongue of him that spake first, and to cut off the utmost parts of his body, the rest of his brethren and his mother looking on. Now, when he was thus maimed in all his members, he commanded him, being yet alive, to be brought to the fire, and to be fried in the pan; and as the vapor of the pan was for a good ways dispersed, they exhorted one another with the mother to die manfully, saying thus: The Lord God looketh upon us, and in truth hath comfort in us." "So when the first was dead after this manner, they brought the second to make him a mocking stock: and when they had pulled off the skin of his head with the hair, they asked him, Wilt thou eat before thou be punished throughout every member of thy body? But he answered in his own language, and said, No. Wherefore he also received the next torment in order as the former did. And when he was at the last gasp, he said, Thou like a fury takest us out of this present life, but the King of the world shall raise us up, who die for His laws, unto everlasting life. After him was the third made a mocking stock; and when he was required, he put out his tongue, holding forth his hands manfully, and said courageously, These I have from heaven, and for His laws I despise them, and from him I hope to receive them again. The fourth, when he was ready to die, said thus, "It is good being put to death by men, to look for hope from God, to be raised again by him: as for thee, thou shalt have no resurrection to life." To her only surviving son the mother said, "Doubtless, the Creator of the world, who formed the generation of man, and found out the beginning of all things, will also, of his own mercy, give you breath and life again, as ye now regard not your own selves for His law's sake. Fear not this tormentor, but being worthy of thy brethren, take thy death, that I may receive thee again in mercy with thy brethren." And this son died, professing, "Our brethren, who now have suffered a short pain, are dead under God's covenant of everlasting life; but thou, through the judgment of God, shalt receive just punishment for thy pride."

The allusion of the Apostle being, as we think, obviously to this scene of torture, the "better resurrection" of which he speaks, is the resurrection to everlasting life, in hope of which these Maccabean martyrs died, the hope only of the righteous and faithful, and from which all persecutors, and all apostates from the covenant of God would be excluded. This sweeps away the gloss of the Universalists on this passage. The doctrine of the resurrection from the dead, in which the body should live again, in which the "hands" should be "restored" was believed among the ancient Jews. Where did they learn it? Certainly, not from the heathen. Where else but from their Scriptures—the law and the prophets."

GERIZIM AND EBAL.

A mountain, the ancient Gerizim, springing up to the height of about eight hundred feet, guards the entrance of the valley on the left hand, and another, which is Ebal, nearly as high stands on the right. It was on these heights that Joshua, in obedience to the command of Moses, assembled the tribes soon after their arrival in the promised land, to utter responsively the blessings and curse of the law. See Deuteronomy xxiii. 11, and Joshua viii. 33, 34. The hills are at such a distance from each other that it has been judged that the voices of the speakers, in a clear day, might have been heard distinctly from one summit to the other. It was from the top of Gerizim, in the rear of the town, where it is not so high as nearer to the plain, that Jotham delivered his fable of the trees to the men of Shechem, to reprove them for their folly in making Abimelech king, (Judges ix. 1, seq.) The language of the account deserves notice.—He "lifted up his voice," it is said, "and cried" unto the men of Shechem. With such an exertion of the voice he could easily have been heard by the people of the city; for the hill so overhangs the valley that a person from the side or summit would have no difficulty in speaking to listeners at the base, This fact refutes the objection that the book of Judges involves a physicial impossibility. Later history mentions a case in which soldiers on the hill shouted to the people, and endeavored to instigate them to an insurrection. There is something about the elastic almosphere of an Eastern clime which causes it to transmit sound with wonderful celerity and distinctness. Gerizim was the holy mount of the Samaritans, (John iv. 20,) where they built a temple, which they regarded as the true place of worship, in opposition to the temple of Jerusalem.

But that which gives to this locality its most sacred interest is the continued existence of the well where our Saviour held his memorable conversation with the woman of Samaria. I have no doubt whatever of the identification of this well; the various local proofs which point to that spot, and the uniformity of the tradition, furnish an amount of testimony respecting the question too strong to be set aside. The Saviour was journeying at the time, from Judea to Galilee, (Jon iv. 4, seq.,) and, as he passed through Samaria, would cross, natural, the plain of Mukna. It was noonday, "the sixth hour," and being wearied and thirsty, he sat down at the mouth of the well. There too, I sat down, and taking the record of the "gracious words which proceeded from his lips" on that occasion, I read it amid the surrounding objects, not only with new interest, but with the perception of the points of connection between the narrative and the outward scene, which left on my mind no doubt that it was the place where Jesus conversed with the Samaritan woman. The well is near the western edge of the plain, just in front of the opening between the hills where Nablus, the site of Shechem, is situated. Before me, therefore, as I sat there, was the town from which the people came forth, on the report of the woman to see and hear the prophet for themselves. Behind me were the green fields, then waving with grain, but at the earlier season of the year when Christ was there, recently plowed and sowed, which renders his illustration so natural: "Lift up your eyes and look on the fields," (referring to the people,) "for they are ripe already to harvest." My curiosity to taste the water I could not gratify, on account of the old difficulty: "the well is still deep, and there is nothing to draw with." I threw a stone into the mouth of it, and could hear it rumbling away in the distance, as it bounded from side to side, until it sank at last, in the water at the bottom. It has been ascertained to be at least seventy-five feet deep, bored through the solid rock. "In this mountain our forefathers worshipped," said the woman, "and the Jews say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship." How abrupt, how vague is this reference to a mountain, as it stands in the report of the conversation. But it all becomes definite, intelligible, as we read the history of the spot. There is Gerizim just at hand, at which the woman pointed, at the moment, or glanced with the eye, as she uttered these words. In short John's narrative of the occurrence at the well forms a picture for which one sees that the perfect frameworks is provided, as he looks around him in front of the hills which enclose the modern Nablus.

A church stood anciently, over this spot hallowed once by the presence of the Saviour. The common tradition supposes it to have been built by Helena, the mother of Constantine. It was erected, certainly, at an early period; for Jerome, near the close of the fourth century, in his sketch of Paul's pilgrimage, says that she came to Shechem, and entered the church that stood over Jacob's well. The ground there is slightly elevated, like a platform, showing the space which the edifice occupied, and building, stones lie scattered around, formerly wrought, no doubt, into its walls or foundations. The original mouth of the well is no longer visible on the outside, a vaulted roof having been built over it, through which it is necessary to descend in order to reach the proper entrance of the excavation. The aperture is barely large enough to allow a person to crowd his body through it. The neighboring Arabs, ever on the watch to observe the approach of strangers, take care to keep a heavy stone over the opening, so as to obtain a reward for assisting to roll away the barricade.—Christian Review.

CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The Canon of the New Testament is a collection of books written by the apostles, or by men who were companions of the apostles, and who wrote under their inspection. These books are called the Canon, from a Greek word which signifies a rule, because to a Christian they constitute the only proper and sufficient rule of faith and practice.

These books are called Scriptures, or The Writings, because these writings are held by Christians in the highest estimation. They are the Scriptures of the New Testament, or more properly speaking, of the New Covenant, because they contain a complete account of the Christian dispensation, which is described as a covenant by which the Almighty God engages to bestow eternal life upon the penitent and virtuous believer in Christ. For this reason the Christian Scriptures, and particularly the books which contain the history of Jesus Christ, are called the Gospel, or Good News, a literal translation of the evaggelion, as these sacred writings contain the best tidings which could be communicated to mankind.

The Canon of Scripture is either the Received or the True. The Received Canon comprehends the whole of that collection of books which is contained in the New Testament, and which are generally received by Christians as of apostolical authority. The True Canon consists of those books only, the genuineness of which is established on satisfactory evidence. When, or by whom, the received canon was formed, is not certainly known. It has been commonly believed that it was fixed by the Council of Laodicea, A. D. 210. It leaves out the James and Jude.

The following is a table of the books of the New Testament as they are divided by Eusebius into those, the authenticity of which had never been called in question, and those whose genuineness had been disputed by the early Christian writers.—Euseb. Hist. Eccl. Book. iii.

LET THE CHILDREN WRITE.

I was very much interested in reading lately in the children's corner of the Herald, a letter from "Addie." I have often thought of the company of little pilgrims in New Haven and wished I could hear how they were getting along in the way. They remind me of my own experience when I first began to serve the Lord, and of the precious seasons I enjoyed with my young companions in our little prayer meetings. I had made up my mind to write to Addie to inquire after their prosperity, when I saw her letter in the paper. I hope we may hear from her again.

And are there not other children who love the Saviour and are trying to serve him, who will write also? It is the privilege of every one who is old enough to believe in and love Jesus, to speak or write a word for him. It may help or encourage some others who are striving to gain a home in the kingdom, or may perhaps induce some one to seek the Lord who is as yet a stranger to his pardoning love, for the Lord is able to bless your efforts. At least, it will I am sure, do some of us older children good, to hear from you.

I hope that children in other places will meet together for prayer and earnestly ask the Lord to bless them and their young friends, for we know that he delights to answer the prayers of those who fear his name and wait upon him. The good Shepherd will ever care for the lambs of his flock and hear the weakest and feeblest when they cry unto him.

AUNT LOUISA.

HOW TO KEEP BREAD.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days."—Eccl. xi. 1.

"Well, says some little boy or girl, "that is a funny way to keep bread, and yet it is in the Bible, so it must be true, but I'm sure I can not tell how."

Will you let Auntie Kate tell you, then, that what we call bread is not known in all parts of the world as such. Rice takes the place of bread in many countries; indeed, it is said to be the chief food of one-third the human race. It is cultivated in low lands, which are entirely covered with water at some seasons of the year, so that, instead of speaking of winter and summer, as we do, the people talk about the wet season and the dry season, When the waters have run off, and the mud is partially dry, the rice is sown very thickly. Then the water is made to flow over it again, and when the plants are five or six inches high, they are transplanted so as to be a foot apart each way, and remain covered with water until ripe, when the straw is yellow. In some countries, however, the people go out in boats, and sow the rice literally "upon the waters," and "after many days," that is, at the beginning of the dry season, they reap their harvest.

"But," says little Johnnie, "rice does not grow here, so how can I obey the command?"

I will tell you how one dear little fellow obeyed it, and perhaps you can then think of many ways in which you can think of many ways in which you can do it.

Frank and Edward attended the same school, and were very nearly of the same age, but were not at all alike, either in looks or character. Eddie was a sensitive little fellow; full of frolic, to be sure, but very loving, and careful not to grieve others. One day he came home looking very sadly. His mother noticed the cloud on her boy's usually sunny face, and inquired the cause.

"O mamma," said he, "I don't know what I shall do; it seems as if I never could go to school again;" and his little heart, overcharged with grief, burst out in a flood of tears, as he hid his face in his mother's lap.

"But what has happened, my son?"

"O, nothing new to-day mamma, but we have had a new scholar this week; his name is Frank, and he is such a naughty boy, mamma, I don't think he loves any body, for he is all the time trying to tease us, and we can not love him, nor half enjoy any thing."

"And what do you do in return, Eddie?"

"Why, I can not do much, but some of the boys tease him back, and make him so angry it frightens me some times."

"Have any of you tried what kindness would do, Eddie? You do not know what has made him ill-tempered and unkind. Perhaps he has not a pleasant home, as you have. Perhaps his parents do not love the Bible, and have never taught him the Saviour's "Golden Rule," nor even that little prayer which you love to say every night, and he may never have thought that to make others happy, and to please the blessed Saviour, is the only sure way of being happy himself."

Eddie's lip quivered, and he looked half ashamed, as he answered, "I never thought of that mamma."

That afternoon Eddie went to school with his heart full of good resolutions, and you might have known by the expression of his face, and by his very step, that he had set about some difficult task. As he came within sight of the school-house he saw Frank sitting on a fence near, whittling, so he ran towards him, saying,—

"You are just the one I wanted to see, Frank, and I have brought a little book for you to read, which uncle Henry gave me, full of pictures and beautiful stories; and just see what a pretty red cover, with little angels in the corners. They look so like my baby sister, only for the wings, that I always think of her."

Frank looked as if he did not know exactly what to say, he was so surprised and confounded but his evil nature got the better of him, and he answered, gruffly, "I don't want your book."

"Why, Frank, I'm sure you would like it. Here is a story about a lion who was so tamed that he would follow his master just like a dog; and here are some sailor stories. One little boy made a ship himself, a little one, when he was not much older than we are, and oh! so many pictures—do look!"

"Well, I can get books enough at home," was the ungracious reply, as Frank saw some boys coming towards them, and, jumping down from the fence, he ran off to snatch a cap which the wind had blown away from little Willie Wilson, the widow's son.

"Rather discouraging," thought Eddie, "but mother tells me not to be weary in well-doing, so I'll try again to-morrow;" and he did try to-morrow and to-morrow, and day after day. Now he would bring him an apple, and then an orange, and so bent upon his work of love was he that he did not notice Frank's harsh words. One Wednesday afternoon he asked Frank to come and see him. "He was going away to another school, and should not see him again, and he wanted to show him his playthings," so Frank was induced to go.

A fine time the boys had, I assure you, in the barn, down in the meadow, in the orchard, and finally they sat down in a little arbor, where Eddie had often read to his mother as she sewed, Frank seemed sad. He knew he was losing one of his best friends when Eddie went away, and his conscience told him he had not showed his gratitude as he ought. As he rose to go he leaned over to Eddie, and whispered, "I am sorry, Eddie, that I teased you so, and have so often made you unhappy, and I want to tell you before you go away that I do feel grateful for your kindness, and I do mean to be a better boy."

How Eddie's heart thrilled, and how the tears filled his eyes as he said "good-by," and how he ran to his mamma that she might rejoice with him, I have not time to tell you.

But this was not all of Eddie's harvest. Years after he was gladdened by a letter from this same selfish boy,—a letter of gratitude, in which he says, "You were the first to encourage me to think I might overcome my evil nature, the first to lead me out of myself, to make any sacrifices for the good of others; and any thing of happiness I have known in thus living, any good I may have done in the cause of my Master, I owe, under God, to your example, your love, your kindness, when we were boys at school."

It is a solemn thought, dear children, that we are all casting bread upon the waters every day. When you said an unkind word to that sensitive little girl, who, perhaps, was not so well dressed as yourself, you dropped a crumb,—a very small seed, but your harvest may be, in her heart, a spirit of bitterness, which shall follow through life every remembrance of your name; and to yourself the harvest may be a total disregard of the happiness of others, which shall make you, unless restrained by the grace of God, a supremely unhappy, because a supremely selfish, being.

Be careful, then, what kind of "bread" you "cast upon the waters," for you shall find it, the same kind, "after many days."—Selected by S. C.

A LITTLE GRAVE.

A little grave where daisies grow;
A little baby lying low;
That is all the world may know.
But our hearts
Hold a baby sweet and fair,
A little child with sunny hair,
Child of tenderest love and care—
Jose, Jose!

In the sweet spring of her day,
We gave her to the lonely clay,
From our tear-dimmed eyes away,
How we loved her none can tell;
They who have loved like us, as well,
Loved and lost, alone may tell—
Jose, Jose!

Wistful shadows in her eyes,
Like the dreamy haze that lies
Trembling in the summer skies,
And the burden of a fear,
All unspoken, yet so near,
Fell on us this weary year—
Jose, Jose!

Shrinking from the children's glee,
Keeping close to mother's knee,
Or in arms that tenderly
Watched her fading, faded she—
Faded she our blossom fair,
Our little child with sunny hair,
Child of tenderest love and care—
Jose, Jose!

Swift the seasons come and go;
Thickly falls the drifting snow
O'er a little grave we know;
But soon her feet
Will pass in at a pearly door,
And tread the shining golden floor
Fair and fadeless evermore
When Jesus comes.

CONVERSION OF THE PRESIDENT.—The following statement is made by Rev. J. E. Carey of Freeport, Ill. A gentleman, having recently visited Washington on busines with the President, was, on leaving home, requested by a friend to ask Mr. Lincoln whether he loved Jesus. The business being completed, the question was kindly asked. The president buried his face in his handkerchief, turned away and wept. He then turned and said, 'When I left home to take this chair of state I requested my countrymen to pray for me; I was not then a Christian. When my son died, the severest trial of my life, I was not a Christian. But when I went to Gettysburg, and looked upon the graves of our dead heroes, who had fallen in defense of their country, I then and there consecrated myself to Christ. I do love Jesus."

THE IMPORT OF DANIEL XII. 2.

In my late discussion with Br. Grant, in Boston, I availed myself of an early opportunity to introduce the above passage, for the purpose of showing, 1st, that a fair interpretation of it would not give support to the doctrine of the Negative, and, 2dly, that the sleep of the wicked dead will remain unbroken forever. These two points I think were amply sustained. Certain it is that I never, previously to the debate, appreciated as fully as I now do the completeness of the argument by which we are able to take the text out of the hands of our opponents, and then make it bear with crushing weight against their view of the revival of the ungodly. The subject is so important, and so deeply interesting, that no apology is needed for giving it considerable space in the present number.

Br. Grant's account of this part of our work is given in the Crisis. He says :—

"Dan. xii. 2 was quite critically examined, but was found to teach very clearly that two classes will awake; "some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." It was claimed by the affirmative that the verb "awake" was applicable only to the righteous. We consulted Mr. Noot, a Jew, who is familiar with the Hebrew language, and asked him what verb understood was associated with the words "some" and "some" in Dan. xii. 2? He said the verb "awake." And then added, that the word not must be used to qualify the second "awake." We inquired if the Hebrew word loh, for "not," was in the original? He said it was not. Then why use it? we inquired. His answer was in substance as follows:—The notoriously wicked will never rise; but the souls of those who have not been very wicked will pass through purgatorial fires for some length of time, and when they have been sufficiently purified, then they will be fitted for a resurrection; but these could not then come forth "to shame and everlasting contempt." For this reason, the passage must mean that the second class shall not awake to shame and contempt; because the Lord would not purify their souls in purgatorial fires, and then bring them up "to shame." We asked him if his view was the same as that held by the ancient Pharisees? He said it was; and then referred to learned Jewish commentators to prove his position. We thought best to take heed to the Saviour's caution, and "beware of the leaven of . . . . the doctrine of the Pharisees." Matt. xvi. 6–12. They believed in the resurrection "of the just and unjust," but not of the notoriously wicked. The information gathered from the Jew helped us to understand Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15, better than ever before. This we will notice in due time.

"After consulting this Pharisee, we then went to Mr. Salom, a converted Jew in Boston, who is said to be as good a Hebrew scholar as there is in New England, and asked him if in Dan. xii. 2, the original required that both casses mentioned should awake? He said there was no room for doubt that both classes would awake." [Here follows what is given, in my letter to Prof. Vail, as "Prof. Hudson's latest statement concerning the passage."]

On which I remark: 1. It was I who first consulted Dr. Noot and brought his testimony into the discussion. 2. Br. G. omits to inform his readers, except by implication, that the Rabbi declares that the Hebrew for the rendering "many of" in the common version, is partitive and cannot embrace all the sleepers. He knows this to be Dr. N.'s position, and I think him not justified in concealing the fact from the Crisis readers. 3. Br. G. confesses that he received information from the Rabbi which helped him "to understand Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15, better than ever before." I want our readers to bear this admission in mind; its full value, as a fatal concession, I shall exhibit in another article. 4. Br. G. omits to tell his readers, as he also omitted to inform our audience at Kast Hall, whether "Mr. Salom" believes that "many of" the sleepers means all who sleep. I presume he carefully avoided eliciting any light on that point from the "converted Jew." It may yet fall in my way to see "Mr. Salom" and learn his mind on it. When I do so I will report the result.

Br. G.'s report continues :—

"We then called on Dr. Noyes, Professor of Hebrew at Harvard College, and he expressed himself as follows:—'The verb awake is applicable to both pronouns, and the passage teaches beyond all doubt that both classes mentioned will awake.' George R. Noyes."

Here again a fact is suppressed which many an honest reader of the Crisis would be interested to know, and which Br. G. does know. Dr. Noyes unhesitatingly affirms that the awaking of only a portion of the sleepers is brought to view in our passage. "Many of," he says, cannot mean all. Br. G. refrained from interrogating him on this point, and so made it necessary for me to call on the Dr., which I did. It is also worthy of mention that Prof. Noyes regards an awaking "to shame and everlasting contempt" as incompatible with the final annihilation of those who thus awake.

Br. G.'s account proceeds :

"We next consulted Prof. S. M. Vail, a noted linguist, and Professor of Hebrew in the Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H., and obtained the following:—

"Dan. xii. 2 reads as follows,—verbatim in English:—'And many from the sleepers of the ground —dust—shall awake,—these to life everlasting,— those to shame and everlasting contempt.'

Rav, [the word rendered 'many'] corresponds with the Greek hoi polloi,—the whole—the many. These and those are distributives and demonstratives in apposition with 'the many.' Of course the verb 'they shall awake' is also the predicate verb of these and those. The Hebrew clearly teaches that the wicked will arise, as well as the righteous. The passage is therefore parallel with the words of Paul, 'There shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust.' . . . . The passage teaches precisely that the wicked will be raised equally with the just. There can be no doubt that the verb awake is common to both of the words 'these' and 'those,' or both of the words 'some' as the English version renders. Yours very truly,

STEPHEN M. VAIL.

"P. S. The preposition min, from, corresponds in this connection with our English 'of the.' 'The many of the' [or 'from the'] sleepers,—the many who sleep,—or in other words, the multitude of the dead shall arise, being of two classes; one class being endowed with everlasting life—happiness—the other class, on account of their sins, fallen into shame and everlasting contempt."—S. M. V.

On the appearance, in the Crisis, of the foregoing letter from Prof Vail (which, being received too late, could not be introduced by Br. G. in the debate), the following letter was written and mailed to that gentleman. It will speak for itself. No reply had come to hand when I left home on the 17th inst.; should any be received, our readers will be advised of the fact.

LETTER TO PROFESSOR VAIL.

Salem, Mass., April 7, 1865.

DEAR SIR :—I have recently held a public oral debate of eight evenings, in Boston, with Elder Miles Grant, Editor of The World's Crisis. During the progress of our discussion, we had occasion to enter somewhat minutely into a consideration of the import of Daniel xii. 2—a passage of Scripture which is differently understood by Eld. G. and myself. Both of us being unacquainted with the Hebrew language, we naturally availed ourselves of such critical aid from learned men as was within our reach. A portion of this assistance was ready to our hand in print; for the rest, we mutually sought information from Professor George R. Noyes, of Harvard College, and Simon C. Noot, D. D., a Jewish Rabbi of Boston (who, by the way, gives instruction in Hebrew to the President of Harvard, Dr. Hill), while, in addition to these, Eld. G. appealed to a Mr. Salom, of Boston, Prof. Hudson, and yourself. With helps so numerous, some light certainly should be shed on the passage in controversy. And yet, such is the character of the response rendered by yourself to Eld. G.'s inquiries, and such the weight your opinion is made to carry by the publicity given to your letter, that I should not feel that I had done my duty in the matter, did I not endeavor to show cause why you should modify the judgment you have expressed, and thereby counteract the influence which an erroneous interpretation is likely to derive from the sanction of one so justly celebrated as you have become for his knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. Should what follows fail to change your mind on the points involved, then the further object of this letter is to request the favor that you will briefly indicate wherein you deem me at fault in the reasoning by which I persuade myself of the correctness of the interpretation which your letter to Eld. Grant opposes.

"Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." Eld. G. finds here a universal awaking of the sleepers; the righteous he believes will awake "to everlasting life," while he holds that the wicked will awake "to shame and everlasting contempt." My own view of the passage is, that it announces the awaking of a portion only of "them that sleep;" and that the "everlasting life" pertains to the whole number of awakened ones, while the "shame and everlasting contempt" relate to those who remain asleep.

Deeming it quite possible that some things have been written on the passage in question which may not have met your eye, or to which at least you may not at present have access, I will give you what I have collected in my note-book. Prof. Hudson, in "Debt and Grace," p. 186, says :—

"It is thought by good critics that the prophet here speaks only of the resurrection of the righteous, called the 'first resurrection' in Rev. xx. 5; and that the passage should read: these [who awake] to everlasting life, and those [who do not awake] to shame and everlasting contempt.' This would agree with the Syriac version: 'some to death, and the eternal contempt of their companions.'" Prof. H. further says: "the word 'shame' can not refer to the feelings of the lost. The Hebrew (d'rah-ohn) is used only here and in Isa. lxvi. 24 (Eng. 'an abhorring'), where, says Dr. Wintle, it denotes 'a kind of spectacle, show, or nausea,' and is translated 'nausea' by Buxtorf in his concordance."

Prof. Whiting (whose translation of the N. T. you may have seen) renders our passage thus: "And many from the sleepers of the dust of the ground shall awake, these to everlasting life, and those to reproaches and everlasting abhorrence;" and "those" he maintains are such as do not awake. Prof. W. says: "There is an obscurity in this passage, produced by an improper rendering of the Hebrew word 'ailleh—weailleh.' They are translated in this instance, 'some—and some.' Now, the phrase, composed of the pronoun ailleh, with the conjunction waw (and) joined to ailleh, is the proper expression for these and those."

Prof. Bush renders it "these, and those," and says: "The 'awaking' is evidently predicated of the 'many,' and not of the whole. It will be observed that the phrase is not 'many' in the absolute sense, which might perhaps be understood of all, but 'many of,' which plainly conveys the idea of restriction, distinguishing a part from the whole. * * * The 'awaking' is affirmed of the 'many,' and not of the whole."

Dr. Hody (Treat. of Resurrect. of the Body, p. 230) says: "I must fully acknowledge that the word many makes this text extremely difficult. I know what expositors say, but I am not satisfied with any thing that I have hitherto met with. Some tell us that many is sometimes used in the Scriptures to signify all, but this does not clear the difficulty; for there is a great difference between many and many of. All they that sleep in the dust are many; but many of them that sleep in the dust cannot be said to be all that sleep in the dust. Many of does plainly except some." "This," adds Prof. Bush, "we must regard as conclusive."

Dr. A. M. Osbon, of the M. E. Church, in his work entitled "Daniel Verified in History and Chronology," pp. 185–6, says:—"Let us recur for a moment to the structure of the passage. This can be best shown by paraphrasing the verse. 'Many OF them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some [the many who awake shall awake] to everlasting life, and some [those who do not awake shall sleep in] shame and everlasting contempt." The 'of' is a particle of severalty, and divides the 'many' who should awake from the 'some' who should sleep in shame and contempt. Only the 'many' who shall be found 'written in the book' shall awake." Dr. Osbon finds not a literal but a national resurrection in the passage, and, in reference to the notion that many may mean all, adds: "It will not help the case at all to quote Romans v. 19, for the passage is not a parallel. The 'many' of the apostle is a very different thing from the 'many' of the prophet. The former uses the word to denote all the persons of whom he is speaking, 'many were made sinners;' the latter to designate a portion of a larger number, 'many of them that sleep in the dust.' It is perfectly apparent, then, that the particle of severalty fixes the antithesis between the states of those who awake, and those who do not awake, and not between the states of those who awake."

Prof. Hudson's latest statement concerning the passage is the following:—"Standing alone it will bear, I think, two renderings: 1. That of the received translation, which says that 'some' of 'many' who awake—whether the many are all mankind or not—are consigned to 'shame,' etc., after awaking. 2. That instead of 'some,' we would read 'these' and 'those,' dividing the sleepers into two classes, the just and the unjust, leaving the latter to the doom that is named, whenever and however consummated."

I have spoken of Rabbi Noot (Drs. Hill and Peabody, of Harvard College, commend in the highest terms his attainments in Hebrew.) He is very emphatic in declaring that "many OF (or from) them that sleep" cannot mean all the sleepers, and refers the "shame and everlasting contempt" to the class remaining unawakened.

Prof. Noyes renders the passage "these" and "those" instead of "some" and "some." In reference to the expression "many OF (or FROM)," he asserts, with no less confidence than Dr. Noot, that it is restrictive and cannot mean all the sleepers. It is his opinion, however, that the awakened ones must be considered as divided into two classes—everlasting life being the portion of one of them, shame and contempt that of the other. This interpretation he does not base on anything in the Hebrew that is not found in the English translation; and he admits that the mere English scholar can judge as well as the Hebraist on that point.

In its proper place above I should have given Prof. Bush's paraphrase of Dan. xii. 2, which is as follows: "And many of sleepers of the dust shall awake; these (the awakened) (shall be) to everlasting life; and those (the unawakened) (shall be) to shame and everlasting contempt."

In the citations which I have now given, are contained reasons which, in my judgment, forbid the attempt to find a universal awaking in Dan. xii. 2, and fairly require that the "shame" and "contempt" of the passage shall be referred to those who remain asleep. Submitting the extracts and opinions for your consideration, I come now to speak of your own view as given in your letter to Eld. Grant.

You render the passage "verbatim in English" thus: "And many from the sleepers of the ground—dust—shall awake,—these to life everlasting,—those to shame and everlasting contempt." You remark that "Rav, [the word rendered 'many'] corresponds with the Greek hoi polloi,—the whole—the many." In this statement you make no account of the "OF" which our passage contains. This omission appears to me very important, and I shall presently make it the occasion for asking you a question. Your reference to the Greek "hoi polloi" seems to me to assert a resemblance where there is an obvious difference. In our passage the word "rav" is not preceded by the article, whereas in "hoi polloi" it is, "the many." Upon this point, also, I shall have a question to propose. And right here, perhaps, is the proper place to submit my interrogatories touching that portion of our passage which must settle the question whether those that awake are a portion of the sleepers merely, or the whole number. They are as follow:—

1. Does the word "many" in Dan. xii. 2 grammatically mean the same that it would mean if the Hebrew original contained the article, so that it would read "the many"?

2. By what right do you, in paraphrasing our passage, supply the article, and thus read it "the many of the [or 'from the'] sleepers," etc.?

3. In your assumption that "rav" is equivalent to the Greek "hoi polloi," do you properly regard the fact that the latter expression has the article while the former has not?

4. In asserting this equivalence of import do you not make no account of the "OF" which, in Dan. xii. 2, is part of the expression that determines who shall awake?

5. Can the English phrase, "many FROM [or OF] the sleepers of the ground," properly be understood to mean all the sleepers?

6. Is not "many" the only proper translation of "rav" in Dan. xii. 2? I ask this because you use the word "multitude" in your paraphrase of the text.

7. Do you remain unchanged in the belief that the awaking of all the sleepers is taught in Dan. xii. 2?

Thus much concerning the first part of the passage. Now as to "these" and "those." It is your position that the verb "shall awake" is to be understood to each of the two latter clauses of our passage. This view of the matter seems to me to involve a solecism of a very marked character; for which reason I must be further enlightened before I can accept it. The meaning of the passage as understood by you would be expressed in the following paraphrase:—"All the sleepers of the ground shall awake; these shall awake to everlasting life, those shall awake to shame and everlasting contempt." The solecism I speak of is seen in this: according to the idiom of our language, the demonstrative pronouns "these" and "those," in the paraphrase, require that, in what precedes them, there should some recognition of two classes of individuals—which there is not. This I deem a fatal objection to regarding "many from the sleepers" as unrestrictive in its import. And I regard it as equally valid against the interpretation of Dr. Noyes, viz., that, while a portion of the sleepers remain unawakened, the pronouns in question represent two classes among those who do awake.

The interpretation of the passage which I accept (and which is certainly supported by high authority), encounters no difficulty of the kind above named. For, the moment we admit that "many OF" refers to only a portion of the sleepers, there is at once a well-defined mental recognition of the clearly implied fact that another portion of them remain asleep. Here, then, we have two classes—those who awake and those who remain asleep; and to these classes, respectively, must the pronouns "these" and "those" relate. If I am correct so far, it seems to me evident that the implied verb (shall remain asleep) belongs as properly to the pronoun "those," as the expressed verb ("shall awake") does to the fact which is directly stated. In your letter to Eld. G. you say: "These and those are distributives and demonstratives in apposition with 'the many.'" I have already questioned your right to say "the many," since the article is not in the passage; but I now make the further suggestion that—contrary to your opinion—"these" and "those" are in apposition with those who awake and those who remain asleep.

In the Hebrew of Dan. xii. 3 the reading (as I am informed) is, "they that turn THE many to righteousness," etc. Here, then, is an expression that you might, with better reason than any that verse 2 furnishes, regard as having a "hoi polloi" meaning, for here the article occurs, while the restrictive preposition does not; and yet, it is certain that you will not find the wicked in the phrase. But if they are left out of the phrase which you will admit to be more like "hoi polloi" than the one occurring in the 2d verse, why shall it be insisted that they are included in the "rav" of verse 2? To my mind, the necessity for this seems to be rather theological than philological or grammatical. Prof. Noyes could not, while I was with him, satisfy himself as to the reason for the article being in the 3d verse. Permit me to suggest that it may be designed to carry us back to the class designated by "rav" in verse 2. Should this conjecture be well founded, it would destroy the hypothesis that the "rav" of the 2d verse includes the wicked dead.

I have already propounded seven questions. Continuing the series, I now beg leave to inquire—

8. Wherein do I err (if at all) in supposing that a "solecism" is involved in the interpretation that affirms a universal awaking of the sleepers mentioned in Dan. xii. 2?

9. If you were obliged to admit a restricted awaking, would you then connect the shame and contempt with the unawakened class? or would you still divide the awakened portion into two classes, which should stand for the "these" and "those" of your translation?

10. (I especially desire an answer to this question.) Can the idea, that the wicked awake "to shame and everlasting contempt," in any way be made to tally with Eld. Grant's notion that the wicked, almost immediately after they shall have been raised from the dead, will have their conscious existence extinguished? (You are perhaps aware that he holds to the annihilation of the wicked.)

11. Do you attach any importance to my remarks on the occurrence of the article before "rav" in Dan. xii. 3?

As I retain a perfect copy of this letter, you need not, in your reply (should you favor me with one), repeat the questions in order that your responses may be understood. You need only number your responses to correspond to the questions, and all will be plain to me.

If you will favor me with a reply to my eleven inquiries, and to such other portions of my long letter as you may care to notice, and give me permission to make your letter public should I desire to do so,—your kindness will have placed me under obligations which I shall not willingly forget. And I would very much like to hear from you within a few days, as I contemplate leaving home.

Yours in the Gospel of Christ,

RUFUS WENDELL.

"THY KINGDOM COME."

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

The first petition in the Lord's prayer should be understood by every disciple of Christ Jesus, but it is not. Not one in a thousand of the myriads who utter it—and we include the priesthood or clergy of all the sects—can give a fair approximation to its true import. And why? For the simple reason that the Bible is subjected to a method of interpretation which, if applied to other books, would convert the whole realm of literature into a barren desert. We refer to the common custom of changing the sense of Bible language at will and without authority. It is a self-evident law of interpretation that every word should have its most obvious literal sense, unless there are substantial grounds for qualification. The truth can be obtained from a book in no other way, and the violence done to this law brings a just penalty on the offenders, even blindness of mind and ultimate paralysis of the capacity to receive the truth in any way. If the Scriptures are to be searched and believed, and if the truth is to be obtained in no other direction, why should we hesitate to lay aside all our preconceptions and prejudices and hear what God says? If we read the word "life," why not receive it, and believe? Why give it another and foreign definition? If we read the word "death," why object to its literal import? And so of every other word—and therefore of "kingdom."

The apparent etymology of "kingdom" gives its definition. King–dom, the dominion of a king. The acknowledged law of interpretation will not allow us to assign any other meaning to the word, unless we can give a good reason therefor. We are bound to make an application of the literal meaning; and if we find that it is allowed by the Scriptures of truth, that it agrees with the teachings of the word in general, no one will be at liberty to disregard the inevitable conclusions that follow. They must be admitted, or else cause must be shown to the contrary. It will not do to build up an independent theory, and content ourselves with admiring and defending it without reference to the plain word of God. The literal argument must always have the preference, unless it is proven to be untenable. Jesus taught his disciples to pray "Thy kingdom come"—what did he mean, what did his disciples understand him to mean, what are we to believe in the matter? It is our duty before God and one another to answer this question. We propose to make a literal application of the petition as the first step in the inquiry, and in taking this step we shall discover that we have traversed the whole ground, that the first step is the last, the only one, that there is no room for another without plunging into an abyss of darkness—the blackness of darkness where ignorance sways an undisputed sceptre, where truth and knowledge are unknown.

A complete kingdom cannot exist without at least three constituents—a king or governing power, subjects, or a class to be governed, and a territory. But the term "kingdom" may be properly applied to either one of these divisions without doing violence to the literal interpretation of the word. The connection must decide whether it refers to a complete kingdom, or to some division of the kingdom —to the government, to the subjects, or to the territory. One instance of each divisional use will suffice as evidence. Kingdom means government in Ps. ciii. 19. "The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom ruleth over all." Kingdom refers to subjects in Dan. iv. 17. "That the living may know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men." Kingdom refers to territory in Matt. xiii. 41. "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity." But in most instances the term kingdom must be taken in its complete sense, as including all the constituents named. Having set forth the proper and necessary definitions, we now proceed to inquire, What kingdom is to come?

It can not be the essential dominion of God, for that has always existed. "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty: for all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine; thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all." 1 Chron. xxix. 11. The great kingdom of the universe cannot come—it is. The question still remains— What kingdom did Jesus mean? As he did not explain this, but left his disciples to draw their own conclusions, we may inquire whether they had any ideas of a kingdom to come. Did they believe that God had a coming kingdom as well as a present one? If they did hold this belief, where did they get it? Where, except in the Old Covenant writings? Where, but in the Scriptures—the law and the prophets? And if we go to the same source, shall we not learn? Let us then go back to the fundamental teachings of the Bible. Let us find the foundations.

A careful reading of 1 Chron. xvii. will open a straight and speedy path to the stand-point occupied by our Lord and his disciples. It appears that David conceived the project of building a house for the ark of the covenant of the Lord. But the Lord said to Nathan the prophet—"Go and tell David my servant, Thus saith the Lord, Thou shalt not build me an house to dwell in; for I have not dwelt in an house since the day that I brought up Israel unto this day, but have gone from tent to tent, and from one tabernacle to another. Wheresoever I have walked with all Israel, spake I to any of the judges of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people, saying, Why have ye not built me an house of cedars? Now therefore thus shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I took thee from the sheepcote, even from following the sheep, that thou shouldest be ruler over my people Israel; and I have been with thee whithersoever thou hast walked, and cut off all thine enemies from before thee, and have made thee a name like the name of the great men that are in the earth. Also I will ordain a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, and they shall dwell in their place, and shall be moved no more: neither shall the children of wickedness waste them any more, as at the beginning, and since the time that I commended judges to be over my people Israel. Moreover, I will subdue all thine enemies. Furthermore I tell thee, that the Lord will build thee an house. And it shall come to pass, when thy days be expired that thou must go to be with thy fathers, that I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne for ever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son; and I will not take my mercy away from him, as I took it from him that was before thee; but I will settle him in mine house and in my kingdom for ever; and his throne shall be established for evermore."

Two things are to be noticed in YAHVEH'S announcement to David: first Israel are eventually to be planted in their own place to move no more; and secondly, the throne of David will exist for evermore. It is thus certain that Israel in the flesh, once banished from their land, will at some future time be restored to it, and that an heir to the throne of David will reign over them again as their legitimate sovereign. God has made a solemn promise to David in this matter, and hence the kingdom to come in a very just sense is God's kingdom. And he thus calls it in verse 14. just quoted. The kingdom of Israel as first constituted was his kingdom. Samuel said to Saul, "Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?" 1 Sam. x. 1. And when Saul had proved himself unfaithful, "the Lord said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? Fill thine horn with oil, and go; I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons." 1 Sam. xviii. And David, at his abdication, said, "Howbeit the Lord God of Israel chose me before all the house of my father to be king over Israel for ever: for he hath chosen Judah to be the ruler; and of the house of Judah, the house of my father; and among the sons of my father he liked me to make me king over all Israel; and of all my sons (for the Lord hath given me many sons) he hath chosen Solomon my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel." 1 Chron. xxviii. 4, 5. The record of Solomon's accession is this: "Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king instead of

THE IMPORT OF DANIEL XII. 2.

In my late discussion with Br. Grant, in Boston, I availed myself of an early opportunity to introduce the above passage, for the purpose of showing, 1st, that a fair interpretation of it would not give support to the doctrine of the Negative, and, 2dly, that the sleep of the wicked dead will remain unbroken forever. These two points I think were amply sustained. Certain it is that I never, previously to the debate, appreciated as fully as I now do the completeness of the argument by which we are able to take the text out of the hands of our opponents, and then make it bear with crushing weight against their view of the revival of the ungodly. The subject is so important, and so deeply interesting, that no apology is needed for giving it considerable space in the present number.

Br. Grant's account of this part of our work is given in the Crisis. He says :—

"Dan. xii. 2 was quite critically examined, but was found to teach very clearly that two classes will awake; "some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." It was claimed by the affirmative that the verb "awake" was applicable only to the righteous. We consulted Mr. Noot, a Jew, who is familiar with the Hebrew language, and asked him what verb understood was associated with the words "some" and "some" in Dan. xii. 2? He said the verb "awake." And then added, that the word not must be used to qualify the second "awake." We inquired if the Hebrew word loh, for "not," was in the original? He said it was not. Then why use it? we inquired. His answer was in substance as follows:—The notoriously wicked will never rise; but the souls of those who have not been very wicked will pass through purgatorial fires for some length of time, and when they have been sufficiently purified, then they will be fitted for a resurrection; but these could not then come forth "to shame and everlasting contempt." For this reason, the passage must mean that the second class shall not awake to shame and contempt; because the Lord would not purify their souls in purgatorial fires, and then bring them up "to shame." We asked him if his view was the same as that held by the ancient Pharisees? He said it was; and then referred to learned Jewish commentators to prove his position. We thought best to take heed to the Saviour's caution, and "beware of the leaven of . . . . the doctrine of the Pharisees." Matt. xvi. 6–12. They believed in the resurrection "of the just and unjust," but not of the notoriously wicked. The information gathered from the Jew helped us to understand Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15, better than ever before. This we will notice in due time.

"After consulting this Pharisee, we then went to Mr. Salom, a converted Jew in Boston, who is said to be as good a Hebrew scholar as there is in New England, and asked him if in Dan. xii. 2, the original required that both casses mentioned should awake? He said there was no room for doubt that both classes would awake." [Here follows what is given, in my letter to Prof. Vail, as "Prof. Hudson's latest statement concerning the passage."]

On which I remark : 1. It was I who first consulted Dr. Noot and brought his testimony into the discussion. 2. Br. G. omits to inform his readers, except by implication, that the Rabbi declares that the Hebrew for the rendering "many of" in the common version, is partitive and cannot embrace all the sleepers. He knows this to be Dr. N.'s position, and I think him not justified in concealing the fact from the Crisis readers. 3. Br. G. confesses that he received information from the Rabbi which helped him "to understand Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15, better than ever before." I want our readers to bear this admission in mind ; its full value, as a fatal concession, I shall exhibit in another article. 4. Br. G. omits to tell his readers, as he also omitted to inform our audience at Kast Hall, whether "Mr. Salom" believes that "many of" the sleepers means all who sleep. I presume he carefully avoided eliciting any light on that point from the "converted Jew." It may yet fall in my way to see "Mr. Salom" and learn his mind on it. When I do so I will report the result.

Br. G.'s report continues :—

"We then called on Dr. Noyes, Professor of Hebrew at Harvard College, and he expressed himself as follows:—'The verb awake is applicable to both pronouns, and the passage teaches beyond all doubt that both classes mentioned will awake.' George R. Noyes."

Here again a fact is suppressed which many an honest reader of the Crisis would be interested to know, and which Br. G. does know. Dr. Noyes unhesitatingly affirms that the awaking of only a portion of the sleepers is brought to view in our passage. "Many of," he says, cannot mean all. Br. G. refrained from interrogating him on this point, and so made it necessary for me to call on the Dr., which I did. It is also worthy of mention that Prof. Noyes regards an awaking "to shame and everlasting contempt" as incompatible with the final annihilation of those who thus awake.

Br. G.'s account proceeds :

"We next consulted Prof. S. M. Vail, a noted linguist, and Professor of Hebrew in the Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H., and obtained the following:—

"Dan. xii. 2 reads as follows,—verbatim in English :—'And many from the sleepers of the ground —dust—shall awake,—these to life everlasting,—those to shame and everlasting contempt.'

Rav, [the word rendered 'many'] corresponds with the Greek hoi polloi,—the whole—the many. These and those are distributives and demonstratives in apposition with 'the many.' Of course the verb 'they shall awake' is also the predicate verb of these and those. The Hebrew clearly teaches that the wicked will arise, as well as the righteous. The passage is therefore parallel with the words of Paul, 'There shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust.' . . . . The passage teaches precisely that the wicked will be raised equally with the just. There can be no doubt that the verb awake is common to both of the words 'these' and 'those,' or both of the words 'some' as the English version renders. Yours very truly,

STEPHEN M. VAIL.

"P. S. The preposition min, from, corresponds in this connection with our English 'of the.' 'The many of the' [or 'from the'] sleepers,—the many who sleep,—or in other words, the multitude of the dead shall arise, being of two classes ; one class being endowed with everlasting life—happiness—the other class, on account of their sins, fallen into shame and everlasting contempt."—S. M. V.

On the appearance, in the Crisis, of the foregoing letter from Prof Vail (which, being received too late, could not be introduced by Br. G. in the debate), the following letter was written and mailed to that gentleman. It will speak for itself. No reply had come to hand when I left home on the 17th inst.; should any be received, our readers will be advised of the fact.

LETTER TO PROFESSOR VAIL.

Salem, Mass., April 7, 1865.

DEAR SIR :—I have recently held a public oral debate of eight evenings, in Boston, with Elder Miles Grant, Editor of The World's Crisis. During the progress of our discussion, we had occasion to enter somewhat minutely into a consideration of the import of Daniel xii. 2—a passage of Scripture which is differently understood by Eld. G. and myself. Both of us being unacquainted with the Hebrew language, we naturally availed ourselves of such critical aid from learned men as was within our reach. A portion of this assistance was ready to our hand in print ; for the rest, we mutually sought information from Professor George R. Noyes, of Harvard College, and Simon C. Noot, D. D., a Jewish Rabbi of Boston (who, by the way, gives instruction in Hebrew to the President of Harvard, Dr. Hill), while, in addition to these, Eld. G. appealed to a Mr. Salom, of Boston, Prof. Hudson, and yourself. With helps so numerous, some light certainly should be shed on the passage in controversy. And yet, such is the character of the response rendered by yourself to Eld. G.'s inquiries, and such the weight your opinion is made to carry by the publicity given to your letter, that I should not feel that I had done my duty in the matter, did I not endeavor to show cause why you should modify the judgment you have expressed, and thereby counteract the influence which an erroneous interpretation is likely to derive from the sanction of one so justly celebrated as you have become for his knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. Should what follows fail to change your mind on the points involved, then the further object of this letter is to request the favor that you will briefly indicate wherein you deem me at fault in the reasoning by which I persuade myself of the correctness of the interpretation which your letter to Eld. Grant opposes.

"Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." Eld. G. finds here a universal awaking of the sleepers ; the righteous he believes will awake "to everlasting life," while he holds that the wicked will awake "to shame and everlasting contempt." My own view of the passage is, that it announces the awaking of a portion only of "them that sleep ;" and that the "everlasting life" pertains to the whole number of awakened ones, while the "shame and everlasting contempt" relate to those who remain asleep.

Deeming it quite possible that some things have been written on the passage in question which may not have met your eye, or to which at least you may not at present have access, I will give you what I have collected in my note-book. Prof. Hudson, in "Debt and Grace," p. 186, says :—

"It is thought by good critics that the prophet here speaks only of the resurrection of the righteous, called the 'first resurrection' in Rev. xx. 5 ; and that the passage should read : these [who awake] to everlasting life, and those [who do not awake] to shame and everlasting contempt.' This would agree with the Syriac version : 'some to death, and the eternal contempt of their companions.'" Prof. H. further says : "the word 'shame' can not refer to the feelings of the lost. The Hebrew (d'rah-ohn) is used only here and in Isa. lxvi. 24 (Eng. 'an abhorring'), where, says Dr. Wintle, it denotes 'a kind of spectacle, show, or nausea,' and is translated 'nausea' by Buxtorf in his concordance."

Prof. Whiting (whose translation of the N. T. you may have seen) renders our passage thus : "And many from the sleepers of the dust of the ground shall awake, these to everlasting life, and those to reproaches and everlasting abhorrence ;" and "those" he maintains are such as do not awake. Prof. W. says : "There is an obscurity in this passage, produced by an improper rendering of the Hebrew word 'ailleh—weailleh.' They are translated in this instance, 'some—and some.' Now, the phrase, composed of the pronoun ailleh, with the conjunction waw (and) joined to ailleh, is the proper expression for these and those."

Prof. Bush renders it "these, and those," and says : "The 'awaking' is evidently predicated of the 'many,' and not of the whole. It will be observed that the phrase is not 'many' in the absolute sense, which might perhaps be understood of all, but 'many of,' which plainly conveys the idea of restriction, distinguishing a part from the whole. * * * The 'awaking' is affirmed of the 'many,' and not of the whole."

Dr. Hody (Treat. of Resurrect. of the Body, p. 230) says : "I must fully acknowledge that the word many makes this text extremely difficult. I know what expositors say, but I am not satisfied with any thing that I have hitherto met with. Some tell us that many is sometimes used in the Scriptures to signify all, but this does not clear the difficulty ; for there is a great difference between many and many of. All they that sleep in the dust are many ; but many of them that sleep in the dust cannot be said to be all that sleep in the dust. Many of does plainly except some." "This," adds Prof. Bush, "we must regard as conclusive."

Dr. A. M. Osbon, of the M. E. Church, in his work entitled "Daniel Verified in History and Chronology," pp. 185–6, says :—"Let us recur for a moment to the structure of the passage. This can be best shown by paraphrasing the verse. 'Many OF them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some [the many who awake shall awake] to everlasting life, and some [those who do not awake shall sleep in] shame and everlasting contempt.' The 'OF' is a particle of severalty, and divides the 'many' who should awake from the 'some' who should sleep in shame and contempt. Only the 'many' who shall be found 'written in the book' shall awake." Dr. Osbon finds not a literal but a national resurrection in the passage, and, in reference to the notion that many may mean all, adds : "It will not help the case at all to quote Romans v. 19, for the passage is not a parallel. The 'many' of the apostle is a very different thing from the 'many' of the prophet. The former uses the word to denote all the persons of whom he is speaking, 'many were made sinners ;' the latter to designate a portion of a larger number, 'many of them that sleep in the dust.' It is perfectly apparent, then, that the particle of severalty fixes the antithesis between the states of those who awake, and those who do not awake, and not between the states of those who awake."

Prof. Hudson's latest statement concerning the passage is the following :—"Standing alone it will bear, I think, two renderings : 1. That of the received translation, which says that 'some' of 'many' who awake—whether the many are all mankind or not—are consigned to 'shame,' etc., after awaking. 2. That instead of 'some,' we would read 'these' and 'those,' dividing the sleepers into two classes, the just and the unjust, leaving the latter to the doom that is named, whenever and however consummated."

I have spoken of Rabbi Noot (Drs. Hill and Peabody, of Harvard College, commend in the highest terms his attainments in Hebrew.) He is very emphatic in declaring that "many OF (or from) them that sleep" cannot mean all the sleepers, and refers the "shame and everlasting contempt" to the class remaining unawakened.

Prof. Noyes renders the passage "these" and "those" instead of "some" and "some." In reference to the expression "many OF (or FROM)," he asserts, with no less confidence than Dr. Noot, that it is restrictive and cannot mean all the sleepers. It is his opinion, however, that the awakened ones must be considered as divided into two classes—everlasting life being the portion of one of them, shame and contempt that of the other. This interpretation he does not base on anything in the Hebrew that is not found in the English translation ; and he admits that the mere English scholar can judge as well as the Hebraist on that point.

In its proper place above I should have given Prof. Bush's paraphrase of Dan. xii. 2, which is as follows : "And many of sleepers of the dust shall awake ; these (the awakened) (shall be) to everlasting life ; and those (the unawakened) (shall be) to shame and everlasting contempt."

In the citations which I have now given, are contained reasons which, in my judgment, forbid the attempt to find a universal awaking in Dan. xii. 2, and fairly require that the "shame" and "contempt" of the passage shall be referred to those who remain asleep. Submitting the extracts and opinions for your consideration, I come now to speak of your own view as given in your letter to Eld. Grant.

You render the passage "verbatim in English" thus : "And many from the sleepers of the ground—dust—shall awake,—these to life everlasting,—those to shame and everlasting contempt." You remark that "Rav, [the word rendered 'many'] corresponds with the Greek hoi polloi,—the whole—the many." In this statement you make no account of the "OF" which our passage contains. This omission appears to me very important, and I shall presently make it the occasion for asking you a question. Your reference to the Greek "hoi polloi" seems to me to assert a resemblance where there is an obvious difference. In our passage the word "rav" is not preceded by the article, whereas in "hoi polloi" it is, "the many." Upon this point, also, I shall have a question to propose. And right here, perhaps, is the proper place to submit my interrogatories touching that portion of our passage which must settle the question whether those that awake are a portion of the sleepers merely, or the whole number. They are as follow :—

1. Does the word "many" in Dan. xii. 2 grammatically mean the same that it would mean if the Hebrew original contained the article, so that it would read "the many"?

2. By what right do you, in paraphrasing our passage, supply the article, and thus read it "the many of the [or 'from the'] sleepers," etc.?

3. In your assumption that "rav" is equivalent to the Greek "hoi polloi," do you properly regard the fact that the latter expression has the article while the former has not?

4. In asserting this equivalence of import do you not make no account of the "OF" which, in Dan. xii. 2, is part of the expression that determines who shall awake?

5. Can the English phrase, "many FROM [or OF] the sleepers of the ground," properly be understood to mean all the sleepers?

6. Is not "many" the only proper translation of "rav" in Dan. xii. 2? I ask this because you use the word "multitude" in your paraphrase of the text.

7. Do you remain unchanged in the belief that the awaking of all the sleepers is taught in Dan. xii. 2?

Thus much concerning the first part of the passage. Now as to "these" and "those." It is your position that the verb "shall awake" is to be understood to each of the two latter classes of our passage. This view of the matter seems to me to involve a solecism of a very marked character ; for which reason I must be further enlightened before I can accept it. The meaning of the passage as understood by you would be expressed in the following paraphrase :—"All the sleepers of the ground shall awake ; these shall awake to everlasting life, those shall awake to shame and everlasting contempt." The solecism I speak of is seen in this : according to the idiom of our language, the demonstrative pronouns "these" and "those," in the paraphrase, require that, in what precedes them, there should some recognition of two classes of individuals—which there is not. This I deem a fatal objection to regarding "many from the sleepers" as unrestrictive in its import. And I regard it as equally valid against the interpretation of Dr. Noyes, viz., that, while a portion of the sleepers remain unawakened, the pronouns in question represent two classes among those who do awake.

The interpretation of the passage which I accept (and which is certainly supported by high authority), encounters no difficulty of the kind above named. For, the moment we admit that "many OF" refers to only a portion of the sleepers, there is at once a well-defined mental recognition of the clearly implied fact that another portion of them remain asleep. Here, then, we have two classes—those who awake and those who remain asleep ; and to these classes, respectively, must the pronouns "these" and "those" relate. If I am correct so far, it seems to me evident that the implied verb (shall remain asleep) belongs as properly to the pronoun "those," as the expressed verb ("shall awake") does to the fact which is directly stated. In your letter to Eld. G. you say : "These and those are distributives and demonstratives in apposition with 'the many.'" I have already questioned your right to say "the many," since the article is not in the passage ; but I now make the further suggestion that—contrary to your opinion —"these" and "those" are in apposition with those who awake and those who remain asleep.

In the Hebrew of Dan. xii. 3 the reading (as I am informed) is, "they that turn THE many to righteousness," etc. Here, then, is an expression that you might, with better reason than any that verse 2 furnishes, regard as having a "hoi polloi" meaning, for here the article occurs, while the restrictive preposition does not ; and yet, it is certain that you will not find the wicked in the phrase. But if they are left out of the phrase which you will admit to be more like "hoi polloi" than the one occurring in the 2d verse, why shall it be insisted that they are included in the "rav" of verse 2? To my mind, the necessity for this seems to be rather theological than philological or grammatical. Prof. Noyes could not, while I was with him, satisfy himself as to the reason for the article being in the 3d verse. Permit me to suggest that it may be designed to carry us back to the class designated by "rav" in verse 2. Should this conjecture be well founded, it would destroy the hypothesis that the "rav" of the 2d verse includes the wicked dead.

I have already propounded seven questions. Continuing the series, I now beg leave to inquire—

8. Wherein do I err (if at all) in supposing that a "solecism" is involved in the interpretation that affirms a universal awaking of the sleepers mentioned in Dan. xii. 2?

9. If you were obliged to admit a restricted awaking, would you then connect the shame and contempt with the unawakened class? or would you still divide the awakened portion into two classes, which should stand for the "these" and "those" of your translation?

10. (I especially desire an answer to this question.) Can the idea, that the wicked awake "to shame and everlasting contempt," in any way be made to tally with Eld. Grant's notion that the wicked, almost immediately after they shall have been raised from the dead, will have their conscious existence extinguished? (You are perhaps aware that he holds to the annihilation of the wicked.)

11. Do you attach any importance to my remarks on the occurrence of the article before "rav" in Dan. xii. 3?

As I retain a perfect copy of this letter, you need not, in your reply (should you favor me with one), repeat the questions in order that your responses may be understood. You need only number your responses to correspond to the questions, and all will be plain to me.

If you will favor me with a reply to my eleven inquiries, and to such other portions of my long letter as you may care to notice, and give me permission to make your letter public should I desire to do so,—your kindness will have placed me under obligations which I shall not willingly forget. And I would very much like to hear from you within a few days, as I contemplate leaving home.

Yours in the Gospel of Christ,

RUFUS WENDELL.

"THY KINGDOM COME."

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

The first petition in the Lord's prayer should be understood by every disciple of Christ Jesus, but it is not. Not one in a thousand of the myriads who utter it—and we include the priesthood or clergy of all the sects—can give a fair approximation to its true import. And why? For the simple reason that the Bible is subjected to a method of interpretation which, if applied to other books, would convert the whole realm of literature into a barren desert. We refer to the common custom of changing the sense of Bible language at will and without authority. It is a self-evident law of interpretation that every word should have its most obvious literal sense, unless there are substantial grounds for qualification. The truth can be obtained from a book in no other way, and the violence done to this law brings a just penalty on the offenders, even blindness of mind and ultimate paralysis of the capacity to receive the truth in any way. If the Scriptures are to be searched and believed, and if the truth is to be obtained in no other direction, why should we hesitate to lay aside all our preconceptions and prejudices and hear what God says? If we read the word "life," why not receive it, and believe? Why give it another and foreign definition? If we read the word "death," why object to its literal import? And so of every other word—and therefore of "kingdom."

The apparent etymology of "kingdom" gives its definition. King-dom, the dominion of a king. The acknowledged law of interpretation will not allow us to assign any other meaning to the word, unless we can give a good reason therefor. We are bound to make an application of the literal meaning ; and if we find that it is allowed by the Scriptures of truth, that it agrees with the teachings of the word in general, no one will be at liberty to disregard the inevitable conclusions that follow. They must be admitted, or else cause must be shown to the contrary. It will not do to build up an independent theory, and content ourselves with admiring and defending it without reference to the plain word of God. The literal argument must always have the preference, unless it is proven to be untenable. Jesus taught his disciples to pray "Thy kingdom come"—what did he mean, what did his disciples understand him to mean, what are we to believe in the matter? It is our duty before God and one another to answer this question. We propose to make a literal application of the petition as the first step in the inquiry, and in taking this step we shall discover that we have traversed the whole ground, that the first step is the last, the only one, that there is no room for another without plunging into an abyss of darkness—the blackness of darkness where ignorance sways an undisputed sceptre, where truth and knowledge are unknown.

A complete kingdom cannot exist without at least three constituents—a king or governing power, subjects, or a class to be governed, and a territory. But the term "kingdom" may be properly applied to either one of these divisions without doing violence to the literal interpretation of the word. The connection must decide whether it refers to a complete kingdom, or to some division of the kingdom —to the government, to the subjects, or to the territory. One instance of each divisional use will suffice as evidence. Kingdom means government in Ps. ciii. 19. "The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom ruleth over all." Kingdom refers to subjects in Dan. iv. 17. "That the living may know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men." Kingdom refers to territory in Matt. xiii. 41. "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity." But in most instances the term kingdom must be taken in its complete sense, as including all the constituents named. Having set forth the proper and necessary definitions, we now proceed to inquire, What kingdom is to come?

It can not be the essential dominion of God, for that has always existed. "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty : for all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine ; thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all." 1 Chron. xxix. 11. The great kingdom of the universe cannot come—it is. The question still remains— What kingdom did Jesus mean? As he did not explain this, but left his disciples to draw their own conclusions, we may inquire whether they had any ideas of a kingdom to come. Did they believe that God had a coming kingdom as well as a present one? If they did hold this belief, where did they get it? Where, except in the Old Covenant writings? Where, but in the Scriptures—the law and the prophets? And if we go to the same source, shall we not learn? Let us then go back to the fundamental teachings of the Bible. Let us find the foundations.

A careful reading of 1 Chron. xvii. will open a straight and speedy path to the stand-point occupied by our Lord and his disciples. It appears that David conceived the project of building a house for the ark of the covenant of the Lord. But the Lord said to Nathan the prophet—"Go and tell David my servant, Thus saith the Lord, Thou shalt not build me an house to dwell in; for I have not dwelt in an house since the day that I brought up Israel unto this day, but have gone from tent to tent, and from one tabernacle to another. Wheresoever I have walked with all Israel, spake I to any of the judges of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people, saying, Why have ye not built me an house of cedars? Now therefore thus shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I took thee from the sheepcote, even from following the sheep, that thou shouldest be ruler over my people Israel; and I have been with thee whithersoever thou hast walked, and cut off all thine enemies from before thee, and have made thee a name like the name of the great men that are in the earth. Also I will ordain a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, and they shall dwell in their place, and shall be moved no more: neither shall the children of wickedness waste them any more, as at the beginning, and since the time that I commended judges to be over my people Israel. Moreover, I will subdue all thine enemies. Furthermore I tell thee, that the Lord will build thee an house. And it shall come to pass, when thy days be expired that thou must go to be with thy fathers, that I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne for ever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son; and I will not take my mercy away from him, as I took it from him that was before thee; but I will settle him in mine house and in my kingdom for ever; and his throne shall be established for evermore."

Two things are to be noticed in YAHVEH's announcement to David: first Israel are eventually to be planted in their own place to move no more; and secondly, the throne of David will exist for evermore. It is thus certain that Israel in the flesh, once banished from their land, will at some future time be restored to it, and that an heir to the throne of David will reign over them again as their legitimate sovereign. God has made a solemn promise to David in this matter, and hence the kingdom to come in a very just sense is God's kingdom. And he thus calls it in verse 14. just quoted. The kingdom of Israel as first constituted was his kingdom. Samuel said to Saul, "Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?" 1 Sam. x. 1. And when Saul had proved himself unfaithful, "the Lord said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? Fill thine horn with oil, and go; I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons." 1 Sam. xviii. And David, at his abdication, said, "Howbeit the Lord God of Israel chose me before all the house of my father to be king over Israel for ever: for he hath chosen Judah to be the ruler; and of the house of Judah, the house of my father; and among the sons of my father he liked me to make me king over all Israel; and of all my sons (for the Lord hath given me many sons) he hath chosen Solomon my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel." 1 Chron. xxviii. 4, 5. The record of Solomon's accession is this: "Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king instead of David his father." 1 Chron. xxix. 28. If the kingdom of Israel was thus the Lord's from the outset, how appropriately is its restoration solicited in the words dictated by our Saviour "Thy kingdom come."

That David construed the words of YAHVEH in their most obvious import, and that he believed that they were a pledge of the final permanence of the Israel which he loved under the dominion of his offspring, is shown by his response to the Divine message. "And David the king come and sat before the Lord, and said, Who am I, O Lord God, and what is mine house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?" The soul of David was filled with wonder when he looked back at his chequered life from the humble sheep-cot of Bethlehem to the throne of Israel. Such a course was indeed calculated to inspire him with the highest appreciation of the goodness and the profoundest recognition of the especial providence of God. But how much more marvellous was the future history of his family as portrayed by the unerring foresight and decree of the same Divine Benefactor! How overwhelming were his emotions of gratitude and awe! To bring the shepherd-boy from the mountains of Bethlehem and seat him as king on Mount Zion was a great thing in David's eyes. "And yet this was a small thing in thine eyes, O God; for thou hast spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come, and hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree, O Lord God."

Such blessings were too great for acknowledgment. "What can David speak more to thee for the honor of thy servant? for thou knowest thy servant. O Lord, for thy servant's sake, and according to thine own heart, hast thus done all this greatness, in making known all these great things. O Lord, there is none like thee, neither is there any God beside thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears. And what one nation in the earth is like thy people Israel, whom God went to redeem to be his own people, to make thee a name of greatness and terribleness by driving out nations from before thy people, whom thou hast redeemed out of Egypt? For thy people Israel didst thou make thine own people for ever; and thou, Yahveh, becamest their God."

The thankful monarch can do nothing but accept the promised blessings in the name of his people and in the name of his seed, and pray for the consummation of the Divine purpose. "Therefore now, Lord, let the thing that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, be established for ever,and do as thou hast said." Not with any selfish feeling does he thus pray. Priceless as is the gift to himself, he does not lose sight of God's ultimate object in all His purposes. The throne of David must be established principally because God requires it. "Let it even be established, that thy name may be magnified for ever, saying Yahveh of hosts is the God of Israel, a God to Israel: and let the house of David thy servant be established before thee. For thou, O my God, hast told thy servant that thou wilt build him an house; therefore thy servant hath found in his heart to pray before thee. And now, Lord, thou art God, and hast promised this goodness unto thy servant: now, therefore,let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may be before thee for ever; for thou blessest, O Lord, and it shall be blessed forever."

Thus in this remarkable chapter, and in its counterpart— 2 Sam. vii.—we have the coming kingdom predicted in the most unmistakable language, and the three essential constituents, government, subjects, and territory, are clearly defined. Every other mention of the kingdom in the Holy Scriptures harmonizes with this fundamental promise of God to David. And the prayer of Jesus, which he placed first in order in the form given to his disciples, was anticipated by his great ancestor. David was the first human being that uttered the prayer—Thy kingdom come. The sublime petition of the father, and the simple utterance of the Son refer to the same great event, both will be answered at the same moment, and when the glorious fact opens a new era to the growing creation and Jesus the Christ takes his place a ruler over all the earth, God's kingdom will have come. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

EDWARD BRAWN, Bradley, Me., writes:—I like the Herald of Life very much. I think it the best paper I have ever read. I do not know how I could do without it, as it has been one of the instruments in the hands of God to open the eyes of my mind to the glorious truth of no life out of Christ.

POLLY EASTMAN, Warner, N. H., writes:—I see by the Herald of Life there is another poor widow of a Soldier that wishes the paper, but is unable to pay for it. I inclose $3; two, to pay for her (the widow Vancleave), and $1 to be disposed of as you think best for the spread of truth.

MRS. ELIZABETH APTHROPE, Ronseville, Pa., writes:—You will find $5 inclosed. Send us "Life only in Christ" and "Our Israelitish Origin." We will take two shares in the "Missionary Horse;" the remainder apply as you think best. May the Lord bless and prosper you and our paper. Pray for us, that we may be kept in the faith and have a share in the kingdom when our Lord comes to reign.

SECRET PRAYER.—In public and private duties we may admit of the company of others to join with us; and, if they be such as fear God, the more the better. But in secret duties Christ and thou must whisper it over betwixt yourselves; and then the company of the wife of thy bosom or thy friend that is as thine own soul would not be welcome.—Flavel.

NEW YORK, MAY 3, 1865.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

REPORT of the business transacted by the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION, at the late Conference, April 23.

Owing to the excitement attending the funeral rites of ABRAHAM LINCOLN in this city on Monday and Tuesday, April, 24, 25, the advertised secular days of our Conference, it was decided beforehand not to extend the Conference beyond Sunday, April 23, which arrangement made it necessary to hold a brief business meeting on Sunday. The following is a statement of the business.

The meeting was called to order by the President at 2 P. M.

Resolved, to adjourn the Conference this evening.

The proposed Camp-meeting at Groton Junction, Mass. was abandoned in favor of conference and grove-meetings in new places (especially in the West), to be selected in the future.

Resolved, to raise a fund to spread the truth in the West—to be opened in the Herald of Life as the WESTERN MISSIONARY FUND.

Resolved, that the tent fund, with the consent of the subscribers, be transferred to the Western Missionary fund.

Adjourned. J. T. CURRY, Secretary.

The Assassin's Death.

Before this issue reaches our readers they will have received the particulars of the end of the intellectual brute who murdered our beloved President. In the language of a city journal "he was hunted like a rat and shot like a dog." The bullet of avenging justice passed through his head nearly in the same place that he shot Mr. Lincoln. Unlike the lamented martyr, however,—who was not concious of his fate—Booth suffered inexpressible agony up to the moment of his death, about four hours subsequent to the shot. The special correspondent of the N. Y. Herald says: The post mortem examination was made by Surgeon General Barnes. It was found that the ball had passed just along the base of the brain, without injury to the brain, but by striking the spinal column had occasioned immediate paralysis. The opinion of the surgeons is that his death must have been a horrible one, the brain being active and consciousness complete up to the very moment of dissolution."

It is singular that Booth should die almost at the same minute as his innocent victim, the latter having expired at 7. 22 A. M., the former at 7. 20 A. M. It is remarkable that a Christian was selected to slay the murderer—BOSTON CORBETT, a member of the Protestant Methodist church in this city, and a devoted follower of Jesus. Not in the spirit of revenge, but of justice, acted the human instrument of Divine Retribution. This calls to mind the death of an ancient murderer in a somewhat similar way. "And Benaiah came to the tabernacle of the Lord, and said unto him, Thus saith the king, come forth, and he said, Nay; but I will die here. And Benaiah brought the king word again, saying, Thus said Joab, and thus he answered me. And the king said unto him, Do as he hath said, and fall upon him, and bury him; that thou mayest take away the innocent blood, which Joab shed, from me, and from the house of my father. And the Lord shall return his blood upon his own head, who fell upon two men more righteous and better than he....So Benaiah the son of Jehoiada went up, and fell upon him and slew him." 1 Kings ii. 30–34.

Another noticeable fact is that Junius Brutus Booth, a brother of the murderer, who was arrested in Philadelphia Tuesday, the 25th ult., perhaps on suspicion of complicity with his brother, was observed to copy, after his arrest, some extracts from the Bible, some of which were from the forty-ninth Psalm. Now this Psalm explicitly states the end of Booth and all the wilful enemies of God. We commend these passages to the consideration of such Christians as, not knowing the spirit they are of, breathe out their thoughtless vaporings about future torment. "This their way is their folly: yet their posterity approve their sayings. Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave; for he shall receive me. Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased; for when he dieth, he shall carry nothing away: his glory shall not descend after him. Though while he lived, he blessed his soul: and men will praise thee when thou doest well to thyself: he shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light. Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish."

Some other passages of Holy Writ may not be out of place just here. "The Lord preserveth all them that love him, but all the wicked will he destroy." Ps. cxlv. 20. "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more." Ps. civ. 35. "When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever." Ps. xcii. 7. "Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity: for they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb." Ps. xxxvii. 1,2. "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxiii. 16. "Drought and heat consume snow waters; so doth the grave those which have sinned. The womb shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him: he shall be no more remembered; and wickedness shall be broken as a tree." Job xxiv. 19, 20. "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: because thou hast visit ed and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Isa. xxvi. 14. "There were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. And Jesus answering said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you Nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Luke xiii. 1, 2. "He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." Gal. vi. 8. "These, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed shall utterly perish in their own corruption." 2 Pet. ii. 12. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus, Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. J. T. C.

Our Israelitish Origin.

Rev. Dr. M Wise, at the Jewish Synagogue, in Cincinnati, on the 19th of April, made the following singular statement about the late Abraham Lincoln, viz.

"Brethren, the lamented Abraham Lincoln is believed to be bone from bone and flesh from our flesh. He was supposed to be a decendant of Hebrew parentage. He said so in my presence. And, indeed, he preserved numerous features of the Hebrew race, both in countenance and character."

The foregoing contains more truth than will be suspected by the majority. Abraham Lincoln is a leaf of the Anglo-Saxon branch of the great Teutonic tree. As that tree has its root in Jacob, the son of Isaac, the son of Abraham, it follows that the Jewish Rabbi's statement is correct. If any of Mr. Lincoln's ancestors was a Jew it did not make our martyr President any more Hebrew than he was without such a connection. He was a Saxon and that is enough. God has not forgotten the Joseph of his love. "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall. The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him: but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the mighty God of Jacob; (from thence is the breaking stone of Israel:) even by the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts and of the womb: the blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors, unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills."

Joseph's seed have truly run over the wall: they have overspread northern Europe, crossed the ocean, and extended their power to the Rocky mountains—the everlasting hills. From Joseph has come the breaking stone which even now begins to break in pieces the oppressor. We are living in the midst of wondrous events, predicted three thousand years ago. Let him that hath wisdom understand. Who knows but that this government, which has begun to assume such overshadowing proportions, is the very stone which is to smite the image—and afterwards fill the whole earth? Dan. ii. May God wake us up as a nation to see our duty and perform it! J. T. C.

Divine Providence

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

Every day the conviction increases on our mind that God is especially moving in the affairs of our nation for its good. We think that this will be seen even in the death of our beloved and lamented President. The future, however, will afford better facilities for tracing the majestic footsteps of Almighty God. The following is from the admirable pen of Henry Hart Milman, in the preface to his revised History of the Jews.

"A coincidence and concurrence of natural causes at some critical time, and to all appearance for some marked and particular end—that end sometimes, it should seem, foreshown and foresignified,—is hardly less extraordinary than the most inexplicable miracle. To the mind in a state of religious excitement, or even more quiet veneration, it is, or appears to be, hardly less supernatural, than when these secondary causes are untracable. Afflavit Deus et dissipantur: such was the devout ejaculation of the Protestant, of the Englishman, at the destruction of the Spanish Armada. The causes of that destruction were tempests, scarcely perhaps unusual, scarcely of uncommon violence at that period of the year in the seas around our island. But to the most sober historian, their breaking out and their continuance at that momentous period of our history, would be at least wonderful; to the more ardent, providential; to the deeply religious, would border closely on the miraculous. In the passage of the Red Sea, the east-wind which 'the Lord caused to blow,' and which threw back the waters, was in itself probably no rare phenomenon; but its occurrence at that perilous moment, and in that case, it appears, the confident anticipation, the calculation upon its coming, the foreknowledge and prediction of it by Moses, would raise it, if we may so say, from the providential to the miraculous. Yet, in either case, God is not less God; his rule is not less omnipotent, whether his power be more remotely or more immediately displayed, more closely descerned, more humbly acknowledged. J. T. C.

A New Champion.

The following speaks for itself. We know nothing of the author, but we like his candor and disposition to investigate. We shall be pleased to give him an opportunity to present his strong reasons and we shall be as anxious to convince him of his error as he is us of ours. J. T. C.

WARD'S CORNERS, March 8, 1865.—BR. GEO. STORRS:—A copy of the HERALD OF LIFE has recently been placed in my hands, and I must confess that I was surprised as well as amused at your position in regard to the future destiny of the wicked. I was surprised at the unscriptural argument set forth, and amused at the tact and shrewdness with which you attempted to sustain your premises.

But, to the point. I have been requested by several of the disciples of your faith to present the Herald of Life with the evidence of immortality. I comply with this request on conditions that you welcome my arguments in your columns and will agree to show my error, if there be any. I believe that free discussion is truth's only safety.

My motto has long been:

"He who has a truth and keeps it,
Keeps what not to him belongs;
But performs a selfish action,
And his fellow mortal wrongs."

And therefore I will

Hide no thought in a coward's heart
That the world would be blessed to know.

That you may not be misinformed in regard to the stand-point from which I shall argue, I will inform you that I am strictly Methodistic. Please answer either by inserting the proposition in the Herald, and mailing a copy to my address, or by letter. Truly yours in Christ. E. B. LOUDEN, M. D.

"Inconsistency" Again.

The Voice of the West republishes our late article on the "Inconsistency of Time Theorists," in which we reflected on its effort to persuade those who believe in the coming of Christ in 1868 to build churches. The Editor calls us by name in his response. We follow suit, and would inform those of our readers not acquainted with him that J. V. Himes is an inveterate time agitator. Among other things he says:

"If it is right to preach the speedy personal coming of our Lord at all, it is also right to provide a place in which to preach. Our chief dependence in the winter months for places in which to hold meetings is upon the schoolhouse. Time and again our preachers have been crowded out of these by political and other public meetings, as well as those of opposing sects—such meetings being often gotten up for that very purpose: and this too in neighborhoods where there are individual Adventists well able of themselves to put up a plain, substantial meeting-house. Now if meetings for the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom are profitable at all, then it is not inconsistent for those Adventists who expect to see their Lord in 1868 to build houses where they can meet and exhort one another so much the more because they 'see the day approaching,' while they at the same time warn the world to 'flee from the wrath to come.'"

Now we have no objection against the building of meeting-houses by any body or bodies of Christians. But we give it as our candid conviction that if J. V. Himes believed in his heart that the Lord will come in 1868, and wanted him to come, he would not talk of republishing an article on church-building "an indefinite number of times." He would not stop to build "places in which to hold meetings" but would hold them. A consistent believer in the coming of his Lord at that time, desirous to "warn the world to flee from the wrath to come" would talk and act as if he believed it. Let it be remembered that Mr. Himes opposes the doctrine of the future age. If he believed THAT, we could see nothing wrong in his building meeting-houses. But as it is, his proposition merely exposes his unbelief of his own doctrine. And it was not merely his building of meeting houses that we criticised, but his endorsement of Eld. Taylor's article. The arguments used by Eld. T. could not be consistently used by a man who believed that the world will be burned in a couple of years. Eld. T. says:

"The building and owning of a house of worship by our people has many things in its favor to recommend it. First, there is a moral power in it. Every timber, every stone, every brick preaches. It sounds out afar. Men are made to know you exist and mean to exist. They are given to understand that you mean in spite of opposition to become a permanent religious fixture in the place, that you don't intend to die out. Thus you, respecting yourself and your noble faith, compel others to respect you and it also. Second, It makes you independent, bold, and manly. You don't go sneaking around, ashamed of your nothingness and looking as though you wanted to apologize to the very devil for your ecclesiastical and individual existance. You will thenceforward grow. I have yet to learn where our people have erected a respectable house of worship, that in that place our cause has become extinct. Third, you will be furnished with a permanent religious home. You will become established."

And it is this language that the Editor of the Voice endorses! Would any one take it to harmonize with the '68 cry? We do not believe he has faith in his own doctrine. J. T. C.

"Is there a Future Return of the Jews?"

In the Voice of the West, April 18, the following questions are put to the Editor:

"Do you believe the Jews will be restored to their land before the Lord comes? If not, will you give your views of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel. Has that prophecy been fulfilled? If so, when? If not, when will it be?"

The Editor responds thus:

Our brother has presented some very plain questions; to which we will give direct answers.

I. Do you believe the Jews will be restored to their own land before the Lord comes?

You do not wish our opinion, simply, but a "thus saith the Lord." To the law and the testimony: if we speak not according to this it is because there is no light in us. What, then, does the Bible say about the return of the Jews.

1. "For thus saith the Lord, That after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you, in causing you to return to this place. And I will turn away your captivity, and I will gather you from all the nations, and from all the places whither I have driven you, saith the Lord; and I will bring you again into the place whence I caused you to be carried away captive." (Jer. 29. 10, 14.)

It is to this captivity, and the return from it, that the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and others refer in speaking of the "return." It was a special return from Babylon, but they were, also, to be gathered from all the countries into which any of them had been scattered during the "seventy years." (Jer. 29. 14.) The special promises of a return of the Jews related only to the seventy years' captivity in Babylon, and their return from that place to Jerusalem. Search and see if we are not right in this matter.

Would not the Editor of the Voice be better employed to keep to the work for which he has fitted himself—the agitation of time? The interpretation of the Scriptures seems not to be his forte. Every man to his business, say we. He will have enough to do between this and 1868 without meddling with things beyond his reach. He is about the last person that we should select as a teacher of truth. He fought the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked as long as possible; and after other men had taken the hard knocks that always fall upon pioneers in a good work, he wheeled into line. It would have been useless to start a new Advent paper in the West, unless he espoused the heresy. And there were some unsophisticated onlookers to clap their hands, and thank God that Br. Himes had got hold of the truth at last. As for the doctrine of No Life out of Christ—which he had already acknowledged as the legitimate conclusion of the mortality of the whole man, previous to his espousal of the latter,—he could make good capital in opposing that until the halcyon moment of its safe propagation should arrive. Verily, you shall have your reward.

The restoration of Israel is another doctrine that crosses the grain of the single-eyed Editor of the Voice. How could any one be so short-sighted as to ask him whether he believed in such a thing? And then to ask his views of Scripture prophecy? But then he gives "direct answers." And not only so, but "thus saith the Lord." Yes, and he appeals "to the law and the testimony." And after quoting Jer. xxix. 10, 14, he says with all the assurance imaginable—"Search and see if we are not right in this matter." Surely truth might be expected after such assured language. But let us "search and see."

It is said that "the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and others, in predicting the "return," refer to the return from Babylon which was consummated at the end of the seventy years captivity in Babylon. That is, there are no predictions of any other return of literal Israel in Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel. One simple fact will be a sufficient answer to this. The language in Jeremiah xxix. 10, 14 refers only to the Jews and not to the ten tribes. It is addressed by "the God of hosts, unto all that are carried away captives, whom I have caused to be carried away from Jerusalem unto Babylon." This captivity took place more than a hundred years after Tiglath-Pileser and Shalmaneser, Kings of Assyria carried the ten tribes "into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." 2 Kings xv. 29, xvii. 6–23. Now the return mostly dwelt upon by all the prophets embraced the ten tribes as well as the Jews. But the ten tribes did not return at the time of the restoration of the Jews to Babylon. The prophecy quoted by the Voice says not a word of that great and main body of Jacob's posterity that were taken captive by Assyria. As the prophets, predict the return of the children of Judah with the children of Israel or the ten tribes, it necessarily follows that there is "a future return of the Jews." See Jer. xxvii. 5–8. xxxi.27–37. xxxiii. 14–26. Ezek. xxxvii. 15–29.

The Voice further says:

"In this return all the promises made to the Jews were fulfilled. They were restored to their own land, Jerusalem was rebuilt, and also the Temple, and the sacrifices were restored. See the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

"Now these promises cannot be applied to another restoration of the Jews and Jerusalem, When God fulfills his word once, we ought to be satisfied."

☞ Because God once restored the Jews it is thought that he will not restore them again. Such logic will do for the Voice, but not for us. In Isa. xi. the instalment of King Jesus is predicted, and at that time "the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people." See the whole chapter. Our interpreter responds to the remaining questions thus:

"II. Will you give your views of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel. Has that prophecy been fulfilled? if so. when? If not, when will it be?

"These chapters are connected with the remaining chapters of the book, and relate to the things which concern the restoration from Babylon, at the end of the seventy years captivity, if they would comply with the conditions (ch. 43: 6–11). But this they did not do; and so the glory and prosperity promised was not revealed in their return."

The talk about the connection of chapters is fallacious. The prophecy referred to–ch. xliii. 6–11–is entirely distinct from the prophecy in chs. xxxviii. xxxix. There is not a single condition expressed in the latter chapters. It is a plain, direct, tremendous prediction of God's judgments on his enemies and the enemies of his people when the latter "shall dwell safely" in their own land. So that the questions are not answered. Perhaps the questioner will doubt the propriety of listening to a teacher who by a few strokes of his pen crosses out the express word of YAHVEH. J. T. C.

Letters and Extracts.

From Thos. W. Smith.

ALDEN, Hardin Co., Iowa, April 16, 1865.

BR STORRS:—The Herald of Life is more than usually full of good things, "gems" of thought, cheering epistles, &c., &c. It does me good to read its instructive pages, replete with rich food for the mind.

I feel grateful to the many dear friends who take such an interest in my welfare, and aid so cheerfully and nobly in spreading the truth in the great West. I say, aid in spreading the truth; for, certainly, in providing me means of traveling, the light of life will be heralded where it would not, had I not those means. You and others speak of assisting me to obtain a wagon; permit me to suggest that instead, (if there are any desirous) that the balance due on the horse be raised by the "Horse Stock Co." I could not obtain a suitable and profitable animal for less than $140. Good horses range from $140 to $200. I have bought one for $140, and I will owe $40 still after the $100 is raised. This I intended to pay in instalments, as I should obtain it for my labors in the gospel field, or by manual labor.

I propose, therefore, that those who desire, take "stock" to meet the $40 which is still due on the horse. I suggest this not to burden the brethren, but because some may desire to have part in the horse enterprize who may not get opportunity to assist in that matter, and because I want the horse to be owned exclusively by the Herald of Life. I will see about paying for the wagon. I will not use a dollar for the horse except what is given by believers in "No life out of Christ," if I can help it. I realize the obligations imposed on me by this action on their part, and I am determined, by the grace of God, the great truth of life only in and through Christ shall be fully, freely, and fearlessly proclaimed through the West, as far as I can go; and I intend to go constantly. I expect to visit Kansas this summer, and go to the assistance of Br. Baker and others.

To give the readers of the Herald an insight into my work, and the distance sometimes to be travelled, I give my appointments a month ahead. Saturday and Sunday next, (April 22, 23), Goldfield, about 40 miles, and take me something over a day to go. April 27 to 29 Pritchard Grove, 30 miles. Friday before 1st Sunday in May and over Sunday, South Fork, 10 miles; 2d Sunday, Point Pleasant, 15 miles. The 1st and last places I have never yet visited. The 3d, only once. I have no time to attend to any steady secular work. I must labor in the vineyard of the Lord. My wants are all supplied. I do not fear starvation. I have learned long ago to "trust God for things of this life." I do not fear to work with my hands, as plenty here and elsewhere can testify; but I must preach. I am constrained to preach; for it is a pleasure to do my work at all times in this country.

I trust I may not have occasion to write of myself so much again, except to give the readers of the Herald,—especially the "Horse Stock Co.,"—an account of the missionary labor that I may be enabled to perform, as a brief mention of the work and its results seems to be due them.

"It is more blessed to give than to receive;" and I know I feel happy as the recipient of their kindness. But while assisting in this direction, do not forget the wants of others. Br. Lewis, who does not want a horse, should be kept well supplied with books, tracts, &c. The Freed-men must not be neglected; and what an immense field opens for earnest, faithful labor there. Millions of unsophisticated souls, unlearned in the mysticism of theology as well as the teachings of the common schools, present themselves as dying for want of light and the "bread of life." It wont do to wait till they are spoiled by vain philosophy. I should enjoy that work, but my field is here

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have already sent Br. Smith $103 25 towards the purchase of the "Missionary Horse;" and we think the "Horse Stock Co." will, in a few weeks, make up the remaining sum ($37) so that the horse shall be fully paid for by the believers of "No life out of Christ." If one person cannot take

David his father." 1 Chron. xxix. 23. If the kingdom of Israel was thus the Lord's from the outset, how appropriately is its restoration solicited in the words dictated by our Saviour "Thy kingdom come."

That David construed the words of YAHVEH in their most obvious import, and that he believed that they were a pledge of the final permanence of the Israel which he loved under the dominion of his offspring, is shown by his response to the Divine message. "And David the king come and sat before the Lord, and said, Who am I, O Lord God, and what is mine house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?" The soul of David was filled with wonder when he looked back at his chequered life from the humble sheep-cot of Bethlehem to the throne of Israel. Such a course was indeed calculated to inspire him with the highest appreciation of the goodness and the profoundest recognition of the especial providence of God. But how much more marvellous was the future history of his family as portrayed by the unerring foresight and decree of the same Divine Benefactor! How overwhelming were his emotions of gratitude and awe! To bring the shepherd-boy from the mountains of Bethlehem and seat him as king on Mount Zion was a great thing in David's eyes. "And yet this was a small thing in thine eyes, O God; for thou hast spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come, and hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree, O Lord God."

Such blessings were too great for acknowledgment. "What can David speak more to thee for the honor of thy servant? for thou knowest thy servant. O Lord, for thy servant's sake, and according to thine own heart, hast thus done all this greatness, in making known all these great things. O Lord, there is none like thee, neither is there any God beside thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears. And what one nation in the earth is like thy people Israel, whom God went to redeem to be his own people, to make thee a name of greatness and terribleness by driving out nations from before thy people, whom thou hast redeemed out of Egypt? For thy people Israel didst thou make thine own people for ever; and thou, Yahveh, becamest their God."

The thankful monarch can do nothing but accept the promised blessings in the name of his people and in the name of his seed, and pray for the consummation of the Divine purpose. "Therefore now, Lord, let the thing that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, be established for ever, and do as thou hast said." Not with any selfish feeling does he thus pray. Priceless as is the gift to himself, he does not lose sight of God's ultimate object in all His purposes. The throne of David must be established principally because God requires it. "Let it even be established, that thy name may be magnified for ever, saying Yahveh of hosts is the God of Israel, a God to Israel: and let the house of David thy servant be established bebefore thee. For thou, O my God, hast told thy servant that thou wilt build him an house; therefore thy servant hath found in his heart to pray before thee. And now, Lord, thou art God, and hast promised this goodness unto thy servant: now, therefore, let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may be before thee for ever; for thou blessest, O Lord, and it shall be blessed forever."

Thus in this remarkable chapter, and in its counterpart— 2 Sam. vii.—we have the coming kingdom predicted in the most unmistakable language, and the three essential constituents, government, subjects, and territory, are clearly defined. Every other mention of the kingdom in the Holy Scriptures harmonizes with this fundamental promise of God to David. And the prayer of Jesus, which he placed first in order in the form given to his disciples, was anticipated by his great ancestor. David was the first human being that uttered the prayer—Thy kingdom come. The sublime petition of the father, and the simple utterance of the Son refer to the same great event, both will be answered at the same moment, and when the glorious fact opens a new era to the growing creation and Jesus the Christ takes his place a ruler over all the earth, God's kingdom will have come. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

EDWARD BRAWN, Bradley, Me., writes:—I like the Herald of Life very much. I think it the best paper I have ever read. I do not know how I could do without it, as it has been one of the instruments in the hands of God to open the eyes of my mind to the glorious truth of no life out of Christ.

POLLY EASTMAN, Warner, N. H., writes:—I see by the Herald of Life there is another poor widow of a Soldier that wishes the paper, but is unable to pay for it. I inclose $3; two, to pay for her (the widow Vancleave), and $1 to be disposed of as you think best for the spread of truth.

MRS. ELIZABETH APTHROPE, Ronseville, Pa., writes:—You will find $5 inclosed. Send us "Life only in Christ" and "Our Israelitish Origin." We will take two shares in the "Missionary Horse;" the remainder apply as you think best. May the Lord bless and prosper you and our paper. Pray for us, that we may be kept in the faith and have a share in the kingdom when our Lord comes to reign.

SECRET PRAYER.—In public and private duties we may admit of the company of others to join with us; and, if they be such as fear God, the more the better. But in secret duties Christ and thou must whisper it over betwixt yourselves; and then the company of the wife of thy bosom or thy friend that is as thine own soul would not be welcome.—Flavel.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

Owing to the excitement attending the funeral rites of ABRAHAM LINCOLN in this city on Monday and Tuesday, April, 24, 25, the advertised secular days of our Conference, it was decided beforehand not to extend the Conference beyond Sunday, April 23, which arrangement made it necessary to hold a brief business meeting on Sunday. The following is a statement of the business.

The meeting was called to order by the President at 2 P. M.

Resolved, to adjourn the Conference this evening.

The proposed Camp-meeting at Groton Junction, Mass. was abandoned in favor of conference and grove-meetings in new places (especially in the West), to be selected in the future.

Resolved, to raise a fund to spread the truth in the West—to be opened in the Herald of Life as the WESTERN MISSIONARY FUND.

Resolved, that the tent fund, with the consent of the subscribers, be transferred to the Western Missionary fund.

Adjourned. J. T. CURRY, Secretary.

The Assassin's Death.

Before this issue reaches our readers they will have received the particulars of the end of the intellectual brute who murdered our beloved President. In the language of a city journal "he was hunted like a rat and shot like a dog." The bullet of avenging justice passed through his head nearly in the same place that he shot Mr. Lincoln. Unlike the lamented martyr, however,—who was not concious of his fate—Booth suffered inexpressible agony up to the moment of his death, about four hours subsequent to the shot. The special correspondent of the N. Y. Herald says: The post mortem examination was made by Surgeon General Barnes. It was found that the ball had passed just along the base of the brain, without injury to the brain, but by striking the spinal column had occasioned immediate paralysis. The opinion of the surgeons is that his death must have been a horrible one, the brain being active and consciousness complete up to the very moment of dissolution."

It is singular that Booth should die almost at the same minute as his innocent victim, the latter having expired at 7. 22 A. M., the former at 7. 20 A. M. It is remarkable that a Christian was selected to slay the murderer—BOSTON CORBETT, a member of the Protestant Methodist church in this city, and a devoted follower of Jesus. Not in the spirit of revenge, but of justice, acted the human instrument of Divine Retribution. This calls to mind the death of an ancient murderer in a somewhat similar way. "And Benaiah came to the tabernacle of the Lord, and said unto him, Thus saith the king, come forth, and he said, Nay; but I will die here. And Benaiah brought the king word again, saying, Thus said Joab, and thus he answered me. And the king said unto him, Do as he hath said, and fall upon him, and bury him; that thou mayest take away the innocent blood, which Joab shed, from me, and from the house of my father. And the Lord shall return his blood upon his own head, who fell upon two men more righteous and better than he.... So Benaiah the son of Jehoiada went up, and fell upon him and slew him." 1 Kings ii. 30–34.

Another noticeable fact is that Junius Brutus Booth, a brother of the murderer, who was arrested in Philadelphia Tuesday, the 25th ult., perhaps on suspicion of complicity with his brother, was observed to copy, after his arrest, some extracts from the Bible, some of which were from the forty-ninth Psalm. Now this Psalm explicitly states the end of Booth and all the wilful enemies of God. We commend these passages to the consideration of such Christians as, not knowing the spirit they are of, breathe out their thoughtless vaporings about future torment. "This their way is their folly: yet their posterity approve their sayings. Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave; for he shall receive me. Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased; for when he dieth, he shall carry nothing away: his glory shall not descend after him. Though while he lived, he blessed his soul: and men will praise thee when thou doest well to thyself: he shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light. Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish."

Some other passages of Holy Writ may not be out of place just here. "The Lord preserveth all them that love him, but all the wicked will he destroy." Ps. cxlv. 20. "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more." Ps. civ. 35. "When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever." Ps. xcii. 7. "Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity: for they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb." Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2. "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxiii. 16. "Drought and heat consume snow waters; so doth the grave those which have sinned. The womb shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him: he shall be no more remembered; and wickedness shall be broken as a tree." Job xxiv. 19, 20. "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: because thou hast visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Isa. xxvi. 14. "There were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. And Jesus answering said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you Nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Luke xiii. 1, 2. "He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." Gal. vi. 8. "These, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed shall utterly perish in their own corruption." 2 Pet. ii. 12. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus, Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. J. T. C.

Our Israelitish Origin.

Rev. Dr. M Wise, at the Jewish Synagogue, in Cincinnati, on the 19th of April, made the following singular statement about the late Abraham Lincoln, viz.

"Brethren, the lamented Abraham Lincoln is believed to be bone from bone and flesh from our flesh. He was supposed to be a decendant of Hebrew parentage. He said so in my presence. And, indeed, he preserved numerous features of the Hebrew race, both in countenance and character."

The foregoing contains more truth than will be suspected by the majority. Abraham Lincoln is a leaf of the Anglo-Saxon branch of the great Teutonic tree. As that tree has its root in Jacob, the son of Isaac, the son of Abraham, it follows that the Jewish Rabbi's statement is correct. If any of Mr. Lincoln's ancestors was a Jew it did not make our martyr President any more Hebrew than he was without such a connection. He was a Saxon and that is enough. God has not forgotten the Joseph of his love. "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall. The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him: but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the mighty God of Jacob; (from thence is the breaking stone of Israel:) even by the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts and of the womb: the blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors, unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills."

Joseph's seed have truly run over the wall: they have overspread northern Europe, crossed the ocean, and extended their power to the Rocky mountains—the everlasting hills. From Joseph has come the breaking stone which even now begins to break in pieces the oppressor. We are living in the midst of wondrous events, predicted three thousand years ago. Let him that hath wisdom understand. Who knows but that this government, which has begun to assume such overshadowing proportions, is the very stone which is to smite the image—and afterwards fill the whole earth? Dan. ii. May God wake us up as a nation to see our duty and perform it! J. T. C.

Divine Providence

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

Every day the conviction increases on our mind that God is especially moving in the affairs of our nation for its good. We think that this will be seen even in the death of our beloved and lamented President. The future, however, will afford better facilities for tracing the majestic footsteps of Almighty God. The following is from the admirable pen of Henry Hart Milman, in the preface to his revised History of the Jews.

"A coincidence and concurrence of natural causes at some critical time, and to all appearance for some marked and particular end—that end sometimes, it should seem, foreshown and foresignified,—is hardly less extraordinary than the most inexplicable miracle. To the mind in a state of religious excitement, or even more quiet veneration, it is, or appears to be, hardly less supernatural, than when these secondary causes are untraceable. Afflavit Deus et dissipantur: such was the devout ejaculation of the Protestant, of the Englishman, at the destruction of the Spanish Armada. The causes of that destruction were tempests, scarcely perhaps unusual, scarcely of uncommon violence at that period of the year in the seas around our island. But to the most sober historian, their breaking out and their continuance at that momentous period of our history, would be at least wonderful; to the more ardent, providential; to the deeply religious, would border closely on the miraculous. In the passage of the Red Sea, the east-wind which 'the Lord caused to blow,' and which threw back the waters, was in itself probably no rare phenomenon; but its occurrence at that perilous moment, and in that case, it appears, the confident anticipation, the calculation upon its coming, the foreknowledge and prediction of it by Moses, would raise it, if we may so say, from the providential to the miraculous. Yet, in either case, God is not less God; his rule is not less omnipotent, whether his power be more remotely or more immediately displayed, more closely descerned, more humbly acknowledged. J. T. C.

A New Champion.

The following speaks for itself. We know nothing of the author, but we like his candor and disposition to investigate. We shall be pleased to give him an opportunity to present his strong reasons and we shall be as anxious to convince him of his error as he is us of ours. J. T. C.

WARD'S CORNERS, March 8, 1865.—BR. GEO. STORRS:—A copy of the HERALD OF LIFE has recently been placed in my hands, and I must confess that I was surprised as well as amused at your position in regard to the future destiny of the wicked. I was surprised at the unscriptural argument set forth, and amused at the tact and shrewdness with which you attempted to sustain your premises.

But, to the point. I have been requested by several of the disciples of your faith to present the Herald of Life with the evidence of immortality. I comply with this request on conditions that you welcome my arguments in your columns and will agree to show my error, if there be any. I believe that free discussion is truth's only safety.

My motto has long been:

"He who has a truth and keeps it,
Keeps what not to him belongs;
But performs a selfish action,
And his fellow mortal wrongs."

And therefore I will

Hide no thought in a coward's heart
That the world would be blessed to know.

That you may not be misinformed in regard to the stand-point from which I shall argue, I will inform you that I am strictly Methodistic. Please answer either by inserting the proposition in the Herald, and mailing a copy to my address, or by letter. Truly yours in Christ. E. B. LOUDEN, M. D.

P. S. My Address is Ward's Corners, Buchannan County, Iowa.

"Inconsistency" Again.

The Voice of the West republishes our late article on the "Inconsistency of Time Theorists," in which we reflected on its effort to persuade those who believe in the coming of Christ in 1868 to build churches. The Editor calls us by name in his response. We follow suit, and would inform those of our readers not acquainted with him that J. V. Himes is an inveterate time agitator. Among other things he says:

"If it is right to preach the speedy personal coming of our Lord at all, it is also right to provide a place in which to preach. Our chief dependence in the winter months for places in which to hold meetings is upon the school-house. Time and again our preachers have been crowded out of these by political and other public meetings, as well as those of opposing sects—such meetings being often gotten up for that very purpose: and this too in neighborhoods where there are individual Adventists well able of themselves to put up a plain, substantial meeting-house. Now if meetings for the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom are profitable at all, then it is not inconsistent for those Adventists who expect to see their Lord in 1868 to build houses where they can meet and exhort one another so much the more because they 'see the day approaching,' while they at the same time warn the world to 'flee from the wrath to come.'"

Now we have no objection against the building of meeting-houses by any body or bodies of Christians. But we give it as our candid conviction that if J. V. Himes believed in his heart that the Lord will come in 1868, and wanted him to come, he would not talk of republishing an article on church-building "an indefinite number of times." He would not stop to build "places in which to hold meetings" but would hold them. A consistent believer in the coming of his Lord at that time, desirous to "warn the world to flee from the wrath to come" would talk and act as if he believed it. Let it be remembered that Mr. Himes opposes the doctrine of the future age. If he believed THAT, we could see nothing wrong in his building meeting-houses. But as it is, his proposition merely exposes his unbelief of his own doctrine. And it was not merely his building of meeting houses that we criticised, but his endorsement of Eld. Taylor's article. The arguments used by Eld. T. could not be consistently used by a man who believed that the world will be burned in a couple of years. Eld. T. says:

"The building and owning of a house of worship by our people has many things in its favor to recommend it. First, there is a moral power in it. Every timber, every stone, every brick preaches. It sounds out afar. Men are made to know you exist and mean to exist. They are given to understand that you mean in spite of opposition to become a permanent religious fixture in the place, that you don't intend to die out. Thus you, respecting yourself and your noble faith, compel others to respect you and it also. Second, It makes you independent, bold, and manly. You don't go sneaking around, ashamed of your nothingness and looking as though you wanted to apologize to the very devil for your ecclesiastical and individual existance. You will thenceforward grow. I have yet to learn where our people have erected a respectable house of worship, that in that place our cause has become extinct. Third, you will be furnished with a permanent religious home. You will become established."

And it is this language that the Editor of the Voice endorses! Would any one take it to harmonize with the '68 cry? We do not believe he has faith in his own doctrine. J. T. C.

"Is there a Future Return of the Jews?"

In the Voice of the West, April 18, the following questions are put to the Editor:

"Do you believe the Jews will be restored to their land before the Lord comes? If not, will you give your views of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel. Has that prophecy been fulfilled? If so, when? If not, when will it be?"

The Editor responds thus:

Our brother has presented some very plain questions; to which we will give direct answers.

I. Do you believe the Jews will be restored to their own land before the Lord comes?

You do not wish our opinion, simply, but a "thus saith the Lord." To the law and the testimony: if we speak not according to this it is because there is no light in us. What, then, does the Bible say about the return of the Jews.

1. "For thus saith the Lord, That after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you, in causing you to return to this place. And I will turn away your captivity, and I will gather you from all the nations, and from all the places whither I have driven you, saith the Lord; and I will bring you again into the place whence I caused you to be carried away captive." (Jer. 29. 10, 14.)

It is to this captivity, and the return from it, that the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and others refer in speaking of the "return." It was a special return from Babylon, but they were, also, to be gathered from all the countries into which any of them had been scattered during the "seventy years." (Jer. 29. 14.) The special promises of a return of the Jews related only to the seventy years' captivity in Babylon, and their return from that place to Jerusalem. Search and see if we are not right in this matter.

Would not the Editor of the Voice be better employed to keep to the work for which he has fitted himself—the agitation of time? The interpretation of the Scriptures seems not to be his forte. Every man to his business, say we. He will have enough to do between this and 1868 without meddling with things beyond his reach. He is about the last person that we should select as a teacher of truth. He fought the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked as long as possible; and after other men had taken the hard knocks that always fall upon pioneers in a good work, he wheeled into line. It would have been useless to start a new Advent paper in the West, unless he espoused the heresy. And there were some unsophisticated onlookers to clap their hands, and thank God that Br. Himes had got hold of the truth at last. As for the doctrine of No Life out of Christ—which he had already acknowledged as the legitimate conclusion of the mortality of the whole man, previous to his espousal of the latter,—he could make good capital in opposing that until the halcyon moment of its safe propagation should arrive. Verily, you shall have your reward.

The restoration of Israel is another doctrine that crosses the grain of the single-eyed Editor of the Voice. How could any one be so short-sighted as to ask him whether he believed in such a thing? And then to ask his views of Scripture prophecy? But then he gives "direct answers." And not only so, but "thus saith the Lord." Yes, and he appeals "to the law and the testimony." And after quoting Jer. xxix. 10, 14, he says with all the assurance imaginable—"Search and see if we are not right in this matter." Surely truth might be expected after such assured language. But let us "search and see."

It is said that "the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and others, in predicting the "return," refer to the return from Babylon which was consummated at the end of the seventy years captivity in Babylon. That is, there are no predictions of any other return of literal Israel in Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel. One simple fact will be a sufficient answer to this. The language in Jeremiah xxix. 10, 14 refers only to the Jews and not to the ten tribes. It is addressed by "the God of hosts, unto all that are carried away captives, whom I have caused to be carried away from Jerusalem unto Babylon." This captivity took place more than a hundred years after Tiglath-Pileser and Shalmaneser, Kings of Assyria carried the ten tribes "into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." 2 Kings xv. 29, xvii. 6–23. Now the return mostly dwelt upon by all the prophets embraced the ten tribes as well as the Jews. But the ten tribes did not return at the time of the restoration of the Jews to Babylon. The prophecy quoted by the Voice says not a word of that great and main body of Jacob's posterity that were taken captive by Assyria. As the prophets, predict the return of the children of Judah with the children of Israel or the ten tribes, it necessarily follows that there is "a future return of the Jews." See Jer. xxvii. 5–8. xxxi. 27–37. xxxiii. 14–26. Ezek. xxxvii. 15–29.

The Voice further says:

"In this return all the promises made to the Jews were fulfilled. They were restored to their own land, Jerusalem was rebuilt, and also the Temple, and the sacrifices were restored. See the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

"Now these promises cannot be applied to another restoration of the Jews and Jerusalem, When God fulfills his word once, we ought to be satisfied."

Because God once restored the Jews it is thought that he will not restore them again. Such logic will do for the Voice, but not for us. In Isa. xi. the instalment of King Jesus is predicted, and at that time "the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people." See the whole chapter. Our interpreter responds to the remaining questions thus:

"II. Will you give your views of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel. Has that prophecy been fulfilled? if so. when? If not, when will it be?

"These chapters are connected with the remaining chapters of the book, and relate to the things which concern the restoration from Babylon, at the end of the seventy years captivity, if they would comply with the conditions (ch. 43: 6–11). But this they did not do; and so the glory and prosperity promised was not revealed in their return."

The talk about the connection of chapters is fallacious. The prophecy referred to—ch. xliii. 6–11—is entirely distinct from the prophecy in chs. xxxviii. xxxix. There is not a single condition expressed in the latter chapters. It is a plain, direct, tremendous prediction of God's judgments on his enemies and the enemies of his people when the latter "shall dwell safely" in their own land. So that the questions are not answered. Perhaps the questioner will doubt the propriety of listening to a teacher who by a few strokes of his pen crosses out the express word of YAHVEH. J. T. C.

Letters and Extracts.

From Thos. W. Smith.

ALDEN, Hardin Co., Iowa,
April 16, 1865.

BR STORRS:—The Herald of Life is more than usually full of good things, "gems" of thought, cheering epistles, &c., &c. It does me good to read its instructive pages, replete with rich food for the mind.

I feel grateful to the many dear friends who take such an interest in my welfare, and aid so cheerfully and nobly in spreading the truth in the great West. I say, aid in spreading the truth; for, certainly, in providing me means of traveling, the light of life will be heralded where it would not, had I not those means. You and others speak of assisting me to obtain a wagon; permit me to suggest that instead, (if there are any desirous) that the balance due on the horse be raised by the "Horse Stock Co." I could not obtain a suitable and profitable animal for less than $140. Good horses range from $140 to $200. I have bought one for $140, and I will owe $40 still after the $100 is raised. This I intended to pay in instalments, as I should obtain it for my labors in the gospel field, or by manual labor.

I propose, therefore, that those who desire, take "stock" to meet the $40 which is still due on the horse. I suggest this not to burden the brethren, but because some may desire to have part in the horse enterprize who may not get opportunity to assist in that matter, and because I want the horse to be owned exclusively by the Herald of Life. I will see about paying for the wagon. I will not use a dollar for the horse except what is given by believers in "No life out of Christ," if I can help it. I realize the obligations imposed on me by this action on their part, and I am determined, by the grace of God, the great truth of life only in and through Christ shall be fully, freely, and fearlessly proclaimed through the West, as far as I can go; and I intend to go constantly. I expect to visit Kansas this summer, and go to the assistance of Br. Baker and others.

To give the readers of the Herald an insight into my work, and the distance sometimes to be travelled, I give my appointments a month ahead. Saturday and Sunday next, (April 22, 23), Goldfield, about 40 miles, and take me something over a day to go. April 27 to 29 Pritchard Grove, 30 miles. Friday before 1st Sunday in May and over Sunday, South Fork, 10 miles; 2d Sunday, Point Pleasant, 15 miles. The 1st and last places I have never yet visited. The 3d, only once. I have no time to attend to any steady secular work. I must labor in the vineyard of the Lord. My wants are all supplied. I do not fear starvation. I have learned long ago to "trust God for things of this life." I do not fear to work with my hands, as plenty here and elsewhere can testify; but I must preach. I am constrained to preach; for it is a pleasure to do my work at all times in this country.

I trust I may not have occasion to write of myself so much again, except to give the readers of the Herald,—especially the "Horse Stock Co.,"—an account of the missionary labor that I may be enabled to perform, as a brief mention of the work and its results seems to be due them.

"It is more blessed to give than to receive;" and I know I feel happy as the recipient of their kindness. But while assisting in this direction, do not forget the wants of others. Br. Lewis, who does not want a horse, should be kept well supplied with books, tracts, &c. The Freed-men must not be neglected; and what an immense field opens for earnest, faithful labor there. Millions of unsophisticated souls, unlearned in the mysticism of theology as well as the teachings of the common schools, present themselves as dying for want of light and the "bread of life." It wont do to wait till they are spoiled by vain philosophy. I should enjoy that work, but my field is here

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have already sent Br. Smith $103 25 towards the purchase of the "Missionary Horse;" and we think the "Horse Stock Co." will, in a few weeks, make up the remaining sum ($37) so that the horse shall be fully paid for by the believers of "No life out of Christ." If one person cannot take

David his father." 1 Chron. xxix. 28. If the kingdom of Israel was thus the Lord's from the outset, how appropriately is its restoration solicited in the words dictated by our Saviour "Thy kingdom come."

That David construed the words of Yahveh in their most obvious import, and that he believed that they were a pledge of the final permanence of the Israel which he loved under the dominion of his offspring, is shown by his response to the Divine message. "And David the king come and sat before the Lord, and said, Who am I, O Lord God, and what is mine house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?" The soul of David was filled with wonder when he looked back at his chequered life from the humble sheep-cot of Bethlehem to the throne of Israel. Such a course was indeed calculated to inspire him with the highest appreciation of the goodness and the profoundest recognition of the especial providence of God. But how much more marvellous was the future history of his family as portrayed by the unerring foresight and decree of the same Divine Benefactor! How overwhelming were his emotions of gratitude and awe! To bring the shepherd-boy from the mountains of Bethlehem and seat him as king on Mount Zion was a great thing in David's eyes. "And yet this was a small thing in thine eyes, O God; for thou hast spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come, and hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree, O Lord God."

Such blessings were too great for acknowledgment. "What can David speak more to thee for the honor of thy servant? for thou knowest thy servant. O Lord, for thy servant's sake, and according to thine own heart, hast thus done all this greatness, in making known all these great things. O Lord, there is none like thee, neither is there any God beside thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears. And what one nation in the earth is like thy people Israel, whom God went to redeem to be his own people, to make thee a name of greatness and terribleness by driving out nations from before thy people, whom thou hast redeemed out of Egypt? For thy people Israel didst thou make thine own people for ever; and thou, Yahveh, becamest their God."

The thankful monarch can do nothing but accept the promised blessings in the name of his people and in the name of his seed, and pray for the consummation of the Divine purpose. "Therefore now, Lord, let the thing that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, be established for ever, and do as thou hast said." Not with any selfish feeling does he thus pray. Priceless as is the gift to himself, he does not lose sight of God's ultimate object in all His purposes. The throne of David must be established principally because God requires it. "Let it even be established, that thy name may be magnified for ever, saying Yahveh of hosts is the God of Israel, a God to Israel: and let the house of David thy servant be established be-before thee. For thou, O my God, hast told thy servant that thou wilt build him an house; therefore thy servant hath found in his heart to pray before thee. And now, Lord, thou art God, and hast promised this goodness unto thy servant: now, therefore, let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may be before thee for ever; for thou blessest, O Lord, and it shall be blessed forever."

Thus in this remarkable chapter, and in its counterpart— 2 Sam. vii.—we have the coming kingdom predicted in the most unmistakable language, and the three essential constituents, government, subjects, and territory, are clearly defined. Every other mention of the kingdom in the Holy Scriptures harmonizes with this fundamental promise of God to David. And the prayer of Jesus, which he placed first in order in the form given to his disciples, was anticipated by his great ancestor. David was the first human being that uttered the prayer—Thy kingdom come. The sublime petition of the father, and the simple utterance of the Son refer to the same great event, both will be answered at the same moment, and when the glorious fact opens a new era to the growing creation and Jesus the Christ takes his place a ruler over all the earth, God's kingdom will have come. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

Edward Brawn, Bradley, Me., writes:—I like the Herald of Life very much. I think it the best paper I have ever read. I do not know how I could do without it, as it has been one of the instruments in the hands of God to open the eyes of my mind to the glorious truth of no life out of Christ.

Polly Eastman, Warner, N. H., writes:—I see by the Herald of Life there is another poor widow of a Soldier that wishes the paper, but is unable to pay for it. I inclose $3; two, to pay for her (the widow Vancleave), and $1 to be disposed of as you think best for the spread of truth.

Mrs. Elizabeth Apthrope, Ronseville, Pa., writes:—You will find $5 inclosed. Send us "Life only in Christ" and "Our Israelitish Origin." We will take two shares in the "Missionary Horse;" the remainder apply as you think best. May the Lord bless and prosper you and our paper. Pray for us, that we may be kept in the faith and have a share in the kingdom when our Lord comes to reign.

Secret Prayer.—In public and private duties we may admit of the company of others to join with us; and, if they be such as fear God, the more the better. But in secret duties Christ and thou must whisper it over betwixt yourselves; and then the company of the wife of thy bosom or thy friend that is as thine own soul would not be welcome.—Flavel.

NEW YORK, MAY 3, 1865.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

Owing to the excitement attending the funeral rites of Abraham Lincoln in this city on Monday and Tuesday, April, 24, 25, the advertised secular days of our Conference, it was decided beforehand not to extend the Conference beyond Sunday, April 23, which arrangement made it necessary to hold a brief business meeting on Sunday. The following is a statement of the business.

The meeting was called to order by the President at 2 P. M.

Resolved, to adjourn the Conference this evening.

The proposed Camp-meeting at Groton Junction, Mass. was abandoned in favor of conference and grove-meetings in new places (especially in the West), to be selected in the future.

Resolved, to raise a fund to spread the truth in the West—to be opened in the Herald of Life as the Western Missionary Fund.

Resolved, that the tent fund, with the consent of the subscribers, be transferred to the Western Missionary fund.

Adjourned. J. T. Curry, Secretary.

The Assassin's Death.

Before this issue reaches our readers they will have received the particulars of the end of the intellectual brute who murdered our beloved President. In the language of a city journal "he was hunted like a rat and shot like a dog." The bullet of avenging justice passed through his head nearly in the same place that he shot Mr. Lincoln. Unlike the lamented martyr, however,—who was not concious of his fate—Booth suffered inexpressible agony up to the moment of his death, about four hours subsequent to the shot. The special correspondent of the N. Y. Herald says: The post mortem examination was made by Surgeon General Barnes. It was found that the ball had passed just along the base of the brain, without injury to the brain, but by striking the spinal column had occasioned immediate paralysis. The opinion of the surgeons is that his death must have been a horrible one, the brain being active and consciousness complete up to the very moment of dissolution."

It is singular that Booth should die almost at the same minute as his innocent victim, the latter having expired at 7. 22 A. M., the former at 7. 20 A. M. It is remarkable that a Christian was selected to slay the murderer—Boston Corbett, a member of the Protestant Methodist church in this city, and a devoted follower of Jesus. Not in the spirit of revenge, but of justice, acted the human instrument of Divine Retribution. This calls to mind the death of an ancient murderer in a somewhat similar way. "And Benaiah came to the tabernacle of the Lord, and said unto him, Thus saith the king, come forth, and he said, Nay; but I will die here. And Benaiah brought the king word again, saying, Thus said Joab, and thus he answered me. And the king said unto him, Do as he hath said, and fall upon him, and bury him; that thou mayest take away the innocent blood, which Joab shed, from me, and from the house of my father. And the Lord shall return his blood upon his own head, who fell upon two men more righteous and better than he....So Benaiah the son of Jehoiada went up, and fell upon him and slew him." 1 Kings ii. 30–34.

Another noticeable fact is that Junius Brutus Booth, a brother of the murderer, who was arrested in Philadelphia Tuesday, the 25th ult., perhaps on suspicion of complicity with his brother, was observed to copy, after his arrest, some extracts from the Bible, some of which were from the forty-ninth Psalm. Now this Psalm explicitly states the end of Booth and all the wilful enemies of God. We commend these passages to the consideration of such Christians as, not knowing the spirit they are of, breathe out their thoughtless vaporings about future torment. "This their way is their folly: yet their posterity approve their sayings. Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave; for he shall receive me. Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased; for when he dieth, he shall carry nothing away: his glory shall not descend after him. Though while he lived, he blessed his soul: and men will praise thee when thou doest well to thyself: he shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light. Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish."

Some other passages of Holy Writ may not be out of place just here. "The Lord preserveth all them that love him, but all the wicked will he destroy." Ps. cxlv. 20. "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more." Ps. civ. 35. "When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever." Ps. xcii. 7. "Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity: for they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb." Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2. "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxiii. 16. "Drought and heat consume snow waters; so doth the grave those which have sinned. The womb shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him: he shall be no more remembered; and wickedness shall be broken as a tree." Job xxiv. 19, 20. "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: because thou hast visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Isa. xxvi. 14. "There were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. And Jesus answering said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you Nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Luke xiii. 1, 2. "He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." Gal. vi. 8. "These, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed shall utterly perish in their own corruption." 2 Pet. ii. 12. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus, Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. J. T. C.

Our Israelitish Origin.

Rev. Dr. M Wise, at the Jewish Synagogue, in Cincinnati, on the 19th of April, made the following singular statement about the late Abraham Lincoln, viz.

"Brethren, the lamented Abraham Lincoln is believed to be bone from bone and flesh from our flesh. He was supposed to be a decendant of Hebrew parentage. He said so in my presence. And, indeed, he preserved numerous features of the Hebrew race, both in countenance and character."

The foregoing contains more truth than will be suspected by the majority. Abraham Lincoln is a leaf of the Anglo-Saxon branch of the great Teutonic tree. As that tree has its root in Jacob, the son of Isaac, the son of Abraham, it follows that the Jewish Rabbi's statement is correct. If any of Mr. Lincoln's ancestors was a Jew it did not make our martyr President any more Hebrew than he was without such a connection. He was a Saxon and that is enough. God has not forgotten the Joseph of his love. "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall. The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him: but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the mighty God of Jacob; (from thence is the breaking stone of Israel:) even by the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts and of the womb: the blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors, unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills."

Joseph's seed have truly run over the wall: they have overspread northern Europe, crossed the ocean, and extended their power to the Rocky mountains—the everlasting hills. From Joseph has come the breaking stone which even now begins to break in pieces the oppressor. We are living in the midst of wondrous events, predicted three thousand years ago. Let him that hath wisdom understand. Who knows but that this government, which has begun to assume such overshadowing proportions, is the very stone which is to smite the image—and afterwards fill the whole earth? Dan. ii. May God wake us up as a nation to see our duty and perform it! J. T. C.

Divine Providence

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

Every day the conviction increases on our mind that God is especially moving in the affairs of our nation for its good. We think that this will be seen even in the death of our beloved and lamented President. The future, however, will afford better facilities for tracing the majestic footsteps of Almighty God. The following is from the admirable pen of Henry Hart Milman, in the preface to his revised History of the Jews.

"A coincidence and concurrence of natural causes at some critical time, and to all appearance for some marked and particular end—that end sometimes, it should seem, foreshown and foresignified,—is hardly less extraordinary than the most inexplicable miracle. To the mind in a state of religious excitement, or even more quiet veneration, it is, or appears to be, hardly less supernatural, than when these secondary causes are untracable. Afflavit Deus et dissipantur: such was the devout ejaculation of the Protestant, of the Englishman, at the destruction of the Spanish Armada. The causes of that destruction were tempests, scarcely perhaps unusual, scarcely of uncommon violence at that period of the year in the seas around our island. But to the most sober historian, their breaking out and their continuance at that momentous period of our history, would be at least wonderful; to the more ardent, providential; to the deeply religious, would border closely on the miraculous. In the passage of the Red Sea, the east-wind which 'the Lord caused to blow,' and which threw back the waters, was in itself probably no rare phenomenon; but its occurrence at that perilous moment, and in that case, it appears, the confident anticipation, the calculation upon its coming, the foreknowledge and prediction of it by Moses, would raise it, if we may so say, from the providential to the miraculous. Yet, in either case, God is not less God; his rule is not less omnipotent, whether his power be more remotely or more immediately displayed, more closely descerned, more humbly acknowledged. J. T. C.

A New Champion.

The following speaks for itself. We know nothing of the author, but we like his candor and disposition to investigate. We shall be pleased to give him an opportunity to present his strong reasons and we shall be as anxious to convince him of his error as he is us of ours. J. T. C.

Ward's Corners, March 8, 1865.—Br. Geo. Storrs:—A copy of the Herald of Life has recently been placed in my hands, and I must confess that I was surprised as well as amused at your position in regard to the future destiny of the wicked. I was surprised at the unscriptural argument set forth, and amused at the tact and shrewdness with which you attempted to sustain your premises.

But, to the point. I have been requested by several of the disciples of your faith to present the Herald of Life with the evidence of immortality. I comply with this request on conditions that you welcome my arguments in your columns and will agree to show my error, if there be any. I believe that free discussion is truth's only safety.

My motto has long been:

"He who has a truth and keeps it,
Keeps what not to him belongs;
But performs a selfish action,
And his fellow mortal wrongs."

And therefore I will

Hide no thought in a coward's heart
That the world would be blessed to know.

That you may not be misinformed in regard to the stand-point from which I shall argue, I will inform you that I am strictly Methodistic. Please answer either by inserting the proposition in the Herald, and mailing a copy to my address, or by letter. Truly yours in Christ. E. B. Louden, M. D.

P. S. My Address is Ward's Corners, Buchannan County, Iowa.

"Inconsistency" Again.

The Voice of the West republishes our late article on the "Inconsistency of Time Theorists," in which we reflected on its effort to persuade those who believe in the coming of Christ in 1868 to build churches. The Editor calls us by name in his response. We follow suit, and would inform those of our readers not acquainted with him that J. V. Himes is an inveterate time agitator. Among other things he says:

"If it is right to preach the speedy personal coming of our Lord at all, it is also right to provide a place in which to preach. Our chief dependence in the winter months for places in which to hold meetings is upon the school-house. Time and again our preachers have been crowded out of these by political and other public meetings, as well as those of opposing sects—such meetings being often gotten up for that very purpose: and this too in neighborhoods where there are individual Adventists well able of themselves to put up a plain, substantial meeting-house. Now if meetings for the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom are profitable at all, then it is not inconsistent for those Adventists who expect to see their Lord in 1868 to build houses where they can meet and exhort one another so much the more because they 'see the day approaching,' while they at the same time warn the world to 'flee from the wrath to come.'"

Now we have no objection against the building of meeting-houses by any body or bodies of Christians. But we give it as our candid conviction that if J. V. Himes believed in his heart that the Lord will come in 1868, and wanted him to come, he would not talk of republishing an article on church-building "an indefinite number of times." He would not stop to build "places in which to hold meetings" but would hold them. A consistent believer in the coming of his Lord at that time, desirous to "warn the world to flee from the wrath to come" would talk and act as if he believed it. Let it be remembered that Mr. Himes opposes the doctrine of the future age. If he believed THAT, we could see nothing wrong in his building meeting-houses. But as it is, his proposition merely exposes his unbelief of his own doctrine. And it was not merely his building of meeting houses that we criticised, but his endorsement of Eld. Taylor's article. The arguments used by Eld. T. could not be consistently used by a man who believed that the world will be burned in a couple of years. Eld. T. says:

"The building and owning of a house of worship by our people has many things in its favor to recommend it. First, there is a moral power in it. Every timber, every stone, every brick preaches. It sounds out afar. Men are made to know you exist and mean to exist. They are given to understand that you mean in spite of opposition to become a permanent religious fixture in the place, that you don't intend to die out. Thus you, respecting yourself and your noble faith, compel others to respect you and it also. Second, It makes you independent, bold, and manly. You don't go sneaking around, ashamed of your nothingness and looking as though you wanted to apologize to the very devil for your ecclesiastical and individual existance. You will thenceforward grow. I have yet to learn where our people have erected a respectable house of worship, that in that place our cause has become extinct. Third, you will be furnished with a permanent religious home. You will become established."

And it is this language that the Editor of the Voice endorses! Would any one take it to harmonize with the '68 cry? We do not believe he has faith in his own doctrine. J. T. C.

"Is there a Future Return of the Jews?"

In the Voice of the West, April 18, the following questions are put to the Editor:

"Do you believe the Jews will be restored to their land before the Lord comes? If not, will you give your views of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel. Has that prophecy been fulfilled? If so, when? If not, when will it be?"

The Editor responds thus:

Our brother has presented some very plain questions; to which we will give direct answers.

I. Do you believe the Jews will be restored to their own land before the Lord comes?

You do not wish our opinion, simply, but a "thus saith the Lord." To the law and the testimony: if we speak not according to this it is because there is no light in us. What, then, does the Bible say about the return of the Jews.

1. "For thus saith the Lord, That after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you, in causing you to return to this place. And I will turn away your captivity, and I will gather you from all the nations, and from all the places whither I have driven you, saith the Lord; and I will bring you again into the place whence I caused you to be carried away captive." (Jer. 29. 10, 14.)

It is to this captivity, and the return from it, that the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and others refer in speaking of the "return." It was a special return from Babylon, but they were, also, to be gathered from all the countries into which any of them had been scattered during the "seventy years." (Jer. 29. 14.) The special promises of a return of the Jews related only to the seventy years' captivity in Babylon, and their return from that place to Jerusalem. Search and see if we are not right in this matter.

Would not the Editor of the Voice be better employed to keep to the work for which he has fitted himself—the agitation of time? The interpretation of the Scriptures seems not to be his forte. Every man to his business, say we. He will have enough to do between this and 1868 without meddling with things beyond his reach. He is about the last person that we should select as a teacher of truth. He fought the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked as long as possible; and after other men had taken the hard knocks that always fall upon pioneers in a good work, he wheeled into line. It would have been useless to start a new Advent paper in the West, unless he espoused the heresy. And there were some unsophisticated onlookers to clap their hands, and thank God that Br. Himes had got hold of the truth at last. As for the doctrine of No Life out of Christ—which he had already acknowledged as the legitimate conclusion of the mortality of the whole man, previous to his espousal of the latter,—he could make good capital in opposing that until the halcyon moment of its safe propagation should arrive. Verily, you shall have your reward.

The restoration of Israel is another doctrine that crosses the grain of the single-eyed Editor of the Voice. How could any one be so short-sighted as to ask him whether he believed in such a thing? And then to ask his views of Scripture prophecy? But then he gives "direct answers." And not only so, but "thus saith the Lord." Yes, and he appeals "to the law and the testimony." And after quoting Jer. xxix. 10, 14, he says with all the assurance imaginable—"Search and see if we are not right in this matter." Surely truth might be expected after such assured language. But let us "search and see."

It is said that "the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and others, in predicting the "return," refer to the return from Babylon which was consummated at the end of the seventy years captivity in Babylon. That is, there are no predictions of any other return of literal Israel in Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel. One simple fact will be a sufficient answer to this. The language in Jeremiah xxix. 10, 14 refers only to the Jews and not to the ten tribes. It is addressed by "the God of hosts, unto all that are carried away captives, whom I have caused to be carried away from Jerusalem unto Babylon." This captivity took place more than a hundred years after Tiglath-Pileser and Shalmaneser, Kings of Assyria carried the ten tribes "into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." 2 Kings xv. 29, xvii. 6–23. Now the return mostly dwelt upon by all the prophets embraced the ten tribes as well as the Jews. But the ten tribes did not return at the time of the restoration of the Jews to Babylon. The prophecy quoted by the Voice says not a word of that great and main body of Jacob's posterity that were taken captive by Assyria. As the prophets, predict the return of the children of Judah with the children of Israel or the ten tribes, it necessarily follows that there is "a future return of the Jews." See Jer. xxvii. 5–8. xxxi. 27–37. xxxiii. 14–26. Ezek. xxxvii. 15–29.

The Voice further says:

"In this return all the promises made to the Jews were fulfilled. They were restored to their own land, Jerusalem was rebuilt, and also the Temple, and the sacrifices were restored. See the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

"Now these promises cannot be applied to another restoration of the Jews and Jerusalem, When God fulfills his word once, we ought to be satisfied."

Because God once restored the Jews it is thought that he will not restore them again. Such logic will do for the Voice, but not for us. In Isa. xi. the instalment of King Jesus is predicted, and at that time "the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people." See the whole chapter. Our interpreter responds to the remaining questions thus:

"II. Will you give your views of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel. Has that prophecy been fulfilled? if so. when? If not, when will it be?

"These chapters are connected with the remaining chapters of the book, and relate to the things which concern the restoration from Babylon, at the end of the seventy years captivity, if they would comply with the conditions (ch. 43: 6–11). But this they did not do; and so the glory and prosperity promised was not revealed in their return."

The talk about the connection of chapters is fallacious. The prophecy referred to–ch. xliii. 6–11–is entirely distinct from the prophecy in chs. xxxviii. xxxix. There is not a single condition expressed in the latter chapters. It is a plain, direct, tremendous prediction of God's judgments on his enemies and the enemies of his people when the latter "shall dwell safely" in their own land. So that the questions are not answered. Perhaps the questioner will doubt the propriety of listening to a teacher who by a few strokes of his pen crosses out the express word of Yahveh. J. T. C.

Letters and Extracts.

From Thos. W. Smith.

Alden, Hardin Co., Iowa, April 16, 1865.

Br Storrs:—The Herald of Life is more than usually full of good things, "gems" of thought, cheering epistles, &c., &c. It does me good to read its instructive pages, replete with rich food for the mind.

I feel grateful to the many dear friends who take such an interest in my welfare, and aid so cheerfully and nobly in spreading the truth in the great West. I say, aid in spreading the truth; for, certainly, in providing me means of traveling, the light of life will be heralded where it would not, had I not those means. You and others speak of assisting me to obtain a wagon; permit me to suggest that instead, (if there are any desirous) that the balance due on the horse be raised by the "Horse Stock Co." I could not obtain a suitable and profitable animal for less than $140. Good horses range from $140 to $200. I have bought one for $140, and I will owe $40 still after the $100 is raised. This I intended to pay in instalments, as I should obtain it for my labors in the gospel field, or by manual labor.

I propose, therefore, that those who desire, take "stock" to meet the $40 which is still due on the horse. I suggest this not to burden the brethren, but because some may desire to have part in the horse enterprize who may not get opportunity to assist in that matter, and because I want the horse to be owned exclusively by the Herald of Life. I will see about paying for the wagon. I will not use a dollar for the horse except what is given by believers in "No life out of Christ," if I can help it. I realize the obligations imposed on me by this action on their part, and I am determined, by the grace of God, the great truth of life only in and through Christ shall be fully, freely, and fearlessly proclaimed through the West, as far as I can go; and I intend to go constantly. I expect to visit Kansas this summer, and go to the assistance of Br. Baker and others.

To give the readers of the Herald an insight into my work, and the distance sometimes to be travelled, I give my appointments a month ahead. Saturday and Sunday next, (April 22, 23), Goldfield, about 40 miles, and take me something over a day to go. April 27 to 29 Pritchard Grove, 30 miles. Friday before 1st Sunday in May and over Sunday, South Fork, 10 miles; 2d Sunday, Point Pleasant, 15 miles. The 1st and last places I have never yet visited. The 3d, only once. I have no time to attend to any steady secular work. I must labor in the vineyard of the Lord. My wants are all supplied. I do not fear starvation. I have learned long ago to "trust God for things of this life." I do not fear to work with my hands, as plenty here and elsewhere can testify; but I must preach. I am constrained to preach; for it is a pleasure to do my work at all times in this country.

I trust I may not have occasion to write of myself so much again, except to give the readers of the Herald,—especially the "Horse Stock Co.,"—an account of the missionary labor that I may be enabled to perform, as a brief mention of the work and its results seems to be due them.

"It is more blessed to give than to receive;" and I know I feel happy as the recipient of their kindness. But while assisting in this direction, do not forget the wants of others. Br. Lewis, who does not want a horse, should be kept well supplied with books, tracts, &c. The Freed-men must not be neglected; and what an immense field opens for earnest, faithful labor there. Millions of unsophisticated souls, unlearned in the mysticism of theology as well as the teachings of the common schools, present themselves as dying for want of light and the "bread of life." It wont do to wait till they are spoiled by vain philosophy. I should enjoy that work, but my field is here

Note by the Editor.—We have already sent Br. Smith $103 25 towards the purchase of the "Missionary Horse;" and we think the "Horse Stock Co." will, in a few weeks, make up the remaining sum ($37) so that the horse shall be fully paid for by the believers of "No life out of Christ." If one person cannot take share, ($1), let three or four unite and do it; so shall the "widow's mite" help to carry the truth into new places.

OTTO, ILLS., Apr. 25, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—Truth is triumphing. We feel that God is on our side. We are breaking up new ground here in old Fulton Co. Though we find some hard soil, by reason of the sectarian roots and shrubbery of long growth, yet when the gospel plough is put in, all seems to give way, so that dying and going to heaven or hell, and the resurrection of the wicked dead to be judged and killed a second time, looks quite inconsistent with the character of the God of love; and free, intelligent minds have said, the Bible is altogether a new book to them, and lovely, and that the truth will save as many as will develop a character in harmony with God's plan. If they do not, he lets them return to the dust, having no use for them in the new earth. We do not wonder David praised the Lord when he saw that the end of the wicked was destruction; never to see light. Bless the Lord, O my soul, myself. Amen and amen.

An Appeal.

TO THE LOVERS OF LIFE ONLY THROUGH CHRIST: Dear Brethren:—The time has come that calls loudly for an extra effort in the West, and we feel deeply on the subject. We have prayed, wept, and longed to see the time when some brother would come to our help, and we think we shall soon realize our hope. We stand greatly in need of a Tent. Can you help us in the East? We will do all we can here. Let us hear from all who can help, and are willing to do so. Send what you may have to give to this object to Br. Geo. Storrs, New York; or Jesse Benson, Duncan's Mills, Fulton Co. Ills. The Tent will be the property of the Life Union in the West, but not confined to any one locality. Send in your pledges, so that by the first of June we can have a meeting.

J. LEWIS, in behalf of the Brethren.

P. S. We stand pledged for $100.

Jesse Benson	$20 00
Jonathan Hendee	10 00
Charles Brown	10 00
Nathan Tefft	5 00
John Trapp	5 00

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We are glad to see a move in Illinois; and hope a meeting in Tent or Grove will soon be held there as the beginning of a series of meetings on the life theme. How much help do the West want towards the Tent? Get meetings started as early in June as may be; and if no one else can be found to go to attend them, the Editor will go himself for one month, if the Lord permit. The West must be helped; and the funds will come from the Lord's Treasury, so far as they are necessary; but we doubt if Grove-meetings will not be preferable to Tent-meetings; but let the friends in the West be the judges in that matter. Go on in the name of the Lord and his truth and the labor shall not be in vain.

The Offering.

———, April 10, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—Enclosed you will find a pair of ear-rings; the avails to be applied on the Horse and wagon for Br. Smith. It is the best I can do at present. In doing this, I make the greatest sacrifice I ever made for my Master, as far as money matters are concerned. Not for their intrinsic value; not that I longer desire them as an ornament, for it has been many years since I have worn them to adorn my person. But I value them highly as the gift of a dear departed friend.

If the "shares" should all be taken in the Horse and wagon, you will please drop them in the "Knocker's Fund."

How much I desire to be with you this evening to commemorate the Passover Feast. But as that is impossible, I shall do as we did on the last anniversary, partake of it under our own roof. Last year there were four of us met; we had an interesting and solemn time.

While I am writing, the cannons are firing and bells ringing as demonstration of joy at the surrender of Gen. Lee. I pray God that the last one may have fallen in battle; that peace may once more be restored to our distracted country. But, alas! how many households, like our own, have been made desolate during the past four years. I thank God it has not been in vain. No, no; the fetters are broken and the captive goes free. May He who holds the keys of death, soon come, unlock the prison house of the dead and raise the sleeping ones to immortality and Eternal Life, is my sincere prayer.

Yours, in hope of eternal life through Jesus Christ our LIFE-GIVER.

From Jabez Adams.

ITALIA, Lyon Co., Kansas, April 9th, 1865.

MR. EDITOR:—Having been, after serious deliberation and an impartial view of your doctrine, convinced of the undeniable teachings of the Scriptures, I have finally become a full believer of your views, from the fact that your doctrine has a scriptural foundation which is impregnable; it is in concert from the beginning to the end of the bible; it extirpates all that complexity which has been supposed to exist in the bible, and brings the scriptures to a pure, beautiful and easy understanding.

Your writings were first introduced to me by D. H. Baker. He insisted on my perusing some of the writings from your office; but I thought they would prove to be a mere abstract "get up;" a repetition of sentences for no other purpose than capital; or avarice; and, it was not until repeated efforts by friend B., that turned my attention to that channel; that I gathered convincing information from that source, although I did read.

After I became interested in what I read, I began to find that complex and double demonstrative problem, which had been pressed for my approval, and said to be (but merely because popularized) the teachings of the bible, thoroughly analyzed.

By request of my friend B., I have read, with an impartial deliberation, some of your pamphlets; among which are "Man's Destiny"—"Life from the Dead," and several others. By their perusal I have gained valuable and lasting information. I have been brought to an understanding of what had hitherto seemed obscure.

I am now convinced that, after we yield our present earthly existence, it is death everlasting, (the wages of sin) or life everlasting: the emphatical promise. I wish to be considered a member of the "Life and Advent Union." May God help you expand the truth

LUCRETIA B. LAMB, Ironton, Ohio, writes:—I have of late been entirely occupied in nursing the sick, and have had no time to write. I would inquire what the Lord would have me to do, and how I may honor his name. I am in a place where, so far as I know, there is not one who would sympathise with me in the life theme and its kindred doctrines; all seem to feel, like the Athenians, that I bring strange things to their ears. I pray that I may scatter light and not darkness. Great revivals, as they are termed, have been in progress here this winter, and large accessions to the churches. I hear constant exhortation, to "Shun the death that never dies." I often think, O, would that they could see it as it looks to me; they would have the counter part to this, and offer a "life that never lives." May the recent converts prove to be the fruits of the Spirit, that will endure unto the end. Yours in hope of eternal life when Jesus comes.

E. D. HUTCHINSON, Corinna Centre, Me., writes:—I send $2 to renew my subscription. I cannot do without the Herald of Life; it is the best religious paper that I know of. Its cheering messages from week to week are like water to a thirsty soul. And, then, the doctrine it advocates, of no life out of Christ, is cheering news to those that are in Christ, because it shows the goodness and mercy of God to a rebellious and wicked world, in that He will let the wicked remain among the dead. It seems to me, the bible teaches this very plainly, so that no one need be mistaken; if God's word declares that the wicked "shall remain in the congregation of the dead," I think it is best to believe it, and strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many will seek to enter in and shall not be able when once the Master of the house is risen up and shut the door. It is best to be ready before that event occurs.

THOMAS WILKINS, Dorchester, Mass., writes:—Please find $3 inclosed for the Herald of Life. The Herald is a welcome visitor, coming weekly laden with great and glorious truths. My prayer is, that you may be sustained and comforted in your labors by seeing many embrace the truth.

A. R. SMILEY, Skowhegan, Me., writes:—I inclose you $2 to renew my subscription for your valuable paper. I became a subscriber for the Herald of Life at the Exeter (Me.) Campmeeting, paying only $1 for six months, which term has expired. We all prize the paper very highly and feel that we cannot be deprived of it, it being the only Preacher we have. Yours in love, hoping for life through our blessed SAVIOUR.

D. EDSON SMITH, Vesper, N. Y., writes:—Inclosed find $10. Apply $2 on my subscription; send me a few tracts on the "Doom of the Ungodly," and apply the balance as you see proper. It is a thank offering to the Lord The Lord has greatly blessed me the past few weeks in temporal matters. I long for a way to open for me to labor among the Freedmen.

A. BOYNTON, West Batavia, N. Y., writes:—I love the doctrine of "No life out of Christ:" in fact their is nothing but love in it; whereas the other view has an ingredient in it which does not agree with the holiest affections of the good. The thought that the wicked dead will all live again is a horrid one. If it be true, did not the Saviour's death increase their misery, and increase the penalty of the law two-fold? Many err, I think, in applying the threatenings, found in the gospel, to the dead instead of to those who are alive at the coming and kingdom of Christ. May love ever be the ruling element of your paper, that the unbeliever may be rebuked and the mouth of opposers be stopped.

Life Believers in New York.

Life only in Christ, is the grandest and most glorious truth ever brought to the ears of mortal man. The friends of this heavenly message, in New York and vicinity, have engaged DODWORTH HALL, 806 Broadway, for meetings on the "first day of the week," for the year to come. Preaching morning and evening, uniformly, every Lord's day, at the usual hours of public services. Seats free.

JOSEPH T. CURRY is expected to preach there each Lord's day during the month of May.

An Important Document,

We reproduce from a city journal the late oration of Hon. GEORGE BANCROFT, April 25th, the day of the deceased President's transit through New York toward his resting-place in his own Illinois. Nothing perhaps can better characterize Mr. Bancroft's words than to say that they were worthy of the occasion and of the author.

THE ORATION.

Our grief and horror at the crime which has clothed the Continent in mourning, find no adequate expression in words and no relief in tears. The President of the United States of America has fallen by the hands of an assassin. Neither the office with which he was invested by the approved choice of a mighty people, nor the most simple-hearted kindliness of nature, could save him from the fiendish passions of relentless fanaticism. The wailings of the millions attend his remains as they are borne in solemn procession over our great rivers, along the seaside, beyond the mountains, across the prairie, to their final resting place in the valley of the Mississippi. The echoes of his funeral knell vibrate through the world, and the friends of freedom of every tongue and in every climate are his mourners. Too few days have passed away since Abraham Lincoln stood in the flush of vigorous manhood to permit any attempt at an analysis of his character or an exposition of his career. We find it hard to believe that his large eyes, which in their softness and beauty expressed nothing but benevolence and gentleness, are closed in death; we almost look for the pleasant smile that brought out more vividly the earnest cast of his features, which were serious even to sadness.

A few years ago he was a village attorney, engaged in the support of a rising family, unknown to fame, scarcely named beyond his neighborhood; his administration made him the most conspicuous man in his country, and drew on him first the astonished gaze, and then the respect and admiration of the world. Those who come after us will decide how much of the wonderful results of his public career is due to his own good common sense, his shrewd sagacity, readiness of wit, quick interpretation of the public mind, his rare combination of fixedness and pliancy, his steady tendency of purpose; how much to the American people, who, as he walked with them side by side, inspired him with their own wisdom and energy; and how much to the overruling laws of the moral world, by which the selfishness of evil is made to defeat itself. But after every allowance, it will remain that members of the Government which preceded his administration opened the gates to treason, and he closed them; that when he went to Washington the ground on which he trod shook under his feet, and he left the Republic on a solid foundation; that traitors had seized public forts and arsenals, and he recovered them for the United States, to whom they belonged; that the capital, which he found the abode of slaves, is now the home only of the free; that the boundless public domain which was grasped at, and, in a great measure, held for the diffusion of Slavery, is now irrevocably devoted to freedom; that then men talked a jargon of a balance of power in a Republic between Slave States and Free States, and now the foolish words are blown away forever by the breath of Maryland, Missouri and Tennessee; that a terrible cloud of political heresy rose from the abyss threatening to hide the light of the sun, and under its darkness a rebellion was rising into indefinable proportions; now the atmosphere is purer than ever before, and the insurrection is vanishing away; the country is cast into another mold, and the gigantic system of wrong, which had been the work of more than two centuries, is dashed down, we hope forever.

And as to himself personally; he was scoffed at by the proud as unfit for his station, and now against the usage of later years, and in spite of numerous competitors he was the unbiased and the undoubted choice of the American people for a second term of service. Through all the mad business of treason he retained the sweetness of a most placable disposition; and the slaughter of myriads of the best on the battle-field and the more terrible destruction of our men in captivity by the slow torture of exposure and starvation, had never been able to provoke him into harboring one vengeful feeling or one purpose of cruelty.

How shall the nation most completely show its sorrow at Mr. Lincoln's death? How shall it best honor his memory? There can be but one answer. He was struck down when he was highest in its service, and in strict conformity with duty was engaged in carrying out principles affecting its life, its good name, and its relations to the cause of freedom and the progress of mankind. Grief must take the character of action, and breathe itself forth in the assertion of the policy to which he fell a sacrifice. The standard which he held in his hand must be uplifted again, higher and more firmly than before, and must be carried on to triumph. Above everything else, his proclamation of the first day of January, 1863, declaring throughout the parts of the country in rebellion the freedom of all persons who have been held as slaves, must be affirmed and maintained. Events, as they rolled onward, have removed every doubt of the legality and binding force of that proclamation. The country and the Rebel Government have each laid claim to the public service of the slave, and yet but one of the two can have a rightful claim to such service. That rightful claim belongs to the United States, because every one born on their soil, with the few exceptions of the children of travelers and transient residents, owes them a primary allegiance. Every one so born has been counted among those represented in Congress; every slave has ever been represented in Congress—imperfectly and wrongly it wrongly it may—but still has been counted and represented. The slave born on our soil owed allegiance to the general government. It may in time past have been a qualified allegiance, manifested through his master, as the allegiance of a ward through its guardian or of an infant through its parent. But when the master became false to his allegiance, the slave stood face to face with his country, and his allegiance, which may before have been a qualified one, became direct and immediate. His chains fell off, and he stood at once in the presence of the nation, bound like the rest of us to its public defense.

Mr. Lincoln's proclamation did but take notice of the already existing right of the bondman to freedom. The treason of the master made it a public crime for the slave to contiue his obedience; the treason of a state set free the collective bondmen of that State. This doctrine is supported by the analogy of precedents. In the times of feudalism the treason of the lord of the manor deprived him of his serfs; the spurious feudalism that existed among us differs in many respects from the feudalism of the middle ages; but so far the precedent runs parallel with the present case; for treason the master then, for treason the master now, loses his slaves. In the middle ages the sovereign appointed another lord over the serfs and the land which they cultivated; in our day, the sovereign makes them masters of their own persons, lords over themselves.

It has been said that we are at war, and that emancipation is not a belligerent right. The objection disappears before analysis. In a war between independent powers the invading foreigner invites to his standard all who will give him aid, whether bond or free, and he rewards them according to his ability and his pleasure with gifts or freedom; but when at peace he withdraws from the invaded country he must take his aiders and comforters with him; or if he leaves them behind, where be has no court to enforce his decrees, he can give them no security, unless it be by stipulations of a treaty. In a civil war it is altogether different. There, when rebellion is crushed, the Government is restored, and its Courts resume their jurisdiction.

So it is with us; the United States have Courts of their own, that must punish the guilt of treason and vindicate the freedom of persons whom the fact of Rebellion has set free. Nor may it be said that, because Slavery existed in most of the States when the Union was formed, it cannot rightfully be interfered with now. A change has taken place, such as Madison, foresaw, and for which he pointed out the remedy. The Constitutions of States had been transformed before the plotters of treason carried them away into Rebellion. When the Federal Constitution was formed, general emancipation was thought to be near; and everywhere the respective Legislatures had authority, in the exercise of their ordinary functions, to do away with Slavery; since that time the attempt has been made in what are called slave States to make the condition of Slavery perpetual; and events have proved with the clearness of demonstration, that a constitution which seeks to continue a caste of hereditary bondmen through endless generations is inconsistent with the existence of Republican institutions. So, then, the new President and the people of the United States must insist that the proclamation of freemen shall stand as a reality.

And, moreover, the people must never cease to insist that the Constitution shall be so amended as utterly to prohibit Slavery on any part of our soil for evermore. Alas! that a State in our vicinity should withhold its assent to this last beneficent measure; its refusal was an encouragement to our enemies equal to the gain of a pitched battle; and delays the only hopeful method of pacification. The removal of the cause of the Rebellion is not only demanded by justice; it is the policy of mercy, making room for a wider clemency; it is the part of order against a chaos of controversy; its success brings with it true reconcilement, a lasting peace, a continuous growth of confidence through an assimilation of the social condition.

Here is the fitting expression of the mourning of to-day. And let no lover of his country say that this warning is uncalled for. The cry is delusive that Slavery is dead. Even now it is nerving itself for a fresh struggle for continuance. The last winds from the South waft to us the sad intelligence that a man, who had surrounded himself with the glory of the most brilliant and most varied achievements, who but a week ago was named with affectionate pride among the greatest benefactors of his country and the ablest generals of all time, has usurped more than the whole power of the Executive, and under the name of peace has revived Slavery and given security and political power to traitors from the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande. Why could he not remember the dying advice of Washington, never to draw the sword but for self-defense or the rights of his country, and when drawn, never to sheath it till its work should be accomplished? And yet from this bad act which the people with one united voice condemn, no great evil will follow save the shadow on his own fame. The individual, even in the greatness of military glory, sinks into insignificance before the resistless movements in the history of man.

No one can turn back or stay the march of Providence. No sentiment of despair may mix with sorrow. We owe it to the memory of the dead, we owe it to the cause of popular liberty throughout the world, that the sudden crime which has taken the life of the President of the United States shall not produce the least impediment in the smooth course of public affairs. This great city, in the midst of unexampled emblems of deeply-seated grief, has sustained itself with composure and magnanimity. It has nobly done its part in guarding against the derangement of business or the slightest shock to public credit. The enemies of Republic put it to the severest trial; but the voice of faction has not been heard, doubt and despondency have been unknown. In serene majesty the country rises in the beauty and strength and hope of youth, and proves to the world the quiet energy and the durability of institutions growing out of the reason and affections of the people. Heaven has willed it that the United States shall live. The nations of the earth cannot spare them. All the wornout aristocracies of Europe saw in the spurious feudalism of slaveholding their strongest outpost, and banded themselves together with the deadly enemies of our national life.

If the Old World will discuss the respective advantages of oligarchy or equality; of the union of Church and State, or the rightful freedom of religion; of land accessible to the many, or of land monopolized by an ever-decreasing number number of the few, the United States must live to control the decision by their quiet and unobtrusive example. It has often and truly been observed that the trust and affection of the masses gather naturally around an individual. If the inquiry is made whether the man so trusted and beloved shall elicit from the reason of the people enduring institutions of their own, or shall sequester political power for a superintending dynasty, the United States must live to solve the problem. If a question is raised on the respective merits of Timoleon or Julius Cæsar, of Washington or Napoleon, the United States must be there to call to mind that there were twelve Cæsars, most of them the opprobrium of the human race, and to contrast with them the line of American Presidents. The duty of the hour is incomplete, our mourning is insincere if, while we express unwavering trust in the great principles that underlie our government, we do not also give our support to the man to whom the people have entrusted its administration.

Andrew Johnson is now, by the constitution, the President of the United States, and he stands before the world as the most conspicuous representative of the industrial classes. Left an orphan at four years old, poverty and toil were his steps to honor. His youth was not passed in the halls of colleges; nevertheless he has received a thorough political education in statesmanship in the school of the people and by long experience of public life. A village funtionary; member successively of each branch of the Tennessee legislature, hearing with a thrill of joy, the words, "the Union, it must be preserved;" a representative in Congress for successive years; Governor of the great State of Tennessee, approved as its Governor by re-election; he was at the opening of the Rebellion a Senator from that State in Congress. Then at the Capital, when Senators, unrebuked by the Government, sent word by telegram to seize forts and arsenals, he alone from that Southern region told them what the Government did not dare to tell them, that they were traitors, and deserved the punishment of treason.

Undismayed by a perpetual purpose of public enemies to take his life, bearing up against the still greater trial of the persecution o his wife and children, in due time he went back to his State, determined to restore it to Union, or die with the American flag for his winding sheet. And now, at the call of the United States, he has returned to Washington as a conqueror, with Tennessee as a free State for his trophy. It remains for him to consummate the vindication of the Union. To that Union Abraham Lincoln has fallen a martyr. His death, which was meant to sever it beyond repair, binds it more closely and more firmly than ever. The blow aimed him, was aimed not at the native of Kentucky, not at the citizen of Illinois, but at the man who, as President, in the executive branch of the government, stood as the representative of every man in the United States The object of the crime was the life of the whole people; and it wounds the affections of the whole people. From Maine to the southwest boundary of the Pacific, it makes us one.

The country may have needed an imperishable grief to touch its inmost feeling. The grave that receives the remains of Lincoln, receives the martyr to the Union; the monument which will rise over his body will bear witness to the Union; his enduring memory will assist during the countless ages to bind the states together, and to incite to the love of our one undivided, indivisible country. Peace to the ashes of our departed friend, the friend of his country and his race. Happy was his life, for he was the restorer of the republic; he was happy in his death, for the manner of his end will plead forever for the Union of the States and the freedom of man.

It is a truism, but one often practically forgotten, that there is no medium between truth and falsehood.—Whately.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known, talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with out regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 800 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

Otto, Ills., Apr. 25, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—Truth is triumphing. We feel that God is on our side. We are breaking up new ground here in old Fulton Co. Though we find some hard soil, by reason of the sectarian roots and shrubbery of long growth, yet when the gospel plough is put in, all seems to give way, so that dying and going to heaven or hell, and the resurrection of the wicked dead to be judged and killed a second time, looks quite inconsistent with the character of the God of love; and free, intelligent minds have said, the Bible is altogether a new book to them, and lovely, and that the truth will save as many as will develop a character in harmony with God's plan. If they do not, he lets them return to the dust, having no use for them in the new earth. We do not wonder David praised the Lord when he saw that the end of the wicked was destruction; never to see light. Bless the Lord, O my soul, myself. Amen and amen.

An Appeal.

To the Lovers of Life only through Christ: Dear Brethren:—The time has come that calls loudly for an extra effort in the West, and we feel deeply on the subject. We have prayed, wept, and longed to see the time when some brother would come to our help, and we think we shall soon realize our hope. We stand greatly in need of a Tent. Can you help us in the East? We will do all we can here. Let us hear from all who can help, and are willing to do so. Send what you may have to give to this object to Br. Geo. Storrs, New York; or Jesse Benson, Duncan's Mills, Fulton Co. Ills. The Tent will be the property of the Life Union in the West, but not confined to any one locality. Send in your pledges, so that by the first of June we can have a meeting.

J. Lewis, in behalf of the Brethren.

P. S. We stand pledged for $100.

Jesse Benson	$20 00
Jonathan Hendee	10 00
Charles Brown	10 00
Nathan Tefft	5 00
John Trapp	5 00

Note by the Editor.—We are glad to see a move in Illinois; and hope a meeting in Tent or Grove will soon be held there as the beginning of a series of meetings on the life theme. How much help do the West want towards the Tent? Get meetings started as early in June as may be; and if no one else can be found to go to attend them, the Editor will go himself for one month, if the Lord permit. The West must be helped; and the funds will come from the Lord's Treasury, so far as they are necessary; but we doubt if Grove-meetings will not be preferable to Tent-meetings; but let the friends in the West be the judges in that matter. Go on in the name of the Lord and his truth and the labor shall not be in vain.

The Offering.

———, April 10, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—Enclosed you will find a pair of ear-rings; the avails to be applied on the Horse and wagon for Br. Smith. It is the best I can do at present. In doing this, I make the greatest sacrifice I ever made for my Master, as far as money matters are concerned. Not for their intrinsic value; not that I longer desire them as an ornament, for it has been many years since I have worn them to adorn my person. But I value them highly as the gift of a dear departed friend.

If the "shares" should all be taken in the Horse and wagon, you will please drop them in the "Knocker's Fund."

How much I desire to be with you this evening to commemorate the Passover Feast. But as that is impossible, I shall do as we did on the last anniversary, partake of it under our own roof. Last year there were four of us met; we had an interesting and solemn time.

While I am writing, the cannons are firing and bells ringing as demonstration of joy at the surrender of Gen. Lee. I pray God that the last one may have fallen in battle; that peace may once more be restored to our distracted country. But, alas! how many households, like our own, have been made desolate during the past four years. I thank God it has not been in vain. No, no; the fetters are broken and the captive goes free. May He who holds the keys of death, soon come, unlock the prison-house of the dead and raise the sleeping ones to immortality and Eternal Life, is my sincere prayer.

Yours, in hope of eternal life through Jesus Christ our Life-giver.

From Jabez Adams.

Itatia, Lyon Co., Kansas,
April 9th, 1865.

Mr. Editor:—Having been, after serious deliberation and an impartial view of your doctrine, convinced of the undeniable teachings of the Scriptures, I have finally become a full believer of your views, from the fact that your doctrine has a scriptural foundation which is impregnable; it is in concert from the beginning to the end of the bible; it extirpates all that complexity which has been supposed to exist in the bible, and brings the scriptures to a pure, beautiful and easy understanding.

Your writings were first introduced to me by D. H. Baker. He insisted on my perusing some of the writings from your office; but I thought they would prove to be a mere abstract "get up;" a repetition of sentences for no other purpose than capital; or avarice; and, it was not until repeated efforts by friend B., that turned my attention to that channel; that I gathered convincing information from that source, although I did read.

After I became interested in what I read, I began to find that complex and double demonstrative problem, which had been pressed for my approval, and said to be (but merely because popularized) the teachings of the bible, thoroughly analyzed.

By request of my friend B., I have read, with an impartial deliberation, some of your pamphlets; among which are "Man's Destiny"—"Life from the Dead," and several others. By their perusal I have gained valuable and lasting information. I have been brought to an understanding of what had hitherto seemed obscure.

I am now convinced that, after we yield our present earthly existence, it is death everlasting, (the wages of sin) or life everlasting: the emphatical promise. I wish to be considered a member of the "Life and Advent Union." May God help you expand the truth

Lucretia B. Lamb, Ironton, Ohio, writes:—I have of late been entirely occupied in nursing the sick, and have had no time to write. I would inquire what the Lord would have me to do, and how I may honor his name. I am in a place where, so far as I know, there is not one who would sympathise with me in the life theme and its kindred doctrines; all seem to feel, like the Athenians, that I bring strange things to their ears. I pray that I may scatter light and not darkness. Great revivals, as they are termed, have been in progress here this winter, and large accessions to the churches. I hear constant exhortation, to "Shun the death that never dies." I often think, O, would that they could see it as it looks to me; they would have the counter part to this, and offer a "life that never lives." May the recent converts prove to be the fruits of the Spirit, that will endure unto the end. Yours in hope of eternal life when Jesus comes.

E. D. Hutchinson, Corinna Centre, Me., writes:—I send $2 to renew my subscription. I cannot do without the Herald of Life; it is the best religious paper that I know of. Its cheering messages from week to week are like water to a thirsty soul. And, then, the doctrine it advocates, of no life out of Christ, is cheering news to those that are in Christ, because it shows the goodness and mercy of God to a rebellious and wicked world, in that He will let the wicked remain among the dead. It seems to me, the bible teaches this very plainly, so that no one need be mistaken; if God's word declares that the wicked "shall remain in the congregation of the dead," I think it is best to believe it, and strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many will seek to enter in and shall not be able when once the Master of the house is risen up and shut the door. It is best to be ready before that event occurs.

Thomas Wilkins, Dorchester, Mass., writes:—Please find $3 inclosed for the Herald of Life. The Herald is a welcome visitor, coming weekly laden with great and glorious truths. My prayer is, that you may be sustained and comforted in your labors by seeing many embrace the truth.

A. R. Smiley, Skowhegan, Me., writes:—I inclose you $2 to renew my subscription for your valuable paper. I became a subscriber for the Herald of Life at the Exeter (Me.) Campmeeting, paying only $1 for six months, which term has expired. We all prize the paper very highly and feel that we cannot be deprived of it, it being the only Preacher we have. Yours in love, hoping for life through our blessed Saviour.

D. Edson Smith, Vesper, N. Y., writes:—Inclosed find $10. Apply $2 on my subscription; send me a few tracts on the "Doom of the Ungodly," and apply the balance as you see proper. It is a thank offering to the Lord The Lord has greatly blessed me the past few weeks in temporal matters. I long for a way to open for me to labor among the Freedmen.

A. Boynton, West Batavia, N. Y., writes:—I love the doctrine of "No life out of Christ:" in fact their is nothing but love in it; whereas the other view has an ingredient in it which does not agree with the holiest affections of the good. The thought that the wicked dead will all live again is a horrid one. If it be true, did not the Saviour's death increase their misery, and increase the penalty of the law two-fold? Many err, I think, in applying the threatenings, found in the gospel, to the dead instead of to those who are alive at the coming and kingdom of Christ. May love ever be the ruling element of your paper, that the unbeliever may be rebuked and the mouth of opposers be stopped.

Life Believers in New York.

Life only in Christ, is the grandest and most glorious truth ever brought to the ears of mortal man. The friends of this heavenly message, in New York and vicinity, have engaged Dodworth Hall, 806 Broadway, for meetings on the "first day of the week," for the year to come. Preaching morning and evening, uniformly, every Lord's day, at the usual hours of public services. Seats free.

Joseph T. Curry is expected to preach there each Lord's day during the month of May.

An Important Document.

We reproduce from a city journal the late oration of Hon. George Bancroft, April 25th, the day of the deceased President's transit through New York toward his resting-place in his own Illinois. Nothing perhaps can better characterize Mr. Bancroft's words than to say that they were worthy of the occasion and of the author.

THE ORATION.

Our grief and horror at the crime which has clothed the Continent in mourning, find no adequate expression in words and no relief in tears. The President of the United States of America has fallen by the hands of an assassin. Neither the office with which he was invested by the approved choice of a mighty people, nor the most simple-hearted kindliness of nature, could save him from the fiendish passions of relentless fanaticism. The wailings of the millions attend his remains as they are borne in solemn procession over our great rivers, along the seaside, beyond the mountains, across the prairie, to their final resting place in the valley of the Mississippi. The echoes of his funeral knell vibrate through the world, and the friends of freedom of every tongue and in every climate are his mourners. Too few days have passed away since Abraham Lincoln stood in the flush of vigorous manhood to permit any attempt at an analysis of his character or an exposition of his career. We find it hard to believe that his large eyes, which in their softness and beauty expressed nothing but benevolence and gentleness, are closed in death; we almost look for the pleasant smile that brought out more vividly the earnest cast of his features, which were serious even to sadness.

A few years ago he was a village attorney, engaged in the support of a rising family, unknown to fame, scarcely named beyond his neighborhood; his administration made him the most conspicuous man in his country, and drew on him first the astonished gaze, and then the respect and admiration of the world. Those who come after us will decide how much of the wonderful results of his public career is due to his own good common sense, his shrewd sagacity, readiness of wit, quick interpretation of the public mind, his rare combination of fixedness and pliancy, his steady tendency of purpose; how much to the American people, who, as he walked with them side by side, inspired him with their own wisdom and energy; and how much to the overruling laws of the moral world, by which the selfishness of evil is made to defeat itself. But after every allowance, it will remain that members of the Government which preceded his administration opened the gates to treason, and he closed them; that when he went to Washington the ground on which he trod shook under his feet, and he left the Republic on a solid foundation; that traitors had seized public forts and arsenals, and he recovered them for the United States, to whom they belonged; that the capital, which he found the abode of slaves, is now the home only of the free; that the boundless public domain which was grasped at, and, in a great measure, held for the diffusion of Slavery, is now irrevocably devoted to freedom; that then men talked a jargon of a balance of power in a Republic between Slave States and Free States, and now the foolish words are blown away forever by the breath of Maryland, Missouri and Tennessee; that a terrible cloud of political heresy rose from the abyss threatening to hide the light of the sun, and under its darkness a rebellion was rising into indefinable proportions; now the atmosphere is purer than ever before, and the insurrection is vanishing away; the country is cast into another mold, and the gigantic system of wrong, which had been the work of more than two centuries, is dashed down, we hope forever.

And as to himself personally; he was scoffed at by the proud as unfit for his station, and now against the usage of later years, and in spite of numerous competitors he was the unbiased and the undoubted choice of the American people for a second term of service. Through all the mad business of treason he retained the sweetness of a most placable disposition; and the slaughter of myriads of the best on the battle-field and the more terrible destruction of our men in captivity by the slow torture of exposure and starvation, had never been able to provoke him into harboring one vengeful feeling or one purpose of cruelty.

How shall the nation most completely show its sorrow at Mr. Lincoln's death? How shall it best honor his memory? There can be but one answer. He was struck down when he was highest in its service, and in strict conformity with duty was engaged in carrying out principles affecting its life, its good name, and its relations to the cause of freedom and the progress of mankind. Grief must take the character of action, and breathe itself forth in the assertion of the policy to which he fell a sacrifice. The standard which he held in his hand must be uplifted again, higher and more firmly than before, and must be carried on to triumph. Above everything else, his proclamation of the first day of January, 1863, declaring throughout the parts of the country in rebellion the freedom of all persons who have been held as slaves, must be affirmed and maintained. Events, as they rolled onward, have removed every doubt of the legality and binding force of that proclamation. The country and the Rebel Government have each laid claim to the public service of the slave, and yet but one of the two can have a rightful claim to such service. That rightful claim belongs to the United States, because every one born on their soil, with the few exceptions of the children of travelers and transient residents, owes them a primary allegiance. Every one so born has been counted among those represented in Congress; every slave has ever been represented in Congress—imperfectly and wrongly it wrongly it may—but still has been counted and represented. The slave born on our soil owed allegiance to the general government. It may in time past have been a qualified allegiance, manifested through his master, as the allegiance of a ward through its guardian or of an infant through its parent. But when the master became false to his allegiance, the slave stood face to face with his country, and his allegiance, which may before have been a qualified one, became direct and immediate. His chains fell off, and he stood at once in the presence of the nation, bound like the rest of us to its public defense.

Mr. Lincoln's proclamation did but take notice of the already existing right of the bondman to freedom. The treason of the master made it a public crime for the slave to contiue his obedience; the treason of a state set free the collective bondmen of that State. This doctrine is supported by the analogy of precedents. In the times of feudalism the treason of the lord of the manor deprived him of his serfs; the spurious feudalism that existed among us differs in many respects from the feudalism of the middle ages; but so far the precedent runs parallel with the present case; for treason the master then, for treason the master now, loses his slaves. In the middle ages the sovereign appointed another lord over the serfs and the land which they cultivated; in our day, the sovereign makes them masters of their own persons, lords over themselves.

It has been said that we are at war, and that emancipation is not a belligerent right. The objection disappears before analysis. In a war between independent powers the invading foreigner invites to his standard all who will give him aid, whether bond or free, and he rewards them according to his ability and his pleasure with gifts or freedom; but when at peace he withdraws from the invaded country he must take his aiders and comforters with him; or if he leaves them behind, where he has no court to enforce his decrees, he can give them no security, unless it be by stipulations of a treaty. In a civil war it is altogether different. There, when rebellion is crushed, the Government is restored, and its Courts resume their jurisdiction.

So it is with us; the United States have Courts of their own, that must punish the guilt of treason and vindicate the freedom of persons whom the fact of Rebellion has set free. Nor may it be said that, because Slavery existed in most of the States when the Union was formed, it cannot rightfully be interfered with now. A change has taken place, such as Madison, foresaw, and for which he pointed out the remedy. The Constitutions of States had been transformed before the plotters of treason carried them away into Rebellion. When the Federal Constitution was formed, general emancipation was thought to be near; and everywhere the respective Legislatures had authority, in the exercise of their ordinary functions, to do away with Slavery; since that time the attempt has been made in what are called slave States to make the condition of Slavery perpetual; and events have proved with the clearness of demonstration, that a constitution which seeks to continue a caste of hereditary bondmen through endless generations is inconsistent with the existence of Republican institutions. So, then, the new President and the people of the United States must insist that the proclamation of freemen shall stand as a reality.

And, moreover, the people must never cease to insist that the Constitution shall be so amended as utterly to prohibit Slavery on any part of our soil for evermore. Alas! that a State in our vicinity should withhold its assent to this last beneficent measure; its refusal was an encouragement to our enemies equal to the gain of a pitched battle; and delays the only hopeful method of pacification. The removal of the cause of the Rebellion is not only demanded by justice; it is the policy of mercy, making room for a wider clemency; it is the part of order against a chaos of controversy; its success brings with it true reconcilement, a lasting peace, a continuous growth of confidence through an assimilation of the social condition.

Here is the fitting expression of the mourning of to-day. And let no lover of his country say that this warning is uncalled for. The cry is delusive that Slavery is dead. Even now it is nerving itself for a fresh struggle for continuance. The last winds from the South waft to us the sad intelligence that a man, who had surrounded himself with the glory of the most brilliant and most varied achievements, who but a week ago was named with affectionate pride among the greatest benefactors of his country and the ablest generals of all time, has usurped more than the whole power of the Executive, and under the name of peace has revived Slavery and given security and political power to traitors from the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande. Why could he not remember the dying advice of Washington, never to draw the sword but for self-defense or the rights of his country, and when drawn, never to sheath it till its work should be accomplished? And yet from this bad act which the people with one united voice condemn, no great evil will follow save the shadow on his own fame. The individual, even in the greatness of military glory, sinks into insignificance before the resistless movements in the history of man.

No one can turn back or stay the march of Providence. No sentiment of despair may mix with sorrow. We owe it to the memory of the dead, we owe it to the cause of popular liberty throughout the world, that the sudden crime which has taken the life of the President of the United States shall not produce the least impediment in the smooth course of public affairs. This great city, in the midst of unexampled emblems of deeply-seated grief, has sustained itself with composure and magnanimity. It has nobly done its part in guarding against the derangement of business or the slightest shock to public credit. The enemies of Republic put it to the severest trial; but the voice of faction has not been heard, doubt and despondency have been unknown. In serene majesty the country rises in the beauty and strength and hope of youth, and proves to the world the quiet energy and the durability of institutions growing out of the reason and affections of the people. Heaven has willed it that the United States shall live. The nations of the earth cannot spare them. All the wornout aristocracies of Europe saw in the spurious feudalism of slaveholding their strongest outpost, and banded themselves together with the deadly enemies of our national life.

If the Old World will discuss the respective advantages of oligarchy or equality; of the union of Church and State, or the rightful freedom of religion; of land accessible to the many, or of land monopolized by an ever-decreasing number number of the few, the United States must live to control the decision by their quiet and unobtrusive example. It has often and truly been observed that the trust and affection of the masses gather naturally around an individual. If the inquiry is made whether the man so trusted and beloved shall elicit from the reason of the people enduring institutions of their own, or shall sequester political power for a superintending dynasty, the United States must live to solve the problem. If a question is raised on the respective merits of Timoleon or Julius Cæsar, of Washington or Napoleon, the United States must be there to call to mind that there were twelve Cæsars, most of them the opprobrium of the human race, and to contrast with them the line of American Presidents. The duty of the hour is incomplete, our mourning is insincere if, while we express unwavering trust in the great principles that underlie our government, we do not also give our support to the man to whom the people have entrusted its administration.

Andrew Johnson is now, by the constitution, the President of the United States, and he stands before the world as the most conspicuous representative of the industrial classes. Left an orphan at four years old, poverty and toil were his steps to honor. His youth was not passed in the halls of colleges; nevertheless he has received a thorough political education in statesmanship in the school of the people and by long experience of public life. A village funtionary; member successively of each branch of the Tennessee legislature, hearing with a thrill of joy, the words, "the Union, it must be preserved;" a representative in Congress for successive years; Governor of the great State of Tennessee, approved as its Governor by re-election; he was at the opening of the Rebellion a Senator from that State in Congress. Then at the Capital, when Senators, unrebuked by the Government, sent word by telegram to seize forts and arsenals, he alone from that Southern region told them what the Government did not dare to tell them, that they were traitors, and deserved the punishment of treason.

Undismayed by a perpetual purpose of public enemies to take his life, bearing up against the still greater trial of the persecution o his wife and children, in due time he went back to his State, determined to restore it to Union, or die with the American flag for his winding sheet. And now, at the call of the United States, he has returned to Washington as a conqueror, with Tennessee as a free State for his trophy. It remains for him to consummate the vindication of the Union. To that Union Abraham Lincoln has fallen a martyr. His death, which was meant to sever it beyond repair, binds it more closely and more firmly than ever. The blow aimed him, was aimed not at the native of Kentucky, not at the citizen of Illinois, but at the man who, as President, in the executive branch of the government, stood as the representative of every man in the United States The object of the crime was the life of the whole people; and it wounds the affections of the whole people. From Maine to the southwest boundary of the Pacific, it makes us one.

The country may have needed an imperishable grief to touch its inmost feeling. The grave that receives the remains of Lincoln, receives the martyr to the Union; the monument which will rise over his body will bear witness to the Union; his enduring memory will assist during the countless ages to bind the states together, and to incite to the love of our one undivided, indivisible country. Peace to the ashes of our departed friend, the friend of his country and his race. Happy was his life, for he was the restorer of the republic; he was happy in his death, for the manner of his end will plead forever for the Union of the States and the freedom of man.

It is a truism, but one often practically forgotten, that there is no medium between truth and falsehood.—Whately.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known, talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with out regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

TO JERUSALEM.

BY BARNET MATTHIAS.

TUNE—"I'd offer thee this hand of mine."

Jerusalem, I love thy name,
A name to sages dear,
Sought out by kings and patriarchs,
But now forlorn and drear;
I think of all thy scattered sons,
Thy daughters desolate,
Thy mingled cup of sorrow,
Thy grief without abate.

On thee has fallen heavy
Thy Maker's awful frown,
And thou art left a widow
Low seated on the ground;
Thy palaces in ruins
Have strewed the valleys, long—
Thou hast been the jeer of Gentiles,
And in the drunkards' song.

They shouted at thy overthrow—
"Raze, raze it to the ground,
That we may see fair Zion
In ruins far around."
Thus laughing at thy sorrow,
Thy grief they made their pride,
"'Tis thus," said they, "we'd have it"
With Yahveh's chosen bride.

Thy captors mocked thy children,
And asked them for a song;
Not grieved for thy affliction,
But set to do thee wrong,
They pressed them in their gallies,
On Babel's turbid tide,
Their harps unstrung on willows,
Hung by Euphrâtes' side.

But O! thou tost with tempest,
Afflicted sad and sore,
Thy Maker is thy husband,
He will afflict no more.
Forget thy father's house with all
Nor more thy shame regret;
So shall the Lord delight in thee,
Thou shalt be honored yet.

Then rise from dust and sadness,
Behold thy light is come;
Thy sun shall rise in glory
To dissipate thy gloom.
The kingdoms all around thee
To ruin shall decay,
But thine, sublime and glorious,
Shall never pass away.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

PHILADELPHIA, April 17, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—Last Sunday week, Rev. John Chambers, of this city, preached a discourse in which he endeavored to show that the "Progress of the gospel is retarded by Second Adventism." I replied to his singular production before a respectable audience, in Washington Hall, Cor. of Eight and Spring Garden Streets, last Sunday evening. I am astonished both at the ignorance of what we preach and of the direct testimony of the bible which ministers of the gospel who believe in the conversion of the world can exhibit. I endeavored to show the folly of his positions, and present the true testimony of the divine record.

This city, like all others in the North, wears the aspect of mourning and woe! We have but few words to use! The whole air breathes a nation's sorrow. In all the churches here, the services had respect to the calamitous event which has brought the whole land to grief.

President Lincoln assassinated! And the war not ended. His has ceased with his death. Will his successor follow the same policy? Will the same leniency be shown the rebels under the admistration of President Johnson that Mr. Lincoln was manifestly intending to exercise towards the greatest traitors who ever attempted revolution? Against the most magnanimous government that ever existed they lifted up the red hand of treason, and have now employed the dagger of the assassin to strike down the man who gave himself as a martyr to the cause of universal liberty. Have they not killed their best friend? Will they ever obtain so good terms from any other as they might from "Father Abraham"? Never! This city is full of the very throes of vengeance. Nothing will now satisfy, but the execution or expatriation of all the leading and prominent rebels. Mr. Johnson is counted upon as a stern man: one who will strive to meet out even handed justice to the conspirators who have drenched this land in blood.

The tone of the press; and of the whole community breathes the spirit of vengeful wrath, upon this whole horde of murderers. And now treason, the blackest crime under heaven, having no companionship but slavery itself, will receive condign punishment. But while this appears, we may have complications such as we had hoped to escape. A foreign war, or more than one, and trouble; trouble, in reconstruction; the time of trouble. May God have mercy on his flock.

THE RESURRECTION.

"I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi.

What is raised up? Who and what is this him, that is to come forth at the last day? I am not going to affirm, neither do I purpose to charge anything for my opinion, or to make any one responsible for it, neither shall I "Book any one for hell" if they do not adopt it; but I will exchange it for some other when I see good reason for doing so.

Paul speaks of an outer man and an inner man. I understand the outer man to be the natural man, the physical man; that which is born of the flesh, which proceeds from generation; in other words, the animal man. I, of course, include all that is necessarily connected with this natural man; or, if you please, the living soul. To this man the only promise, that I know of, is, "Thou shalt surely die!" "dust thou art, and to dust shalt thou return." It is not said of him, I will raise him up at the last day.

I apprehend the great difficulty, of our not understanding what is said of man, and to man, lies in our not perceiving the different circumstances in which man is placed at the time he is addressed, or at the time in which the thing is said of him. To illustrate: Was man created mortal, immortal, or neither? is a question that has and still seems to perplex many. One says, he was created mortal. The objector says, If so, he would have died whether he sinned or not: how then was death the wages of sin? Another says, He was created immortal. But the objector says, How then could he die; for God himself could not destroy an immortal being?

In determining the immortality of a being the question is not, what amount of power would be able to destroy it? but, could it be destroyed? The third, thinking to avoid these difficulties, says, man was created neither the one or the other; but subject to either. But, says the objector, that is to say, he was not created at all; for as a line is either straight or crooked so sure is a being liable to death, or it is not.

Now for the application. I understand all this difficulty arises from not making a distinction between man as he proceeded from the hands of his Maker, and man placed on trial for the developement of character. While it is true that man would have died as other animals die, had no law been given him, of course, without sin, devoid of character good or bad, it is at the same time true, that after perpetuated being had been offered to him, on conditions of obedience, that his death was the result of his disobedience.

So, to return to the subject, while it is true that man, unregenerated, does not eat the flesh or drink the blood of Christ, it is yet true that the regenerated man does. But does this regenerating process, that has taken effect on the man to-day, satisfy or diminish the claims that justice had yesterday on that natural man? I think not. Where then is the essential man? the redeemed man? the him that is to be raised up?

We start first with the form; that is dust, even that is called man; just as the watch unwound is called the watch. Now, some philosophers ask us, why he does not, at this stage, think? I might as well ask, why the unwound watch does not tick? does not mark the minutes and hours as they pass? Something is yet to be done; and yet it is true that man's capacity for thought lies, in the main, in his organization. Here are two instruments: one we call a watch; the other a musical instrument. The forms are different. We do the same thing to them; namely, wind them. The one keeps time; the other plays a tune. Where does the capacity lie? Here are two animals; the forms are different; they are both made alive by the same principle; they both receive the same breath of life into their nostrils; it makes them both living beings. Their capacities are different. Where does it lie? There is but one answer. But now the man is made alive we still talk of him as man. Our language concerning him must be understood differently: he is in a different condition to that form in which the capacity lies to deal with facts and principles. The motive power is applied now; the living man begins to becomes an intelligent man.

After receiving a sufficient amount of intelligence to understand the law by which he is to be governed, he commences the formation of moral character. Now I ask, Where is the essential man? where is the identity, about which so much is said? How do I know who I am? Let me ask further, how I know anything? how I know my name; my wife's name; my children's names, or how much twice two is? I answer, I have learned it. Now, does not what I have learned determine my identity? and are not the thoughts that I have collected together, and the character that I have formed, the essential part? Is that not what my friends prize in me? is it not what gives me my standing in community? I believe it is; and I believe further, it is what is to be raised up at that last day.

I wish to illustrate to the reader my idea of the resurrection. Thus, take into your hand a copy of the Bible. Now suppose it to be the only copy extant. Examine it. The lids are matter; the leaves the same. The ink used in printing it, that too is matter. In short, the book is matter. Is it better than any other matter? If so, I fail to see it. But there is something further; there are historical facts, prophecies, precepts, exhortations, etc. Are they matter? No. Now, which determines the character of the book? which part do you prize? which part do you rely on for salvation? which part determines the identity of the book?

Now, I will further suppose you have learned, committed to memory all those facts, prophecies, precepts, etc. Now place that book in the fire: it burns; it is consumed; the parts of which it was composed are scattered. We say of the bible, it is gone; it is burned up; it can not be seen; it is no longer tangible. But did those prophecies, those precepts, those historical facts burn up? or, did they go off some where? Where is now the essential bible? If you should die it would be gone forever; but you live, and the bible is not gone as some might suppose, but it is alive unto you; just as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are alive unto God, though dead to themselves and the world. Now comes the judgment. You think the bible too good to be lost, and say, I will restore it; I will raise it up. You provide the form (for bibles can not dispense with forms any more than men can); not the form that was. Why not? That was corruptible; liable to decay, to be soiled, to perish, to be destroyed; but you get one perfectly beautiful, incorruptible. On those new pages you enstamp what was on the old ones: the work is complete. You present it to me, claiming you have written a new book, and you ask my opinion of your literary effort. I open the book and read, "In the beginning God created the Heavens," etc. I at once deny your being the author, and affirm it is the old bible. Did I recognize the form? No. You affirm, it is not the old bible, for it was burned and the ashes scattered to the four winds; and further, that not a particle of the old matter has entered into the new. I reply, I care not whether the whole or any part of the matter in the old form is in the new; the bible is restored, to exist forever.

So I understand that mind and character which has been formed while in the natural body, will, at the coming of the LIFE-GIVER, be connected with a form like Christ's glorified body. That is what I understand by being raised up at the last day. Whether the dust that now forms my body, that has formed either of the bodies that I have had, or that is to form either of the bodies that I may have, shall be in that glorified body, I care not. But I believe the LIFE-GIVER will remember, protect, and preserve what is essential in his children; that which eats and drinks of him; and will restore that, or raise it up at the last day: and I believe a spiritual body will be raised; for the bible says so; and, though I am called a materialist, I attach more importance to the character than to the dust that we may have in the future. EXPRESSION AND REPRESSION.

Life consists of two parts—Expression and Repression—each of which has its solemn duties. To love, joy, hope, faith, pity, belongs the duty of expression: to anger, envy, malice, revenge, and all uncharitableness belongs the duty of repression.

Some very religious and moral people err by applying repression to both classes alike. They repress equally the expression of love and of hatred, of pity and of anger. Such forget one great law, as true in the moral world as in the physical—that repression lessens and deadens. Twice or thrice mowing will kill off the sturdiest crops of weeds; the roots die for want of expression. A compress on a limb will stop its growing; the surgeon knows this, and puts a tight bandage around a tumor; but what if we put a tight bandage about the heart and lungs, as some young ladies of my acquaintance do—or bandage the feet, as they do in China? And what if we bandage a nobler inner faculty, and wrap love in grave-clothes?

But again there are others, and their number is legion—perhaps you and I, reader, may know something of it ourselves—who have an instinctive habit of expression in regard to all that is noblest and highest within them, which they do not feel in their lower and more unworthy nature.

It comes far easier to scold our friend in an angry moment than to say how much we love, honor, and esteem him in a kindly mood. Wrath and bitterness speak themselves and go with their own force; love is shamefaced, looks shyly out of the window, lingers long at the door-latch.

How mutch freer utterance among many good Christians have anger, contempt, and censoriousness, than tenderness and love! I hate is said loud and with all our force. I love is said with a hesitating voice and blushing cheek.

In an angry mood we do an injury to a loving heart with good, strong, free emphasis; but we stammer and hang back when our diviner nature tells us to confess and ask pardon. Even when our heart is broken with repentance, we haggle and linger long before we can "Throw away the worst part of it."

How many live a stingy and niggardly life in regard to their richest inward treasure! They live with those they love dearly, whom a few more words and deeds expressive of this love would make so much happier, richer, and better; and they cannot, will not, turn the key and give it out. People who in their very souls really do love, esteem, reverence, almost worship each other, live a barren, chilly life side by side, busy, anxious, preoccupied, letting their love go by as a matter of course, a last year's growth, with no present buds and blossoms.

Are there not sons and daughters who have parents living with them as angels unawares—husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, in whom the material for a beautiful life lies locked away in unfruitful silence—who give time to everything but the cultivation and expression of mutual love?

The time is coming, they think, in some far future, when they shall find leisure to enjoy each other, to stop and rest side by side, to discover to each other these hidden treasures which lie idle and unused,

Alas! time flies and death steals on, and we reiterate the complaint of one in Scripture—"It came to pass, while thy servant was busy hither and tither, the man was gone."

The bitterest tears shed over graves are for words left unsaid and deeds left undone. "She never knew how I loved her." "He never knew what he was to me." "I always meant to make more of our friendship." "I did not know what he was to me till he was gone." Such words are the poisoned arrows which cruel Death shoots backward at us from the door of the sepulchre.

How much more we might make of our family life, of our friendship, if every secret thought of love blossomed into a deed! We are not now speaking merely of personal caresses. These may or may not be the best language of affection. Many are endowed with a delicacy, a fastidiousness of physical organization, which shrinks away from too much of these, repelled and overpowered. But there are words and looks and little observances, thoughtfulnesses, watchful little attentions, which speak of love, which make it manifest, and there is scarce a family that might not be richer in heart-wealth for more of them.—Selected.

THE ORDINANCE OF MARRIAGE.

MARATHON N. Y. March 12, 1865.

BR. STORRS.—Allow me to inquire, through your Herald of Life, for any one, who knows what meaning the Divine being attaches to marriage? For, as I think, all spiritualists have missed his meaning; and also all wealth worshippers have missed his meaning; and when these two classes are excepted, what other class is left in the world? And if there be no other class left, and these two have erred from the truth, then the knowledge of God is departed from the earth. For I hold no one who practically errs from the truth, in this vital matter, can still retain any true knowledge of the living God, but is become in morals an atheist, and is therefore effectually, and inevitably lost, unless they repent and come again to the knowledge of the truth, from which they have departed.

Furthermore, it appears to me, this practical, and therefore essential atheism, at which the world has arrived by its idolatry in wealth-worship, is the filling up, or the essential fulness of its cup of iniquity, for which it is to fall at the coming of Jesus, to rise, in its lapsed state, no more at all forever.

If there be any found who, even in this lapsed condition, know and love marriage in God's sense of the term, then of course they love God who instituted this relationship, notwithstanding all its cares and fears, toils and trials; and though yet in the world, as diligent, thankful sojourners, are not dependent on wealth, as worth, therefore are not wealth-worshippers, but obedient to the gospel of Christ, are servants of the living God, in hope of eternal life, which Jesus shall reveal at his second coming. Who will answer?

THE WASHER WOMAN'S DAUGHTER.

"I hate her! The tattling little upstart, the beggar's brat!" exclaimed Hortense Carpenter, as she stood in the midst of her schoolmates. "It's bad enough to have a washer-woman's daughter who has to do chores for her tuition, in school, at any rate; but when she begins to tattle about us, it is time to teach her a lesson. Miss. Chandler has made too much of her. She forgets herself, and really begins to feel on an equality with us. I, for one, will show Miss. Rag-bag her place." Just then the door opened, and a fragile girl, of some fourteen summers, stepped in. "Good morning," said she, pleasantly, to the group of girls. There was no reply—all looked timidly at Hortense, for she was all-powerful there, and her flashing eyes deterred any of the more venturesome who would have addressed Bessie Allen. "Good morning, girls," repeated Bessie Hortense drew herself up haughtily. "Attend to your dusting," said she. "You do not pay your tuition by entertaining us and we do not care to hear any of your hypocritical remarks. The society of a tattler is any thing but agreeable." "Oh, Hortense, I did not tattle," exclaimed poor Bessie, while tears rushed to her eyes. "Tattlers are always liars," replied Hortense scornfully as she turned away, while Bessie sank sobbing into her seat. A few of the girls looked pityingly upon her, but no one ventured to approach her.

"I don't believe she did tell, Sensia," whispered Martha Myers. "You are at perfect liberty to think what you please," replied Hortense. "Go, if you choose, take the place of a mean informer and spy. But I thought you had more spirit than to be turned round by a few crocodile tears." Martha shrank back abashed, and the rest of the girls were easily persuaded that Hortense was right. The bell soon rang, and all entered upon their school duties.

Hortense Carpenter was at this time about fifteen years of age, and certainly very beautiful. She was at once the idol and terror of the whole school. No one could be more agreeable than she when her will was obeyed; no one understood better how to visit any opposition to it on the heads of the offenders. She was a fine scholar, and had always been treated by her teachers with marked distinction.

Her father was wealthy, and delighted to deck in rich attire his child—the pride of his heart. He either did not see her aristocratic and haughty notions, or found an echo to them in his heart; for his child resembled him much, in character, at any rate he never checked them. Her mother—one of the most gentle and humble of women—indeed often reasoned with her on the folly and wickedness of her pride, and imagined that the respectful attention which her daughter paid her, betokened a disposition to correct her faults. Could she have glanced into her child's mind, she would have been astonished to see what thoughts were passing there. Hortense loved her mother, but she was well aware that in intellect she herself was far her superior, and it was with pitying affection that she listened to her affectionate admonitions. Her father she reverenced. She acknowledged that he was her superior, and his words of sarcastic reproval—for that was his usual way of expressing his disapprobation of her conduct—were all-powerful with her; but he never reiterated what her mother said to her on this subject, and she pursued her own course, becoming a leader in school as he was in society. Thus it happened that when Bessie Allen first entered the school, she had incurred her displeasure; first, because she was poor—an offence which might, possibly, have been overlooked, had she not proved herself to be a fine scholar, and by her gentleness bid fair to become a formidable rival also, in the affections of both teacher and scholars. For all of these reasons, Hortense hated her, and now when a school-freak had been discovered by their teacher, as Bessie had been the only one not engaged in it, suspicion naturally rested upon her as having been the informer, and Hortense gladly availed herself of this to thrust down the usurper into what she considered her proper place. And from this time poor Bessie was subjected all the petty annoyances which a haughty girl could devise and a sensitive mind could feel.

The girl grew thinner and paler than ever, for she was a loving child, and to feel herself looked upon with suspicion and hatred where she had before experienced only kindness, was indeed a sad blow to her. At home she had never met with any thing but indifference—for her mother was dead, her father a poor, spiritless drone, and her step-mother a coarse woman who meant well, but understood nothing of the sensitive child's feelings, had made no secret of the fact that she considered Bessie as a dead weight on her hands. When Miss Chandler had offered to take her into school and teach her for some slight services, Bessie's heart leaped for joy. Her teacher told her that in time she too, might obtain her livelihood by teaching, and this had stimulated the child to almost superhuman exertions, which had soon, by making her a rival, gained her an enemy in Hortense. The kindness and affection of her schoolmates had made her young life full of sunshine, and now the sudden change plunged her into tenfold deeper gloom than before. The light of happiness faded from her blue eyes; she drooped visibly, and no one could here recognize the gentle, smiling Bessie Allen, in the now pale and thoughtful child. She brooded over her trouble in secret, but her teacher noted nothing of the change. It is needless to say that she was guiltless of the charge, and had Miss Chandler been aware of it, she would have cleared her at once. But she was not an observant woman, and saw none of the mental troubles of her pupil; and Bessie, who longed some times to speak to her teacher on the subject, shrank nervously from doing so, from a dread of deserving in reality that dreadful appellation, "tattler," that seemed ever sounding in her ears; of deserving that character so abhorred by school-children.

She would have been utterly wretched had it not been for little Lily, a fairy-like child, and sister of Hortense, who now came to school, and who had at once taken a great fancy to Bessie, and on whom in return, Bessie lavished all the repressed affection of her loving heart. Hortense looked upon this with the deepest annoyance. Lily was her darling, and she could not bear to have any rival in the child's heart—least of all was it to be borne when that rival was a washer-woman's daughter, and Bessie Allen. Hortense had gained her her point in making Bessie shunned by her schoolmates, but all this was nothing so long as her darling sister loved her; and too proud to appear to notice that she had a rival, she could not deprive Bessie of this. It was agony for her to see the child spring from her side as she did, in the morning to meet Bessie; to see her white arms twined round the girl's neck, and her sweet lips pressed to hers—but there was no remedy for that. Thank God, there are no aristocrats among children.

So time past on, and finally Bessie was missing from school. She had been missing for a day or two, when little Lily, too, stayed at home. She begged her mother to let her go to see her favorite, and Miss Carpenter consented.

The servant took her to the washer-woman's, where Bessie lay sick. The child clung to her, kissed her, and alas! bore home with her the seeds of the contagious disease—the scarlet fever, which Bessie was herself unconscious of having, for she had not been attended by a physician. Poor Lily was stricken down, and after a short and severe illness died; while Bessie lived to mourn over the sad loss of her child-friend, and to look forward hopelessly to her own future.

It was the morning after the funeral of Lily that Bessie, a mere shadow, entered the school-room. Hortense was there, dressed in deep mourning, looking pale and haughty. None of the girls dared address her as she sat there, tearless and still, though some whispered that they thought she showed very little grief; since she seemed to love Lily so; and one little girl said that "she never cried a bit at the funeral, when her mother sobbed as if her heart would break." Bessie heard all these whispers, but she knew better than they what was tearless agony. Her heart bled for Hortense, and she drew closer to her side, and passing her arm round her waist, whispered, "I know how to pity you, dear Hortense. She loved ME dearly, too." Hortense started as if an adder had stung her; she flung off Bessie's encircling arm, as she exclaimed bitterly, "She DID love you, and how did you repay her? You kissed her, with poison on your lips—you killed her!" Poor bessie was shocked. She tottered feebly to her seat, and wept silently. The next day she did not come to school. She was worse again, so the children said. She had come out too soon, said the doctor, and a relapse was the consequence. Hortense cared not. She felt in her heart that Bessie had murdered her sister, and hated her worse than ever.

It was twilight, and Hortense had been out gathering wild flowers, and digging up violets, to plant on her sister's grave. It was growing late, and the graveyard was a dreary place; but what cared she for that? She was no coward, and she walked in among the white tomb-stones, gleaming in the moonlight, without a shudder. But as she drew near to Lily's grave, she started—surely she saw some thing move. She hesitated, but soon resolved to go forward; and there lying on the ground was Bessie Allen. She was dressed only in her night-dress, and her pale face looked even paler, shrouded as it was in her fair hair. She was moaning sadly, "You are gone. You were the only one that loved me—and I KILLED you!" Then sobs and groans would interrupt her words. She did not see Hortense, till suddenly she looked up. "Oh, do not send me away!" she said, wildly. "I did not mean to kill her! How could I want to kill the only one that loved me! Let me stay! Do let me stay!" and she clung to Hortense's dress convulsively. "Bessie Allen, how came you here?" was all that Hortense could reply. "I could not rest, I could not sleep, till I had asked Lily to forgive me for poisoning her; so I came here, and bye and bye I shall rest with her down in the ground," and she buried her face in the grass, as though she would seek a shelter from the harsh world with her friend. Hortense knew that she was wild and delirious, and her heart smote her for the wrong that she had done her. There, by her sister's grave, she could not retain her old animosity. Her own tears flowed faster than Bessie's had done. "God forgive me," cried she, falling on her knees by the side of her grave. "God forgive me my sin toward you, Bessie Allen! Come, Bessie; Dear Bessie; Dear Bessie; Lily's Bessie! she said, as Bessie neither stirred nor moved, but lay prostrate by the grave. "Lily wants you, Bessie," she whispered; but Bessie heard her not—she was where the "wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

The rest of the events of that fearful night, Hortense could never remember clearly. How she made known where Bessie—the dead Bessie—lay, or how she reached home herself; but from that night Hortense was unlike her former self. It was a bitter lesson, but one that she never forgot; and as the plowshare of affliction rooted up the strong weeds of pride and hatred from her heart, so in their stead was planted good seed that sprang up, making her life beautiful.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. AN EARLY RESURRECTION PROMISED TO MESSIAH.

"For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." Psa. xiv.

In the second chapter of Acts, the Apostle Peter, in his memorable sermon, applies the prediction, of which the above verse forms a part, to Messiah, the exalted Saviour of the world. No time, therefore, need be occupied in determining for whom were the words in the text provided, or who was not to be left in hell, what Holy One was not to see corruption, since a more satisfactory explanation could not be desired by any resonable mind than the one contained in the discouse referred to. At once, then, we may proceed to their exposition, and, by the help of God, endeavor to open up their meaning with clearness and as much brevity as is consistent with a proper development of their contents.

I. Observe, the text is a reason for the feelings and hope expressed in the preceding verse. "My heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth; my flesh also shall rest in hope." Why? "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell," &c. The whole passage may be thrown into the promise form and read thus: "Thy," says Jehovah to his Messiah, "thy heart shall be glad, and thy glory shall rejoice; thy flesh also shall rest in hope, for thy soul will not be left in hell, thou wilt not be suffered to see corruption." Such was the prophetic promise prepared for Messiah, and trusting to the faithfulness of his Father, in due time he took it up, we doubt not, in faith, and made it his consolation while advancing toward the cross and the tomb. Then it assumed the form expressive of Messiah's unwavering confidence in it as a faithful saying, and this, in anticipation of his certainly employing it so as to express his conviction of its truth, is the shape it has in the prophetic record, "My heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth; my flesh also shall rest in hope, for thou wilt not leave my soul," &c.

II. "My soul" (napheshi) is a Hebrewism for me. Thou wilt not leav me in hell, is the form of the language when divested of its Oriental idiom. Of such a mode of expressing the idea of personality, there are a multitude of examples in the Old and New Testament. For instance: Gen. xxxiv. 8. "The soul of my son Schechem," i. e.; my son Schechem. Ps. xxxiv. 22, "The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants," i. e." the Lord redeemeth his servants. Prov. x. 3, "The Lord will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish," i. e., the Lord will not suffer the righteous to famish. Ezek. xviii. 4, "All souls are mine, as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine, the soul that sinneth it shall die."

Not unfrequently have our translators omitted the nephesh, commonly rendered soul, and given a simple utterance of its force, or the idea of personality, as we have done after the scripture quotations just made. In illustration of this statement, we may refer to such passages as these: Gen. xiv. 21, "And the King of Sodom said unto Abraham, give me the persons," (margin, souls.) Josh. xxiii. 11, "Take good heed, therefore, unto yourselves," (margin, your souls.) Judges xvi. 30, "And Samson said, let me die," (margin, let my soul die.) 1 Chron. v. 21, "And they took——of men an hundred thousand," (margin, they took of "souls of men.") Job. xxxvi. 14, "They die in youth," (margin, their soul dieth.) Jer. xxxvii. 9, "Deceive not yourselves," (margin, your souls.) 2 Cor. xii. 15, "I will very gladly spend and be spent for you," (margin, your souls.)

"Thou wilt not leave my soul," then, is clearly me, or thou wilt not leave thy Messiah in hell, &c. As the verse is constructed on the parallel principle, which is often illustrated by the Hebrew poems, it is also apparent that there is in the second division of the pasage some terms that repeat and explain certain words in the first. The terms in the first member of the verse we allude to, are "my soul," and the words that are parallel to them are clearly "thine Holy One;" and since this is the case, we may read the verse thus: "Thou wilt not leave, thy Holy One, in hell, thou wilt not suffer me, thine Holy One, to see corruption." The soul of Jehovah's Holy One just means Jehovah's Holy One himself, who was not to remain in hell, who was not to see corruption. Likewise, let it be remarked, that the second form, "thine Holy One," not merely parallels the first, "my soul" or me, but adds to its fulness by way of explanation, or by disclosing the perfection of Messiah's character. He is not merely Jehovah's One—the one dear to him; he is his Holy One, which manifests the Redeemer's character and faithfulness in his office as the revealer of God and the Saviour of men.

Viewing the text as a premise, the form in which it would originally exist in the Divine mind, and would be thrown upon the intellect of the prophet, into which shape we have already converted it above, "thy heart shall be glad—thy glory shall rejoice—thy soul shall not be left in hell—neither shall thou see corruption"—it contains a Divine testimony to the character of Messiah as the Holy One; and hence when he applies the designation to himself, he simply used the terms that were provided for him; his Father styles him his Holy One, and therefore he so describes himself, and tacitly, as we may say, employs the acknowledged fact as a plea why the promise should be realized in his experience. In the character of the Messiah, the epithet Holy One was perfectly illustrated, for he was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners;" spotless was his life, and in the end, even Judas, who was most intimately acquainted with him, who had been, as we say, admitted béhind the scenes, had no other declaration than this concerning his Master whom he betrayed, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood."

It would appear then that the phrase Holy One is not to be understood of comparitive perfection in character; on the contrary, it unquestionably denotes absolute completeness, holiness, or wholeness in him who appeared as the example and Redeemer of our race. He towered above all human beings as the cloud-touching mountain rises above the plain and its hills and palms. He was that beloved Son in whom his Father was well pleased, as was intimated by voices from the eternal throne, by the intense and incomprehensibly intimate fellowship he enjoyed with his Father, by the astonishing prodigies at this crucifixion, and his exaltation to the right hand of the Majesty on high, far above all principalities and powers, and might and dominion, and every name that is named. In virtue of his sinlessness could he die for the unjust; in virture of needing no salvation himself, could he become the Redeemer of a lost world.

III. His soul, he, the Holy One of God, was not to be left in hell, neither was he to see corruption.

The term rendered hell is sheol in the Hebrew, and in applying this prediction to Jesus Christ, and demonstrating its accomplishment in him, the Apostle Peter uses hadou, a part of the Greek word hades, which is proven by this very fact to be the Greek synonym for the Hebrew sheol. Sheol signifies the state of the dead, or a dead state, the grave, a deep pit. Frequently is it rendered grave in the Old Testament, as Ps. vi. 5, "In the grave (sheol) who shall give thee thanks?" Ps. xxx. 3, "O Lord, thou hast brought up my soul (or me) from the grave," (sheol.) Ps. xxxi. 17, "Let them (the wicked) be silent in the grave," (sheol.) Ps. lxxxix. 48, "Shall he deliver his soul (himself) from the hand of the grave," (sheol.) Prov. i. 12, "Let us swallow them up alive in the grave," (sheol.) Prov. xxx. 16, "The grave," (sheol.) Eccl. ix. 10, "There is no work, nor device, &c., in the grave, (sheol,) whither thou goest." See also Song of Sol. viii. 6, Isa. xxxviii. 10, and Rev. xx; 13, "Death and hell (hades, margin, grave,) delivered up the dead which were in them."

When a dead man is in sheol, he is of course in his grave, but the term sheol is more comprehensive or generic than the word grave as usually employed. All the dead are in sheol, or in a dead state; hades has the dead, not the living, in it, as demonstrated by Rev. xx. 13, "Death and hades delivered up the dead which were in them." Each dead man is in his grave, or keber, in the Hebrew tongue. Sheol, or hades, clasps all graves—it, like a large realm, receives the congregation of the dead, and in its silent, dark and noisome enclosure they slumber on and moulder into dust. When one goes into sheol, the poetic Hebrew mind pictures him as going into this obscure domain, which is just a state, presented under the imagery of a place, for sheol is no more a real place than death is a real being. They personified death as we do ourselves, when for instance we speak of the monster death, of his coming, of his relentlessness, meaning only thereby that men expire under an unavoidable appointment; the dead go into sheol—they are with the dead—they are like them—they are asleep and corrupting in the dust. Inasmuch as dead men are buried or covered over from the sight, it is quite correct to say of all the dead that they are in hell even, only let the true force of the English term be carefully understood. Hell is a part of the Anglo-Saxon verb helan, "to hele," or hell, heel, hill, shell, hulk, shovel, hole, wold, welt, heal, sheal, shield, shawl, i. e., "cover up." Hell, then, is a place covered up, and when men are in sheol, they are hidden from view; they are, as the Greeks said, in hades, the unseen, from a, not, and idein, to see.

The import of hell is very perceptible in the word healing. When a wound is closing, we say it is healing; when fully repaired, we say it has healed, it is now covered out of view. Thus it is quite correct to call each grave a hell, for there a corpse is hid, so that hell may stand generically for all graves and for the state of all in them, or specifically for a grave, and the state of the dead being by whom it is tenanted. Do we not speak of a grave, and of the grave? So we may discourse of hell and of a hell, (hole is twin to hell;) of sheol, and of a sheol, though the Hebrews never seem to have used the term except in a generic or comprehensive manner, (as we use the word grave in the expression the grave,) though the principles of language might fully have authorized them taking such course.

When Messiah entered sheol, he was hid, silent, praiseless and at rest; he was in the state and of course in the place where corruption is seen or undergone. Now this brings us to note the second parallelism that seems to be in the verse. The first was between the "my soul" or the me, and the Holy One; the example remaining to be considered is found in the words "in hell" and "see corruption." Let them be placed thus—

Thou wilt not leave me in hell;
Neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

To be in sheol, or in the state of the dead, is not necessarily to see corruption; it is, however, certainly to be where in all ordinary cases it is seen or undergone, and where no one is long without suffering decompostion. Lazarus, for instance, was in sheol, and he had been so long in a condition of death in the tomb, that his sister thought corruption must at the date of her conversation with our Lord, have had a commencement; she said, "Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead (buried?) four days." John xi. 39. The soul of Messiah, or Messiah himself, could die then; for he did expire on the cross; could see corruption since he needed to be preserved from it, and the words before us are the promise that he would. Had the verse ran, Thou wilt not suffer me to see sheol, the meaning would have been, thou wilt not permit me to die; had it been only, thou wilt not leave me in sheol, the sense would have been, thou wilt give me a ressurrection, without at all intimating when it would be effected; and as it stands, we learn that Messiah was to die, for he was to enter sheol, and also that he would be soon resurrected, since he was not in sheol even to see corruption.

The whole verse, then, is equivalent to a declaration that Messiah should have a very early resurrection; one before corruption had commenced, which in the climate of Judea was commenced much sooner than with us, in consequence of its warmer temperature, which is universally known to accelerate the process of decay and dissolution. From the gospels we discover that Messiah expected such a restoration to life, as we read in Matt. xx. 18–19, "The chief priests and—— scribes shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles to mock and to scourge and to crucify him, and third day he shall rise again." Matt. xii. 40, "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." On the morning of the third day, in spite of every effort by his foes, he awoke from the sleep of death, and came forth the spoiler of the grave.

"And did he rise?
Hear, O ye nations, hear it, O ye dead!
He rose, he rose! and burst the bars of death."

From the sepulchre he issued forth to die no more; death has no more dominion over him—he ever liveth to make intercession for us. "With long life"—length of days—"will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation."

IV. We would suggest a few remarks of a more practical nature, arising out of the preceding statements.

1. Observe how the faithfulness of Jehovah was manifested toward Messiah.

It was more than a thousand years after the promise in the text was first delivered, ere it had its fulfilment, and how exactly and truthfully was it accomplished? The blessed Redeemer trusted and was not put to shame; his hopes were realized, his predicted triumph was gained. "He was not left in sheol, neither did he see corruption." As the Prince of believers, he sets us an example by his confidence in his Father's testimony—he staggered not at the promises—he was strong in the faith, giving glory to him who had sent him into the world. Thus he was the Holy One—pre-eminently the Holy One—who, in virtue of his faith, the fountain of peace and of power, finished the work which had been given him to do. And why should we ever be unbelievers? Why should we ever for a moment dishonor, by our suspicions, the God who cannot lie? We have no less reason to trust the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ than the Saviour himself; he trusted, took his Father at his simple word—and is that word less real, less true to us than it was to him? Has not the Father of all one character—the changeless in love and faithfulness? Let us then learn to be loyal subjects and bold believers, act on the conviction in our journey through life, amid its caresand wants, and sorrows and toils, and fears and foes, that "heaven and earth may pass away," but one promise towards us who are his sons, by a gracious generation shall not pass away, or come short of the millionth part of a line of its perfect and literal accomplishment. With thine eye, O my brother, scan the future, studed with star-promises each of them vocal, telling thee of transcendent glories, of unfading joys, and listen with expanded ear, for the voice that speaks is the voice of God.

2. Observe, the blessed Jesus can sympathize with us in life and in death. Had he only lived for a while below, in toil and sorrow, and then departed, say from Gethsemane to heaven, he would have had no experience of death, and of course less ability to sympathize with his friends when entering the valley of shadows, and in their aversion from the silence and corruption toward which it conducts. But he so lived and also died; he can therefore feel for the living, and for the dying. In what situation can we be placed of which he had not experience in the days of his flesh, while he was a pilgrim through the vale of tears? Once he was young, and with the "lambs" he has a fellow-feeling; so with the tried, so with the bereaved, so with the poor, so with the persecuted, so with the betrayed and calumniated, and so with the dying in their mortal pangs. We are nearly ignorant of his celestial joys, yet he knows well our terrestrial experiences. We cannot apprehend his glory, but he knows right well our gloom. Truly, he is touched with a feeling of our infirmites, and is not merely impressed and moved by them, but can yield us from his vast stores those measures of consolation and fortitude which we require. Having passed through the stages of common humanity, and had trials beyond all we will ever be called upon to endure; having climbed the mountains and trod the valleys; having seen night starry and starless; having groaned in death and entered the thick darkness of sheol, he is competent in every sense to be a present help in the hour of need.

3. Observe, that through the fulfilment of this promise to Messiah, he has become the first fruits of them that slept. Had he not descended to the grave, and triumphed over death, there would have been for us no joy, no hope of a return from the land of sheol, to the activity of conscious being. "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; and they that have fallen asleep in Christ are perished," it is all over with them for ever; the eye-lids of the grave are eternally closed. But he who died for us, has risen again, and life and immortality have been brought sensibly to light by his reanimated and glorified existence. His holy ones, who have been washed in his blood and made meet for a sublimer destiny, will yet awake from the repose of death. Yet see on yonder side the tomb, the king in his beauty, and the kingdom over which he is to reign. Unless he speedily returns to earth, the reader and writer will enter into sheol, and return to dust, like the companies who have already been gathered to their fathers; the dominion of death over us, however, shall not be perpetual, and if we have in this life sought for "glory, and honor, and immortality," this mortal shall be exchanged for immortality and this corruptible for incorruption. Rather would we like Paul, have "mortality swallowed up of life," and thereby be saved the necessity of entering the dark portals and the halls of oblivion; we can only be there, however, for a time, and thanks be unto God who giveth us the hope of emancipation from the bondage of the sepulchre. The sleep, however long it may last, will appear but a momentary dream; the blaze of immortality will seem instantly to have followed the blow of death. We shall not be left in sheol, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it, and the glorified Immanuel, our divine Brother, is the pledge and model and power of our own resurrection.

Finally. Never let us forget that in the resurrection of Jesus, there was shown the divine immense compassion for our race. God so loved the world that he devoted to death for us his only begotten Son, that through his dying, death might be destroyed, and that we might escape the destruction which sin entails. For ages the hymn of love divine has been composing, and the drama of infinite compassion enacting before this world and the universe. What a scene was developed in Eden; what thrilling promises had fallen on the ears of ancient prophets and saints; what a forthcoming was shown in the manger, and on the accursed tree; what an unrollment when the tomb of Joseph was emptied, and what a transcendent and enduring vision will be unveiled when we shall be like him, seeing him as he is! Call it all the song, the poem, the labor of divine compassion for man, designed to attract the eye of the thoughtless, to move the affections of the torpid, to quicken and elevate the morally degraded. We can only by viewing it in different lights and from various positions, see its vastness, discover it as the shoreless incomprehensible. God with man, for man, in view of man, and in man! Love producing being, and consuming sin; love saving being and confronting death, and sheol with threatening that will soon be summarily executed. This love, O reader! is thy God, for God, the author of thy being, is love. Over thee he watches from hour to hour with a parent's solicitude, and on account of thy sins, if still thou art rebellious, he is moved in sorrow; even for thy return he longs with ardor, and will rejoice to clasp thee instantly to his bosom. He is now in Christ wishing, not that thou mayest endeavor to reconcile him, but that thou wouldest be reconciled to thy God. "Be ye reconciled unto God." Be ye—ye—O sinner, be ye reconciled unto him. Amen. M.

WHAT IS THE BAPTISM OF FIRE?

In a late No. of the Herald of Life, I noticed an expression, by one who was making some remarks on baptism; he says, "May we have the baptism of fire." I asked myself—, what was the baptism of fire? Was it a blessing, a thing to be desired? or was it a thing to be dreaded? I will suggest this idea, that others may think of it. While the true child of God will be baptized with the Holy Spirit; these who are not of Christ will be baptized with fire. "When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengence on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Thess. i. 7, 8. "A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about." Psa. 97, 3.

Now let us notice how the Evangelists record this expression of John the Baptist. Mathew represents John as speaking to a mixed multitude. Some of them no doubt, submitted to his baptism, bringing forth fruits meet for repentance; while others he addressed as a "generation of vipers," while he tells them that "every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire." Then he speaks to his disciples: "I indeed baptize you with water." While addressing both classes he says—"He (Jesus) shall baptize thee with the Holy Ghost and with fire." Then he continues his address to the mixed multitude: "Whose fan is in his hand, and he shall thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." Now observe how Mark records this address. He represents John as speaking only to one class. "And there went out to him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were baptized of him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins." To this class he says, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." He says nothing about fire to them. Luke in his account represents John as speaking to a mixed multitude, and he uses the expression, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. While John represents him as speaking only to believers, and there he says nothing about fire. There are only two other passages that I am aware of, that refer to this promise. Acts. i. 5 Jesus says to his disciples, "For John truly baptized with water; bnt ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence." He says nothing about fire.

Peter in alluding to the outporing of the Holy Spirit while he was preaching to Cornelius, says in Acts xi. 16, "Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." While I have some doubts about desiring to be baptized with fire; I sincerely desire to be baptized with the Holy Spirit.

Yours in love. W. PATTERSON

NOTE BY J. T. C.—My brother's argument seems to have strength in it, and perhaps he has the correct idea of the baptism of fire. But many think that the expression was a prediction of the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. "There appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon them, and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit." It is one thing to have the Holy Spirit and it is another thing to be filled with it. All of Christ's disciples have the Spirit, but all are not filled with it. God employs especial agencies to be instrumental in especial work. When his children are called—not only to be disciples but—to be especial instruments in spreading his truth, they receive an especial gift of the Spirit. Such an one would say with the prophet Jeremiah—"His word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones." Such a gift of the Spirit might be called the baptism of fire to distinguish it from the ordinary gift.

Still another interpretation may be suggested, which would make all disciples have the baptism of fire. The work of the Spirit is a purifying work in the believer. As fire burns chaff, so the Spirit burns the evil which would prevent our healthy growth in divine things. We are not saved as animal men. We are begotten anew by the Holy Spirit, and the inner man thus begotten grows stronger and stronger while the outward grows weaker and weaker. The power thus working may be said to burn up the chaff in us, as the hymn has it

"The fire shall not hurt thee, I only design
The dross to consume, and the gold to refine."

Some such idea is contained in Mark ix. 49, 50. "For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Salt is good, but if the salt have lost his saltness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another." The salt which we have in ourselves appears to refer to our condition as affected by the presence of the Holy Spirit. As salt indicates preservation, so the Spirit preserves. As the sacrifices in the Mosaic economy were salted with salt, so we the living sacrifices, holy, acceptable unto God, are salted by the Holy Spirit. But our salt has two powers; it not only preserves that which is good, but it burns what is evil. The moment we cease to allow the Spirit to continue its double work of preserving and burning, salt loses its saltness. Malachi iii. 2, 3 may refer to the burning work of the Spirit, but the interpretation given by Br. Patterson may suit the passage better than the one we have given.

CONSOLATION IN SORROW.

"The Servant is not above his Master."

Lonely Pilgrim: though thou may'st drink the bitter dregs of sorrow, or sink beneath the weight of grief or care, yet thy Master's footsteps have trod the same gloomy pathway, and he, the mighty Son of God, has drained the same cup of sorrow. The pale and meagre train of poverty, may surround thee, and disease have blighted every earthly hope, know our Saviour had not where to lay his head: "he was a man of sorrow acquainted with grief."

Thy loved ones may lie low 'neath the sods of the valley, heedless of thy bitter weeping, and thy longings for the footsteps that never come: remember Jesus wept at the grave of his beloved friend. He knows how deep affection's fount can be.

Do those who once thou didst fondly love and trust, and thought naught but death could ever sever the affection that bound thee, now, with averted looks pass the coldly by? Weep not; thy Master was denied; for thee he suffered an ignominious death upon the cross; for thee he burst the bands of death assunder and rose triumphat to insure a life in the future for those who love him.

"What matters earth's sadness and toil, brother,
If we but that future life see;
There will be ample time for rejoicing and rest—
There is life in the future for thee."

AFTER MANY DAYS.

Dr. H. is a physician of considerable ability, and of extensive practice in the eastern part of Connecticut: a man of large benevolence and deep Christian sympathy, using his skill in his profession, not for personal advantages alone, but for the benefit of his suffering fellow men. Cheerfully were his services rendered to the poor and destitute without thought of remuneration. Yet, as will be seen from the following incident, this labor of love returns with tenfold interest into the doctor's bosom.

A son of the doctor, a Lieutenant in one of our Connecticut regiments, being severely wounded in battle, was taken to the hospital. When word reached the father, he immediately started for Washington, where he found his son still alive, but rapidly failing, although every thing possible was done for him by hospital surgeons, stewards, and nurses, yet soon after the arrival of his father the young man died—willing to give up his life for his country.

In examining his clothes, the father found in his pocket-book a small sum of money. This he took, and turning to the faithful nurse, a comrade in arms, who had been by his side in all his sufferings, and done every thing he could to alleviate them, he said: "this justly belongs to you for your kindness to my son."

"No," said the nurse, "I shall not take it."

"Well," said the doctor, "take five dollars of it at least." But the nurse replied persistently, "I shall take nothing."

"Dr. H." said he, "you do not know me, but I know you."

"No," said the doctor, "I do not recognize you."

"I presume not," the nurse continued, "but do you not remember visiting and taking care of a sick woman at ——, and that when she recovered and asked for the bill, you declined receiving any thing?"

"Yes."

"That sick woman was my mother, and ever since then I have felt that if God ever permitted me, I would in some way repay your kindness to her. When your son fell wounded on the field, I had him taken to the hospital, and I have stood by him ever since, and have done every thing that I could for him, and I am thankful that I have been able to do it."

The doctor's heart was filled with gratitude and thanksgiving to God, that by "casting his bread upon the waters," it had been permitted "to return to him" in so signal a manner, even after "many days." M.

THE old proverb, "A fool can ask more questions than a wise man can answer," may very fairly have this added as a rider to it, "A wise man cannot ask more questions than he will find fools ready to answer."—Whately.

AN EARLY RESURRECTION PROMISED TO MESSIAH.

"For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." Psa. xiv.

In the second chapter of Acts, the Apostle Peter, in his memorable sermon, applies the prediction, of which the above verse forms a part, to Messiah, the exalted Saviour of the world. No time, therefore, need be occupied in determining for whom were the words in the text provided, or who was not to be left in hell, what Holy One was not to see corruption, since a more satisfactory explanation could not be desired by any resonable mind than the one contained in the discouse referred to. At once, then, we may proceed to their exposition, and, by the help of God, endeavor to open up their meaning with clearness and as much brevity as is consistent with a proper development of their contents.

I. Observe, the text is a reason for the feelings and hope expressed in the preceding verse. "My heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth; my flesh also shall rest in hope." Why? "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell," &c. The whole passage may be thrown into the promise form and read thus: "Thy," says Jehovah to his Messiah, "thy heart shall be glad, and thy glory shall rejoice; thy flesh also shall rest in hope, for thy soul will not be left in hell, thou wilt not be suffered to see corruption." Such was the prophetic promise prepared for Messiah, and trusting to the faithfulness of his Father, in due time he took it up, we doubt not, in faith, and made it his consolation while advancing toward the cross and the tomb. Then it assumed the form expressive of Messiah's unwavering confidence in it as a faithful saying, and this, in anticipation of his certainly employing it so as to express his conviction of its truth, is the shape it has in the prophetic record, "My heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth; my flesh also shall rest in hope, for thou wilt not leave my soul," &c.

II. "My soul" (napheshi) is a Hebrewism for me. Thou wilt not leav me in hell, is the form of the language when divested of its Oriental idiom. Of such a mode of expressing the idea of personality, there are a multitude of examples in the Old and New Testament. For instance: Gen. xxxiv. 8. "The soul of my son Schechem," i. e.; my son Schechem. Ps. xxxiv. 22, "The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants," i. e." the Lord redeemeth his servants. Prov. x. 3, "The Lord will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish," i. e., the Lord will not suffer the righteous to famish. Ezek. xviii. 4, "All souls are mine, as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine, the soul that sinneth it shall die."

Not unfrequently have our translators omitted the nephesh, commonly rendered soul, and given a simple utterance of its force, or the idea of personality, as we have done after the scripture quotations just made. In illustration of this statement, we may refer to such passages as these: Gen. xiv. 21, "And the King of Sodom said unto Abraham, give me the persons," (margin, souls.) Josh. xxiii. 11, "Take good heed, therefore, unto yourselves," (margin, your souls.) Judges xvi. 30, "And Samson said, let me die," (margin, let my soul die.) 1 Chron. v. 21, "And they took——of men an hundred thousand," (margin, they took of "souls of men.") Job. xxxvi. 14, "They die in youth," (margin, their soul dieth.) Jer. xxxvii. 9, "Deceive not yourselves," (margin, your souls.) 2 Cor. xii. 15, "I will very gladly spend and be spent for you," (margin, your souls.)

"Thou wilt not leave my soul," then, is clearly me, or thou wilt not leave thy Messiah in hell, &c. As the verse is constructed on the parallel principle, which is often illustrated by the Hebrew poems, it is also apparent that there is in the second division of the pasage some terms that repeat and explain certain words in the first. The terms in the first member of the verse we allude to, are "my soul," and the words that are parallel to them are clearly "thine Holy One;" and since this is the case, we may read the verse thus: "Thou wilt not leave, thy Holy One, in hell, thou wilt not suffer me, thine Holy One, to see corruption." The soul of Jehovah's Holy One just means Jehovah's Holy One himself, who was not to remain in hell, who was not to see corruption. Likewise, let it be remarked, that the second form, "thine Holy One," not merely parallels the first, "my soul" or me, but adds to its fulness by way of explanation, or by disclosing the perfection of Messiah's character. He is not merely Jehovah's One—the one dear to him; he is his Holy One, which manifests the Redeemer's character and faithfulness in his office as the revealer of God and the Saviour of men.

Viewing the text as a premise, the form in which it would originally exist in the Divine mind, and would be thrown upon the intellect of the prophet, into which shape we have already converted it above, "thy heart shall be glad—thy glory shall rejoice—thy soul shall not be left in hell—neither shall thou see corruption"—it contains a Divine testimony to the character of Messiah as the Holy One; and hence when he applies the designation to himself, he simply used the terms that were provided for him; his Father styles him his Holy One, and therefore he so describes himself, and tacitly, as we may say, employs the acknowledged fact as a plea why the promise should be realized in his experience. In the character of the Messiah, the epithet Holy One was perfectly illustrated, for he was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners;" spotless was his life, and in the end, even Judas, who was most intimately acquainted with him, who had been, as we say, admitted béhind the scenes, had no other declaration than this concerning his Master whom he betrayed, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood."

It would appear then that the phrase Holy One is not to be understood of comparitive perfection in character; on the contrary, it unquestionably denotes absolute completeness, holiness, or wholeness in him who appeared as the example and Redeemer of our race. He towered above all human beings as the cloud-touching mountain rises above the plain and its hills and palms. He was that beloved Son in whom his Father was well pleased, as was intimated by voices from the eternal throne, by the intense and incomprehensibly intimate fellowship he enjoyed with his Father, by the astonishing prodigies at this crucifixion, and his exaltation to the right hand of the Majesty on high, far above all principalities and powers, and might and dominion, and every name that is named. In virtue of his sinlessness could he die for the unjust; in virture of needing no salvation himself, could he become the Redeemer of a lost world.

III. His soul, he, the Holy One of God, was not to be left in hell, neither was he to see corruption.

The term rendered hell is sheol in the Hebrew, and in applying this prediction to Jesus Christ, and demonstrating its accomplishment in him, the Apostle Peter uses hadou, a part of the Greek word hades, which is proven by this very fact to be the Greek synonym for the Hebrew sheol. Sheol signifies the state of the dead, or a dead state, the grave, a deep pit. Frequently is it rendered grave in the Old Testament, as Ps. vi. 5, "In the grave (sheol) who shall give thee thanks?" Ps. xxx. 3, "O Lord, thou hast brought up my soul (or me) from the grave," (sheol.) Ps. xxxi. 17, "Let them (the wicked) be silent in the grave," (sheol.) Ps. lxxxix. 48, "Shall he deliver his soul (himself) from the hand of the grave," (sheol.) Prov. i. 12, "Let us swallow them up alive in the grave," (sheol.) Prov. xxx. 16, "The grave," (sheol.) Eccl. ix. 10, "There is no work, nor device, &c., in the grave, (sheol,) whither thou goest." See also Song of Sol. viii. 6, Isa. xxxviii. 10, and Rev. xx; 13, "Death and hell (hades, margin, grave,) delivered up the dead which were in them."

When a dead man is in sheol, he is of course in his grave, but the term sheol is more comprehensive or generic than the word grave as usually employed. All the dead are in sheol, or in a dead state; hades has the dead, not the living, in it, as demonstrated by Rev. xx. 13, "Death and hades delivered up the dead which were in them." Each dead man is in his grave, or keber, in the Hebrew tongue. Sheol, or hades, clasps all graves—it, like a large realm, receives the congregation of the dead, and in its silent, dark and noisome enclosure they slumber on and moulder into dust. When one goes into sheol, the poetic Hebrew mind pictures him as going into this obscure domain, which is just a state, presented under the imagery of a place, for sheol is no more a real place than death is a real being. They personified death as we do ourselves, when for instance we speak of the monster death, of his coming, of his relentlessness, meaning only thereby that men expire under an unavoidable appointment; the dead go into sheol—they are with the dead—they are like them—they are asleep and corrupting in the dust. Inasmuch as dead men are buried or covered over from the sight, it is quite correct to say of all the dead that they are in hell even, only let the true force of the English term be carefully understood. Hell is a part of the Anglo-Saxon verb helan, "to hele," or hell, heel, hill, shell, hulk, shovel, hole, wold, welt, heal, sheal, shield, shawl, i. e., "cover up." Hell, then, is a place covered up, and when men are in sheol, they are hidden from view; they are, as the Greeks said, in hades, the unseen, from a, not, and idein, to see.

The import of hell is very perceptible in the word healing. When a wound is closing, we say it is healing; when fully repaired, we say it has healed, it is now covered out of view. Thus it is quite correct to call each grave a hell, for there a corpse is hid, so that hell may stand generically for all graves and for the state of all in them, or specifically for a grave, and the state of the dead being by whom it is tenanted. Do we not speak of a grave, and of the grave? So we may discourse of hell and of a hell, (hole is twin to hell;) of sheol, and of a sheol, though the Hebrews never seem to have used the term except in a generic or comprehensive manner, (as we use the word grave in the expression the grave,) though the principles of language might fully have authorized them taking such course.

When Messiah entered sheol, he was hid, silent, praiseless and at rest; he was in the state and of course in the place where corruption is seen or undergone. Now this brings us to note the second parallelism that seems to be in the verse. The first was between the "my soul" or the me, and the Holy One; the example remaining to be considered is found in the words "in hell" and "see corruption." Let them be placed thus—

Thou wilt not leave me in hell;
Neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

To be in sheol, or in the state of the dead, is not necessarily to see corruption; it is, however, certainly to be where in all ordinary cases it is seen or undergone, and where no one is long without suffering decompostion. Lazarus, for instance, was in sheol, and he had been so long in a condition of death in the tomb, that his sister thought corruption must at the date of her conversation with our Lord, have had a commencement; she said, "Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead (buried?) four days." John xi. 39. The soul of Messiah, or Messiah himself, could die then; for he did expire on the cross; could see corruption since he needed to be preserved from it, and the words before us are the promise that he would. Had the verse ran, Thou wilt not suffer me to see sheol, the meaning would have been, thou wilt not permit me to die; had it been only, thou wilt not leave me in sheol, the sense would have been, thou wilt give me a ressurrection, without at all intimating when it would be effected; and as it stands, we learn that Messiah was to die, for he was to enter sheol, and also that he would be soon resurrected, since he was not in sheol even to see corruption.

The whole verse, then, is equivalent to a declaration that Messiah should have a very early resurrection; one before corruption had commenced, which in the climate of Judea was commenced much sooner than with us, in consequence of its warmer temperature, which is universally known to accelerate the process of decay and dissolution. From the gospels we discover that Messiah expected such a restoration to life, as we read in Matt. xx. 18–19, "The chief priests and—— scribes shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles to mock and to scourge and to crucify him, and third day he shall rise again." Matt. xii. 40, "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." On the morning of the third day, in spite of every effort by his foes, he awoke from the sleep of death, and came forth the spoiler of the grave.

"And did he rise?
Hear, O ye nations, hear it, O ye dead!
He rose, he rose! and burst the bars of death."

From the sepulchre he issued forth to die no more; death has no more dominion over him—he ever liveth to make intercession for us. "With long life"—length of days—"will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation."

IV. We would suggest a few remarks of a more practical nature, arising out of the preceding statements.

1. Observe how the faithfulness of Jehovah was manifested toward Messiah.

It was more than a thousand years after the promise in the text was first delivered, ere it had its fulfilment, and how exactly and truthfully was it accomplished? The blessed Redeemer trusted and was not put to shame; his hopes were realized, his predicted triumph was gained. "He was not left in sheol, neither did he see corruption." As the Prince of believers, he sets us an example by his confidence in his Father's testimony—he staggered not at the promises—he was strong in the faith, giving glory to him who had sent him into the world. Thus he was the Holy One—pre-eminently the Holy One—who, in virtue of his faith, the fountain of peace and of power, finished the work which had been given him to do. And why should we ever be unbelievers? Why should we ever for a moment dishonor, by our suspicions, the God who cannot lie? We have no less reason to trust the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ than the Saviour himself; he trusted, took his Father at his simple word—and is that word less real, less true to us than it was to him? Has not the Father of all one character—the changeless in love and faithfulness? Let us then learn to be loyal subjects and bold believers, act on the conviction in our journey through life, amid its caresand wants, and sorrows and toils, and fears and foes, that "heaven and earth may pass away," but one promise towards us who are his sons, by a gracious generation shall not pass away, or come short of the millionth part of a line of its perfect and literal accomplishment. With thine eye, O my brother, scan the future, studed with star-promises each of them vocal, telling thee of transcendent glories, of unfading joys, and listen with expanded ear, for the voice that speaks is the voice of God.

2. Observe, the blessed Jesus can sympathize with us in life and in death. Had he only lived for a while below, in toil and sorrow, and then departed, say from Gethsemane to heaven, he would have had no experience of death, and of course less ability to sympathize with his friends when entering the valley of shadows, and in their aversion from the silence and corruption toward which it conducts. But he so lived and also died; he can therefore feel for the living, and for the dying. In what situation can we be placed of which he had not experience in the days of his flesh, while he was a pilgrim through the vale of tears? Once he was young, and with the "lambs" he has a fellow-feeling; so with the tried, so with the bereaved, so with the poor, so with the persecuted, so with the betrayed and calumniated, and so with the dying in their mortal pangs. We are nearly ignorant of his celestial joys, yet he knows well our terrestrial experiences. We cannot apprehend his glory, but he knows right well our gloom. Truly, he is touched with a feeling of our infirmites, and is not merely impressed and moved by them, but can yield us from his vast stores those measures of consolation and fortitude which we require. Having passed through the stages of common humanity, and had trials beyond all we will ever be called upon to endure; having climbed the mountains and trod the valleys; having seen night starry and starless; having groaned in death and entered the thick darkness of sheol, he is competent in every sense to be a present help in the hour of need.

3. Observe, that through the fulfilment of this promise to Messiah, he has become the first fruits of them that slept. Had he not descended to the grave, and triumphed over death, there would have been for us no joy, no hope of a return from the land of sheol, to the activity of conscious being. "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; and they that have fallen asleep in Christ are perished," it is all over with them for ever; the eye-lids of the grave are eternally closed. But he who died for us, has risen again, and life and immortality have been brought sensibly to light by his reanimated and glorified existence. His holy ones, who have been washed in his blood and made meet for a sublimer destiny, will yet awake from the repose of death. Yet see on yonder side the tomb, the king in his beauty, and the kingdom over which he is to reign. Unless he speedily returns to earth, the reader and writer will enter into sheol, and return to dust, like the companies who have already been gathered to their fathers; the dominion of death over us, however, shall not be perpetual, and if we have in this life sought for "glory, and honor, and immortality," this mortal shall be exchanged for immortality and this corruptible for incorruption. Rather would we like Paul, have "mortality swallowed up of life," and thereby be saved the necessity of entering the dark portals and the halls of oblivion; we can only be there, however, for a time, and thanks be unto God who giveth us the hope of emancipation from the bondage of the sepulchre. The sleep, however long it may last, will appear but a momentary dream; the blaze of immortality will seem instantly to have followed the blow of death. We shall not be left in sheol, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it, and the glorified Immanuel, our divine Brother, is the pledge and model and power of our own resurrection.

Finally. Never let us forget that in the resurrection of Jesus, there was shown the divine immense compassion for our race. God so loved the world that he devoted to death for us his only begotten Son, that through his dying, death might be destroyed, and that we might escape the destruction which sin entails. For ages the hymn of love divine has been composing, and the drama of infinite compassion enacting before this world and the universe. What a scene was developed in Eden; what thrilling promises had fallen on the ears of ancient prophets and saints; what a forthcoming was shown in the manger, and on the accursed tree; what an unrollment when the tomb of Joseph was emptied, and what a transcendent and enduring vision will be unveiled when we shall be like him, seeing him as he is! Call it all the song, the poem, the labor of divine compassion for man, designed to attract the eye of the thoughtless, to move the affections of the torpid, to quicken and elevate the morally degraded. We can only by viewing it in different lights and from various positions, see its vastness, discover it as the shoreless incomprehensible. God with man, for man, in view of man, and in man! Love producing being, and consuming sin; love saving being and confronting death, and sheol with threatening that will soon be summarily executed. This love, O reader! is thy God, for God, the author of thy being, is love. Over thee he watches from hour to hour with a parent's solicitude, and on account of thy sins, if still thou art rebellious, he is moved in sorrow; even for thy return he longs with ardor, and will rejoice to clasp thee instantly to his bosom. He is now in Christ wishing, not that thou mayest endeavor to reconcile him, but that thou wouldest be reconciled to thy God. "Be ye reconciled unto God." Be ye—ye—O sinner, be ye reconciled unto him. Amen.

WHAT IS THE BAPTISM OF FIRE?

In a late No. of the Herald of Life, I noticed an expression, by one who was making some remarks on baptism; he says, "May we have the baptism of fire." I asked myself—, what was the baptism of fire? Was it a blessing, a thing to be desired? or was it a thing to be dreaded? I will suggest this idea, that others may think of it. While the true child of God will be baptized with the Holy Spirit; these who are not of Christ will be baptized with fire. "When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengence on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Thess. i. 7, 8. "A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about." Psa. 97, 3.

Now let us notice how the Evangelists record this expression of John the Baptist. Mathew represents John as speaking to a mixed multitude. Some of them no doubt, submitted to his baptism, bringing forth fruits meet for repentance; while others he addressed as a "generation of vipers," while he tells them that "every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire." Then he speaks to his disciples: "I indeed baptize you with water." While addressing both classes he says—"He (Jesus) shall baptize thee with the Holy Ghost and with fire." Then he continues his address to the mixed multitude: "Whose fan is in his hand, and he shall thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." Now observe how Mark records this address. He represents John as speaking only to one class. "And there went out to him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were baptized of him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins." To this class he says, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." He says nothing about fire to them. Luke in his account represents John as speaking to a mixed multitude, and he uses the expression, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. While John represents him as speaking only to believers, and there he says nothing about fire. There are only two other passages that I am aware of, that refer to this promise. Acts. i. 5 Jesus says to his disciples, "For John truly baptized with water; bnt ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence." He says nothing about fire.

Peter in alluding to the outporing of the Holy Spirit while he was preaching to Cornelius, says in Acts xi. 16, "Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." While I have some doubts about desiring to be baptized with fire; I sincerely desire to be baptized with the Holy Spirit.

Yours in love. W. Patterson

Delhi, Del. Co, N. Y.

Note by J. T. C.—My brother's argument seems to have strength in it, and perhaps he has the correct idea of the baptism of fire. But many think that the expression was a prediction of the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. "There appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon them, and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit." It is one thing to have the Holy Spirit and it is another thing to be filled with it. All of Christ's disciples have the Spirit, but all are not filled with it. God employs especial agencies to be instrumental in especial work. When his children are called—not only to be disciples but—to be especial instruments in spreading his truth, they receive an especial gift of the Spirit. Such an one would say with the prophet Jeremiah—"His word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones." Such a gift of the Spirit might be called the baptism of fire to distinguish it from the ordinary gift.

Still another interpretation may be suggested, which would make all disciples have the baptism of fire. The work of the Spirit is a purifying work in the believer. As fire burns chaff, so the Spirit burns the evil which would prevent our healthy growth in divine things. We are not saved as animal men. We are begotten anew by the Holy Spirit, and the inner man thus begotten grows stronger and stronger while the outward grows weaker and weaker. The power thus working may be said to burn up the chaff in us, as the hymn has it

The dross to consume, and the gold to refine."

Some such idea is contained in Mark ix. 49, 50. "For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Salt is good, but if the salt have lost his saltness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another." The salt which we have in ourselves appears to refer to our condition as affected by the presence of the Holy Spirit. As salt indicates preservation, so the Spirit preserves. As the sacrifices in the Mosaic economy were salted with salt, so we the living sacrifices, holy, acceptable unto God, are salted by the Holy Spirit. But our salt has two powers; it not only preserves that which is good, but it burns what is evil. The moment we cease to allow the Spirit to continue its double work of preserving and burning, salt loses its saltness. Malachi iii. 2, 3 may refer to the burning work of the Spirit, but the interpretation given by Br. Patterson may suit the passage better than the one we have given.

CONSOLATION IN SORROW.

Lonely Pilgrim: though thou may'st drink the bitter dregs of sorrow, or sink beneath the weight of grief or care, yet thy Master's footsteps have trod the same gloomy pathway, and he, the mighty Son of God, has drained the same cup of sorrow. The pale and meagre train of poverty, may surround thee, and disease have blighted every earthly hope, know our Saviour had not where to lay his head: "he was a man of sorrow acquainted with grief."

Thy loved ones may lie low 'neath the sods of the valley, heedless of thy bitter weeping, and thy longings for the footsteps that never come: remember Jesus wept at the grave of his beloved friend. He knows how deep affection's fount can be.

Do those who once thou didst fondly love and trust, and thought naught but death could ever sever the affection that bound thee, now, with averted looks pass the coldly by? Weep not; thy Master was denied; for thee he suffered an ignominious death upon the cross; for thee he burst the bands of death assunder and rose triumphat to insure a life in the future for those who love him.

"What matters earth's sadness and toil, brother,
If we but that future life see;
There will be ample time for rejoicing and rest—
There is life in the future for thee."

AFTER MANY DAYS.

Dr. H. is a physician of considerable ability, and of extensive practice in the eastern part of Connecticut: a man of large benevolence and deep Christian sympathy, using his skill in his profession, not for personal advantages alone, but for the benefit of his suffering fellow men. Cheerfully were his services rendered to the poor and destitute without thought of remuneration. Yet, as will be seen from the following incident, this labor of love returns with tenfold interest into the doctor's bosom.

A son of the doctor, a Lieutenant in one of our Connecticut regiments, being severely wounded in battle, was taken to the hospital. When word reached the father, he immediately started for Washington, where he found his son still alive, but rapidly failing, although every thing possible was done for him by hospital surgeons, stewards, and nurses, yet soon after the arrival of his father the young man died—willing to give up his life for his country.

In examining his clothes, the father found in his pocket-book a small sum of money. This he took, and turning to the faithful nurse, a comrade in arms, who had been by his side in all his sufferings, and done every thing he could to alleviate them, he said: "this justly belongs to you for your kindness to my son."

"No," said the nurse, "I shall not take it."

"Well," said the doctor, "take five dollars of it at least." But the nurse replied persistently, "I shall take nothing."

"Dr. H." said he, "you do not know me, but I know you."

"No," said the doctor, "I do not recognize you."

"I presume not," the nurse continued, "but do you not remember visiting and taking care of a sick woman at ———, and that when she recovered and asked for the bill, you declined receiving any thing?"

"Yes."

"That sick woman was my mother, and ever since then I have felt that if God ever permitted me, I would in some way repay your kindness to her. When your son fell wounded on the field, I had him taken to the hospital, and I have stood by him ever since, and have done every thing that I could for him, and I am thankful that I have been able to do it."

The doctor's heart was filled with gratitude and thanksgiving to God, that by "casting his bread upon the waters," it had been permitted "to return to him" in so signal a manner, even after "many days." M.

The old proverb, "A fool can ask more questions than a wise man can answer," may very fairly have this added as a rider to it, "A wise man cannot ask more questions than he will find fools ready to answer."—Whately.

A PLEA FOR THE JEWS.

BY G. R. LEDERER, EDITOR OF THE ISRAELITE INDEED, TO ONE OF HIS BRETHREN.

MY DEAR BROTHER:—Your very brief, but nevertheless kind letter, with its paper contents, was duly received day before yesterday. God bless you! It came in the right time to fill up the gap in my printer's account. (It is singular, however, that to poor people money comes always in the right time, because they have always to fill some gap or other.) Are you not surprised how slow our Christian friends are in doing something for the Jewish missionary cause? I am very glad indeed that you gave up the idea of laboring as a missionary among the Jews; you would have to struggle for the bare bread, with your numerous family. It is wonderful, indeed! Where lies the ground? Is it the unrelenting curse which rests upon Israel? Or is it in the vain pride of Gentile Christians who fell into that fatal mistake against which the Apostle Paul warned them, namely, in the boasting against the natural, but now broken off branches of the olive tree, which indeed were broken off in order that they who by nature were wild might be grafted in? There are two things which they generally bring forward against missions to the Jews:—1. They say "that the time for the conversion of Israel has not yet come, and that their conversion will not be through the instrumentality of missionary labor, but the Lord Himself will at once change their hearts, "and a nation will be born in a day." Admitted: but this is the case with the conversion of Israel as a nation; this, the present dispensation, however, is not for the conversion of entire nations, it is only for the "taking out from among all nations a people of His own." In proof of this, you need only look upon the labor of more than 1800 years. Is there a converted nation upon the earth? Can it be said that there is a Christian nation? No, certainly not. England and America are the two countries where most converts or real Christians may be found; and still they would not, if carefully sifted—like one sifts the tares from the wheat—number 25 per cent. Where then is the boasting? Israel, as a nation, will be converted in God's own time, when they will see His feet standing upon the Mount of Olives; but as to indiviuals, they are under the same process like all other nations; here a little and there a little, one of a city and two of a family, they are taken out to be numbered among that people which He takes out from among all nations for his own, to be his associates and co-rulers at his coming. 2. They say that "so many so-called converted Jews impose upon the Christian community, which proves that impure motives caused them to profess a belief in Christ; ergo, no Jew is really converted, and every effort to this cause is vain, and the means expended thrown away." Admitted, again, that there have been, and still are, many rogues among those Jews who professed Christianity; but, can the iniquity of some make the word of God of none effect? If only one among a hundred be found sincere, Christians could not say that their labor or expenditure was in vain; "there is more joy in Heaven over one converted sinner than over ninety-nine righteous." But, praise God, sincere converts are not in such a minority; to the contrary, there are not three among every ten of Hebrews professing Christianity whose walk and conversation are not in accordance with their profession, and not one among ten who proves to be an impostor.

Why, then, for the Lord's sake, I would ask our Christian brethren, do they not look upon us, you and I, and a hundred others who devoted their lives to the service of him whom they profess as their Lord, and who have been tried in the crucible of persecution, afflictions of every kind, and temptations of the most alluring character, and were found as pure and steady as gold? Why, sir, do they not look upon a number of converted Jews who professed Christ, forty and forty-five years ago, and have during so long a period proved true as steel in all positions of life? Why, looking upon some poor fellows to whom the Gospel became the "savor of death unto death;" are not such to be found among converts from Roman Catholics or Heathens?

You see, then, dear brother, that both excuses fall to the ground: they serve only as pretences to cover the unwillingness of many of our Christian brethren to do their share in Israel's sacred cause. Yet we have reason to rejoice and praise the Lord for his goodness. Israel is not cast off entirely; the Gospel light penetrates many a Jewish heart, and conversions are not rare in our days. Many true sons and daughters of Abraham give their hearts to Christ, of whom the world outside of the Church with which they are united know very little. The Israelite Indeed has been, in many cases, the means of leading sinners to investigate the Scriptures, which resulted in their conversion and union with the visible Church of Christ.

Many of my friends are surprised that I succeeded in carrying the publication of The Israel Indeed through these perilous times of war and rumors of war, while scores of religious periodicals died away without a hope of a resurrection. But these friends do not know how I labored, and how often I wrestled with God in prayer, like our father Jacob, until like him I prevailed. It is, indeed bordering on the wondrous, and it confirms me in my belief that the Lord approves of my work, and will continue to sustain me. Yet He wills that we do our part; we must labor, we must try to raise new friends for our sacred cause, and the Lord will bless our efforts.

NEW YORK, MAY 10, 1865.

"Not Answered!"—Luke xi. 31, 32.

The Crisis account of the recent debate between its editor and myself is meager, one-sided, and inaccurate. Whether this be so or not our readers will be enabled to determine, inasmuch as Br. Grant's entire report will be reproduced piecemeal in our columns. Its meagerness consists in its giving so very few of the many points and arguments that made up the discussion; its one-sidedness, in its entire omission to cite any of the numerous Bible arguments that were employed by the affirmative to prove "the non-resurrection of the wicked;" its inaccuracy, partly in its failure to represent correctly the position and course of the affirmative in relation to the "few prominent points" of which it professes to give an acconnt.

It is not too late for Br. G. to supplement what he has already published with a report that shall be more ample, more impartial, and more correct. It remains to be seen whether he recognizes the fairness of the claim made upon him in this direction. "We trust," says he to his readers, "that the cause of truth has been richly benefitted by the debate on this important question." Many others share with him in this feeling; and if it be a well-founded one, it needs no argument to prove that "the cause of truth" could receive no damage by a full and fair presentation, in the Crisis, of all "the prominent points" and reasonings adduced in "the debate"—which, Br. G. also says, "was one of much interest to those who attended." Should my brother conclude to furnish the further report here suggested, he will be greatly aided in his work by what has been given, and will yet appear, on the subject in the HERALD OF LIFE He has been privately requested to call my attention promptly to anything that I may publish concerning the debate that he may deem erroneous or unjust. Our readers will be notified if he in a single instance does this.

Br. G. in his first speech kindly assured our audience that his opponent was one who would be very careful and reliable in all his quotations of whatever kind and in his statement of fact. The affirmative is not aware that any occasion was given during the debate to modify this favorable estimate; and he now declares his readiness at any time to correct any statements in his articles that he can be shown are calculated to produce a false impression. It will be gratifying to witness in his Crisis brother a disposition to reciprocate this feeling.

AN ITEM FROM THE CRISIS "REPORT."

Thus much in a general way. An extract will now be given from the Crisis account of the debate, with such comments as seem proper. Br. Grant says:—

"Luke xi. 31, 32, was presented as further proof that there must be a resurrection of the wicked:—'The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and condemn them; for she came from the utmost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, behold, a greater than Solomon is here. The men of Ninevah shall rise up in the judgment with this generation and shall condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonas, and behold, a greater than Jonas is here.' This Scripture was not answered by the affirmative. The word anisteemi, rendered 'shall rise,' is twenty-three times applied to the resurrection of Christ, and signifies a literal resurrection."

The two sentences in the foregoing that are not Scripture are open to criticism in several particulars. The Crisis will please take notice and begin to revise its "report."

1. Br. G. is entirely mistaken in saying that the passage he cites "was not answered by the affirmative." It was answered in my last speech, and the remarks offered were seen at the time to produce a marked impression on many persons in the audience. Of this more presently.

2. Br. G. conveys the idea that anisteemi occurs in Luke xi. 31, which is a mistake. The word redered "shall rise up" in that passage is "egiro."

3. Br. G. errs in saying that anisteemi is rendered "shall rise" in Luke xi. 32. The rendering is "shall rise up."

4. The word anisteemi is not so often as "twenty-three times applied to the resurrection of Christ" by the inspired writers. If Br. G. thinks he can refute this assertion, let him try it. Produce your "twenty-three" instances!

5. Br. G.'s reference to the use of anisteemi is faulty in the respect that it gives some intelligent readers—a great many, for aught that I know—the false impression that the word occurs but twenty-five times in the New Testament. His interpretation of his proof-text thus receives countenance to which it is not entitled. It is the easiest thing in the world to make a statement that is verbally accurate tell what is not true. Just let the Crisis readers know that anisteemi is found about (I think precisely) one hundred and twelve (112) times in the Received Text of the N. T., and they may at once care to be informed whether its usual sense is that which Br. G. affirms that it bears in the passage under consideration.

6. Br. G.'s statement, though it does not say it in so many words, fairly implies to most readers that the only meaning of anisteemi is "a literal resurrection." It seems to me that he should now publish the fact that the word, in a majority of the places where it occurs in the N. T., refers to nothing of the kind. Often it does refer to the resurrection of the dead; but, according to Dr. Robinson, its proper and literal sense is to wake up, to rise up "from a sitting posture." Dr. R. gives it a tropical sense in Luke xi. 32, and of course dissents from Br. G.'s application of it to the resurrection in that text. In his paragraph illustrating the tropical sense, Robinson says: "Also i. q. to appear, to stand forth; e. g. before a tribunal Matt. xii. 41, Luke xi. 32," etc. I am not aware indeed that Br. G.'s application of the term in Luke xi. 32 has the sanction of any reputable expositor who holds to the resurrection of the entire race. In this connection it may be stated that egiro, the term rendered "shall rise up" in Luke xi. 31, and occurring (if I have counted right) one-hundred and forty-one (141) times in the N. T., when applied to the resurrection of the dead is only so used in one of its tropical meanings. (See Rob. Lex.)

Coming now to Br. G.'s assertion that the passage under notice "was not answered" by me, I wish to remind him, and inform others, of what was actually done in the case. First, I called attention to the negative's position on the passage, viz., that the queen of south, the men of Ninevah, and those denoted by the words "this generation" will all rise from the dead simultaneously. Now—I continued—if this be so, and if it be true, as G. contends, that the righteous rise a thousand years before the wicked, it follows that the doom of those called "this generation" will be the doom also of "the queen of the south" and of "the men of Nineveh." And that doom is eternal perdition. But, if this terrible fate awaits "the men of Nineveh"—which I deny—the only reason given for it in our passage is "because they repented at the preaching of Jonas"! Not a very conclusive reason, one should suppose, for raising men from the dead and killing them afterwards!

Thus in substance was shown the utter futility of Br. G.'s explanation of the verses before us. As he had no chance in the debate to respond to my remarks, I beg him to tell us now, editorially, whether he believes the repentant Ninevites and the queen of the south are to be damned, and whether he understands the merciful Redeemer's words to teach this. If they must perish, tell us on what ground. If not, then tell us how they are to rise "with" the wicked dead. Would not the precious "cause of truth" be "richly benefitted" by straightforward attempts to face these and kindred difficulties which lie in the way of the doctrine that dead sinners will live again? Or is my late opponent willing to have it known that they remain "not answered," and believe that they are—as the Life advocates may confidently affirm them to be—unanswerable?

I will only add, that the interpretation I offered of Luke xi. 31, 32 in the debate was in effect this: that "the judgment" the passage brings to view is in the past; and that the impenitence of those called "the men of this generation" was, in that "judgment," condemned by the fact that—while the preaching of the Son of God was spurned—the preaching of Christ's inferior, "Jonas," was heeded and produced repentance. The "rising up" I did not regard as literal. Some things that might have been said on the passage, but were not, must be reserved for a separate article which need have no allusion to the debate. I regard it as indubitably certain that the "judgment" twice named in the passage is not future, but past. R. W.

Salem, Mass., May 5, 1865.

DANIEL xii. 2.

My further discussion of this passage in the paper will be deferred until I receive from Prof. Vail a reply to my letter published last week. He will write me on the subject so soon as he has leisure and health to do so. At present he is attending various Conferences. My letter found him at Staten Island and was acknowledged as soon as received. It may be proper here to say that there seems to be no truth in the statement, which I have made on the authority of "Retribution," that Prof. Whiting refers the "shame" and "contempt" of Dan. xii. 2 to a class that do not awake. Prof. W.'s letter to Br. Grant (of which more hereafter) clearly indicates that such is not his view. And I also learned this fact recently from his own statement in a personal interview. I know not the source whence the author of "Retribution" derived his wrong information. R. W.

"Thy Kingdom Come."

In offering some additional remarks on the coming kingdom we start with what was proved last week,—the kingdom for the advent of which we are taught to pray is the kingdom of Israel with the rebuilt throne of David. Zedekiah was the last representative of David's dynasty that sat on the throne of Israel. Four years before the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and the removal of Zedekiah to Babylon, the word of YAHVEH came through the prophet Ezekiel to Zedekiah, saying: "And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, Thus saith the Lord Yahveh, Remove the diadem, and take off the crown, this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. Perverted, perverted, perverted will I make it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him." Ezek. xxi. 25. The Davidic dynasty was then overthrown according to the solemn prediction. But the same word which declared the utter perversion of that government also affirmed its ultimate reconstruction. The same "it" which was overthrown is to be given to him "whose right it is." What was overturned? The throne of David in Jerusalem. What will be restored? The throne of David in Jerusalem. Who possessed the government of Israel at the time of its overthrow? An heir of David. Who will possess the government of Israel when it is rebuilt? An heir of David.

"It shall be no more until he come whose right it is." Who has the "right"? Gabriel said to Mary "Thou shalt bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 31–33. Then will be fulfilled the prophecy of Micah. "In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, [Judah] and I will gather her that is driven out and her that I have afflicted [Israel]; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation; and the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth, even for ever." Micah iv. 6, 7.

Thus there can be no question as to the facts. The time when these things will take place is another question. Many people at the present day make inquiries as to the times and the seasons, but fail to interest themselves as to the events themselves. That Jesus is coming is blessed and glorious news, but the object of his coming is no less blessed and glorious. The prayer taught by Jesus is not—"Thy Jesus come" but "Thy kingdom come." We want Jesus to come because we want the kingdom to come. Our desires will not be realized until the blest moment

Shall meet on royal Zion's height.

How admirable was the faith of the Psalmist who still held fast the beginning of his confidence even after the overthrow of David's house. "Then thou spakest in vision to thy Holy one, and saidst, I have laid help upon one that is mighty; I have exalted one chosen out of the people. I have found David my servant; with my holy oil have I anointed him . . . . I will make him my first-born higher than the kings of the earth. My mercy will I keep for him forevermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him. His seed also will I make to endure forever, and his throne as the days of heaven. If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; if they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless my lovingkindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure forever and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established forever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven. But thou hast cast off and abhorred, thou hast been wroth with thine anointed. Thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant; thou hast profaned his crown to the ground. Thou hast broken down all his hedges; thou hast brought his strong holds to ruin. All that pass by the way spoil him [all the Gentile powers oppress and spoil the land of Palestine]; he is a reproach to his neighbors. . . . Thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground. How long Lord? wilt thou hide thyself for ever? Shall thy wrath burn like fire [which consumes that which is given to it] . . . . Lord, where are thy former lovingkindness thou swearest unto David in thy truth? Remember, Lord, the reproach of thy servants (I do bear in my bosom all the mighty people;) wherewith thine enemies have reproached, O Lord; wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine annointed." Ps. lxxxix. Here again we have the real prayer. "Thy kingdom come." The words are not repeated for the sake of repetition: something is desired, the desire is expressed, and the answer is expected with confidence. "How long, Lord?" is the cry of the anxious soul. "Wilt thou hide thyself for ever? Is not this the very prayer taught by Jesus? The heir to David's throne exhorts his disciples to pray for the establishment of their Lord in his legitimate seat. Could prayer be more just?

"Love Your Enemies."

Our readers may have remarked how promptly the United States authorities supplied the pressing wants of the citizens of Savannah, after its capture. We now have still another signal instance of true mercy to our enemies. The Richmond Times 24th inst., says:

"We are authorized to announce that by order of the military authorities, the Commissaries of Subsistence of the United States army in this city, will begin to-day to issue to all citizens bread at 6 cents per loaf, of 18 ounces. The humanity of this move, prompted by the considerate thoughtfulness of the military authorities, cannot be over estimated. There are to day thousands of our citizens, male and female, but chiefly the latter, who, living in unwilling but unavoidable idleness, are without the means of subsistence. Over 5,000 of these persons (females) up to the time of the evacuation, earned, by making soldiers' clothing, a scanty livelihood, eked out by supplies as the Citizen's Relief Committee could furnish. During the last three weeks many of them must have perished, but for the relief opportunely and paternally afforded them by the United States authorities."

"Worse Than Damnation."

"In the darkness, like his great crime, may it remain forever, impalpable, invisible, nondescript, condemned to that worse than damnation, annihilation."

Thus writes a city journalist concerning the carcass of the wretch now doomed to the contempt of all time. We call attention to the language, as an acknowledgment of the truth contended for by us that the literal destruction of a being is the highest penalty known in God's administration. Damnation properly means condemnation. It does not signify punishment in itself, but it is the necessary antecedent to punishment. The journal from which we quote uses the word in its popular sense. By 'damnation' is meant eternal conscious existence in misery. There is, however, something worse than orthodox damnation, our opposers themselves being judges, and that is "annihilation." This is common sense, for the orthodox Damnation is a mere figment of disordered imagination, but the destruction of the ungodly is one of the clearest and most frequent announcements of our God. It is not only more terrible in anticipation, but it is the certain, inevitable, eternal doom of the incorrigible. "They are extinct, they are quenched as tow." Isa. xlii. 17. The faithful preaching of the mortality of man, and his need of a Life-Giver to bring him from hades, would be an unspeakable blessing to the Israel of God. It would rebuke men for their forbidden wanderings away from the Bible, it would place the Divine attributes of Justice and Mercy in their true light before the human mind, it would show the real thing to be feared—"the grand evil," as Stephen Olin called it, even "this horror of being nothing."

Abraham Lincoln.

"As a rule I doubt if any President has ever shown such trust in God or in public documents so frequently referred to Divine aid. Often did he remark to friends and to delegations, that his hope of our success rested in his conviction that God would bless our efforts because we were trying to do right. To the address of a large religious body he replied, "Thanks be unto God, who in our national trials, giveth us the churches." To a minister who said he hoped the Lord was on our side he replied, it gave him no concern whether the Lord was on our side or not, for, he added, 'I know the Lord is always on the side of the right,' and, with deep feeling added: 'But God is my witness that it is my constant anxiety and prayer that both myself and this nation should be on the Lord's side.'"

The Assassination in Europe.

As anticipated, the tidings of Mr. Lincoln's murder created immense excitement and universal horror in Europe. By the steamers Hibernia and America, the former having advices up to the 28th ult., we have the following:

In the English House of Lords on Thursday night, Earl Russell, and in the House of Commons, Sir George Grey, (on behalf of Lord Palmerston,) gave notice that they would on the 1st of May, move an address to the Queen expressing sorrow and indignation at the assassination of President Lincoln, and praying her to convey that expression of feeling to the American Government.

Two great meetings were held in Liverpool, which, after appropriate speeches had been delivered, adopted unanimously resolutions expressive of their horror and deep sorrow at the assassination.

The commercial body of London adopted similar resolutions, and likewise the official bodies in the various towns and provinces.

The Americans in London assembled in Grosvernor Hotel, on invitation of Mr. F. Wood. The meeting adjourned till the 1st of May, when Minister Adams will preside at a mass meeting of Americans at St. James Hall.

Mr. Mason, (rebel,) in a letter to the Index, repudiates the crime in behalf of the rebel States.

The Italian Chamber of Deputies has adopted an address expressing grief at President Lincoln's assassination, and the Chamber was draped in his honor.

Paris letters state that the most profound and universal regret and indignation is expressed there at the assassination.

Immortality: Can Reason Discover It?

"Descending from Deity to man, we notice his efforts to prove his own immortality. It has been common to establish, by a series of negative conclusions, that soul or spirit is not subject to the laws of matter, and then from immateriality to conclude immortality, or imperishability. But why such an inference? Is it that we see matter constantly perishing, and, from the unlikeness of spirit in other respects, we infer dissimilitude in this also? Such deduction were even then illogical; but on the other hand, matter does not perish obviously; and we suppose, cannot, except by the hand of the Omnipotent. The power which created, could doubtless uncreate; and if this be true, no reason can be given why spirit is not, equally with matter, obnoxious to such a fate. It is only in its organic forms, and the principle of physical life, that matter seems to lack permanence and durability—mere conditions of matter, and conditions in which, if approximation could be said at all, it approaches nearest the nature of spirit.

"But this argument is generally abandoned now by those at all conversant with the subject, and that on which reliance is had, casts itself into this form:—It is asserted that the soul can perish in but one of three ways, to wit: either by dissolution, by privation, or by annihilation. Granted; and what next? First: —That which is without parts cannot be dissolved. The soul is simple and uncompounded; therefore, it cannot perish by dissolution. So we believe; but not by virtue of this syllogism. To say nothing of the fallacy lurking in the ambiguous forms of the major term, the second premiss here assumes to define the nature of spirit, whereas it is only shown that we cannot define it. Water and air were believed to be simple and uncompounded elements. Platinum and hydrogen are still believed to be so. Some substances which are reckoned such now, are strongly suspected to be compound. Of spirit we can only affirm, in this regard, that it cannot be subjected to analasis, and, for aught we know, may be the most simple or the most complex thing created,

"But, secondly, What can be said of privation? By this term our metaphysicians seem to understand, the soul's ceasing to exist, or gradually relinquishing life by the tendencies of its own nature. And they argue that, if its natural tendency be to death, it will by virtue of this property, at some period, cease to exist; if its tendency be to life, it will live forever. And that it now exists, they claim as sufficient evidence that its natural tendency is to existence. What is this, but stark atheism?—a making of certain properties necessarily inherent in the soul? If God created the soul, it was for him to give it its conditions of existence; and for aught that human reason can tell, it were as easy for him to make the condition of the soul's existence the life of the body, as to make the presence of light the condition of colors.

"The third point—that the Almighty can annihilate the soul—may not be questioned; and whether he will, must obviously be matter of revelation, that philosophy even must consent to resign us to that source of instruction."—Prof. Johnson, Dickinson College, 1853.

To The Herald and its Friends.

BY MRS. L. R. K. BISHOP.

DEAR "HERALD:"—I have been thinking of of you much of late. And indeed you occupied a prominent place in my thoughts, and a very warm place in my affections, ever since they christened you "Herald of Life, and of the Coming Kingdom," under the spreading branches of that ever-to-be-remembered "chestnut tree." (May it never "see when heat cometh;" and may its beautiful leaves be always green!) How many hopes sprang into joyful existence under its shadow! Do you ask, have they been realized? That is hardly a proper question. Men do not count their sheaves while yet the upturned furrows wait the precious seed. They do not forget, that what they bear upon their shoulders into the field in Spring-time, may fill the capacious cart until it groans beneath its weight of golden grain, in time of harvest; and they sow in hope.

This is our sowing time; the harvest "is not yet." 'Tis our work to sow the seed, but "God giveth the increase." Shall we sow sparingly? Shall we clutch the handful of precious seed entrusted to our care, and forbear to cast it into the soil, because it is a little handful, or because we fear it will be trampled upon? Just as though the feet of the horse or the ox did not always trample on the seed sown. And sometimes the heavy roller is put on, and it makes a smooth surface; but does the tiny seed thus trampled out of sight forget to grow? Ask the reapers, who come to gather in the bountiful harvest. Even so they who now "go forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them."

Would we join the "glad harvest-shouting" in that hour of triumph? Then let there be no shrinking from duty—no shrinking responsibility now.

Moses held up his hands; Aaron and Hur staid them up, and Israel prevailed. But it was only because all their chosen men were in the conflict, and that too with drawn swords.

Do you want a "live paper?" Then cheer the heart of our dear, aged, gray-hair EDITOR with "living epistles," filled with "thoughts that breathe and words that burn." Do you ask that it may contain a variety suited to every capacity and to every taste that is in harmony with truth and righteousness? Then let there be a variety of gifts exercised. Do not require that a man shall be able to wear Saul's armor, and then ask him to carry David's sling too. Let him wield the sword who can; and God strengthen his right arm. But shall we who cannot, therefore refuse to pick up smooth stones out of the brook? If we had been bidden to do some great thing, would we not have done it?

Are any of us sad and distressed because some of our brethren of the "Herald" family do not believe as we do on some points, and do we allow it, in the least degree, to paralyze our efforts for the spread of truth? Let us not forget that we differ as widely from them, as they do from us. And if we, with any given truth, cannot be as patient toward our brethren who differ from us, as they can toward us without it, the presumption is, that either we are mistaken in thinking we have the truth on that point, or if not, it has for some cause, failed to have a sanctifying effect upon our hearts.

Whatever may be thought of those scriptures where controverted views claim parentage, it must be admitted on all hands, that there is little ambiguity in the Saviour's language—"All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." This is the gospel "straight-edge," by which men can measure their own conduct; and they who use it most, will be the least likely to judge "another man's servant," or to forget that "to his own master he must stand or fall." Then let us love as brethren be pitiful, be courteous." "Tithe mint, and anise, and cumin," if we we must; but, by the love we bear our crucified and risen Lord, let us not neglect "the weightier matters, judgment mercy and the love of God." The first, may not be left undone; the second, must not be.

The plan of Life as revealed in the scriptures, and committed to "earthen vessels," is a perfect embodiment of justice, mercy and love. Our eyes have been enlightened to see how beautifully they are blended. "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." And now may we who have embraced this precious plan theoretically, let the vital principles that make it what it is, be so planted in the soil of our hearts, that they will take root downward, and bear fruit upward; and demonstrate to all men that we are Christ's disciples, by the love we bear one to another.

A Wonderful "Fertilizer."

Spring, beautiful spring has come at last: suggestive of bright hopes, of pleasant thoughts, and of fondly cherished memories.

The reign of Winter is over. "The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land."

Many of the readers of the Herald of Life are now luxuriating amid the untold beauties of nature. Engaged as they are, in the primitive occupation of tilling the soil,—they are permitted to watch the development of that wonderful mysterious process, by which bread cast upon the waters, is received after many days.

If "they who go down to the Sea in ships, and do business in great waters," should profit by seeing "the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep:" how much more should men, privileged with being "co-workers together with God," in developing the hidden wealth of nature, besuitably impressed with the goodness of the Lord, and with his boundless benevolence.

But it was not to indulge in such reflections, wide as the field may be, that I took up my pen, but to apprise the readers of the Herald, of a "wonderful fertilizer, the use of which will insure an abundent harvest. It is given in an ancient work, whose author was an Agriculturelist of no mean pretentions. Indeed, so thoroughly acquainted was he with the products of the soil, that he was qualified to speak intelligently of "all trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon, to the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." Without question it is wholly reliable, as it is stamped with the King's seal.

Those who are inclined to try it (and may their name be legion) will find it advertised in Proverbs iii. 9, 10. "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase: so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."

Were I upon a dying bed, and this question, "How shall we best honor the Lord with our substance?" the last one I should be permitted to answer, I should be compelled to reply, By spreading in every lawful way, and by every available means, that heaven-born, thrice-blessed, God-honoring truth, which is contained in the record which God gave of his Son.

"And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that not the Son of God, hath not life."

Let us not be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.

Remarkable Biblical Caraitic Manuscipts.

The Russian Government has purchased, for the sum of 100,000 silver rubles, the celebrated collection of Caraitic manuscripts of the learned collector Abraham Firkowitch. After the collection had been duly examined by different savants, and pronounced to be highly important for the criticism of the text of Scriptures, for palæography and chronology in general, and for the history of Southern Russia in particular, it was delivered as property to the public Imperial Library. The Caraitic scholar, Abraham Finkowitch, has devoted, we hear, thirty years of his life to the acquisition of these rare manuscripts. As early as 1830, during his stay in Constantinople, he succeeded in finding some valuable Hebrew codices. This seems to have given him the impulse for his untiring exertions in this field. He sacrificed his fortune in the search for rare and old manuscripts; bore without murmuring long separations from his family; subjected himself to all sorts of privations, and often endangered his life. Mr. Firkowitch has travelled through and explored the Crimea and the Caucasus in all directions; he has lived for months in church-yards and burial places, to study and copy old inscriptions; he has penetrated into synagogues and other likely places, where the Jews used to hide books on sudden attacks or invasions from the enemy; he never wearied of the struggle with fanaticism and barbarity. Thus he succeeded in collecting 124 Hebrew original copies of the Old Testament, which are older than all other Hebrew codices in any of the libraries of Europe. Twenty-five of the manuscripts in Mr. Firkowitch's collection were written before the ninth, and twenty before the tenth century. Five of the manuscripts on leather are maintained to be the oldest of all the documents on the Scriptures hitherto discovered. The whole collection consists of 47 rolls of the Pentateuch, on leather and parchment; 77 codices of the Holy Scriptures; 33 translations in different languages; 277 works of Caraitic authors; 523 works of Rabbinst authors; 250 miscellaneous letters and articles; 722 inscriptions; 300 documents regarding the history of Caraim in Western Russia, and 300 old plans of different Russian towns.—Athenæum.

Letters and Extracts.

From Thomas W. Smith.

Alden, Hardin Co., Iowa, April 21, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—I am weather-bound again: had expected to leave home to-day, for Goldfield, otherwise known as Liberty, where I had agreed to spend a few evenings with Br. Martin in proclaiming life through the Anointed. But last night it commenced snowing, and now there is at least three inches of snow on the ground, and the wind blowing fiercely and would be in my face the whole distance. Just think of it—the 21st of April, and snow deep enough for sleighing! It would be too dangerous to venture across the prairie to-day, for I could not discern the sloughs; and as they are knee deep to the horse, in some places, I might find myself floundering in the mud, and the road filled up with snow so that I could not find my way, with no houses in sight. Br. Martin will excuse me, this time; he knows the nature of this country, and could not expect me to ride 40 miles facing such a storm; I will visit him, however; and suggest the 3d Sunday in May, when we may reasonably expect good roads and pleasant weather. Such weather is not usual for this country. Many do not recollect such a late Spring. But few have made garden yet, and many farmers have not done sowing small grain.

But enough on this theme. I wish to say a few words on another and more interesting one. I have felt for some time an impression that I ought to visit the Brethren scattered abroad in Missouri and Kansas, as I have received earnest and anxious calls from different ones in those States, which I feel that I must respond to. With the close of the "Slaveholders rebellion" a larger field still will be opened in those States. The laborers there are few indeed, and the people must hear the word of life, and shall hear it, if God spares me for the work. I have no means of defraying my expenses, but I know that I can get there, if the Lord wants me there; for his servants will do their duty in the matter. I look for no pay. I expect to sacrifice for Christ's cause. I might stay at home and put in a crop, and raise sufficient to sustain us the coming fall and winter; but I apprehend no danger if my time is employed, instead, in sowing the seed of divine truth.

I propose to go to Br. Baker's assistance first, who lives at least 250 miles from here, and think of starting early in June. If there are any readers of the Herald of Life who live on the line of a south-westerly course from the centre of Iowa, whom I could visit on the way, I wish them to let me know of their whereabouts. I shall probably be gone two months or more, and may conclude to remove to some part of Kansas or Missouri, if the way opens and I consider it my duty to do so. I shall need a good supply of tracts, &c., for the trips. The expenses for such a trip will be considerable, as I shall often have to stay over night among strangers, and I expect to start without a dollar; for, all that I can get by that time I must use to settle my accounts for wagon and harness, providing the whole amount shall be raised for the horse. I suggest that this matter be made a subject of prayer by the friends, that if it is God's will such a trip be made, that it may be successful and much good be done. Don't neglect it.

I propose to give the readers of the Herald an account of Missionary labor, from time to time. I have but little to write on that matter now, as I have only had one opportunity of visiting a new field since I got the horse. Last Sunday week I went six miles west of here, and spoke on Saturday night and Sunday morning to a few. Had some controversy with several after meeting. One man asserted that I "denied that the bible taught eternal life;" which charge I refuted, and when asked what I had said, the man replied, that I said "that the bible did not teach the immortality of the soul," and he "knew it did teach it." I requested a text or two, but he "hadn't time to look now; however, it said 'this mortal shall put on immortality.'" Now, is it not surprising that any one should suppose that that text above all others would prove man to be immortal NOW? But others saw the light that beamed forth from that quotation, and it was impressed more deeply upon their minds, by his quoting it, than perhaps it would have been if I had used it. He then closed by asserting that I was "breaking down Christian institutions, and building up an infidel church," because I remarked that the "creed-churches and Spiritualists stood on the same foundation, immortal soulism; and should that dogma be exploded, they all would fall together."

Last Sunday several strangers came into our meeting here, and got into a discussion with several of the Brn. on the nature of man. On our arrival they turned them over to us, and for a little while the debate was warm; but being so repeatedly challenged to produce some proof from the bible, that the soul was immortal and that endless misery was taught there, and failing to substantiate their position (of course), they desired to hear on the subject, as they had never heard a sermon by one of our faith. So we endeavored to show that immortality and future life could be obtained only through Christ, from the text, "For as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son, to have life in himself." John v. 26; and in connection the 40th verse, and also 1 John v. 11, 12. Can any other idea be received from these scriptures, as well as others, than that Life (other than the present blood life) is in Christ alone? and that there is no life out of Christ? New strength and beauty are added to this grand theme the more it is investigated. The whole bible accords in emitting light upon it. The Brn. here are growing stronger in the faith of no future life for those who reject the Giver of Life.

I rejoice to see the progress that is being made in the cause. I trust friend Burbank will soon be ready to "ride this terrible hobby," and to discuss the "One sided question." There is but one side to that question; for, as strong and as abundant support for the conscious state of the dead is found in the bible, as for the future life of wicked dead men. And why hesitate boldly to advocate the truth of no life out of Christ because a text or two seem to teach otherwise? For, if the Bible be God's word, and is harmonious, and one text that positively and clearly, without the possibility of misapprehension, teaches no resurrection for the wicked dead, a score of inferential texts (which inference is also denied, and justly, too) cannot overthrow it. But investigate, read on, decide calmly, and then "go ahead." Onward, right onward, is our motto. To go back, is to lose all.

Yours unwaveringly.

From James Howard.

To the Herald of Life:—Thinking your readers would like to hear something about the Freedmen of this department, I send you a few lines, hoping they will be of some interest. No doubt it is very gratifying to you and most of your readers to know that the plan of emancipation, through the help of God, is doing well. Many of them are (that is the colored people) settling on the islands along the coast; some of which we have visited lately: found them that were able, employed in planting and cultivating. In general they are very thankful for the blessings which they enjoy, but are somewhat fearful that their old masters, may yet get hold of them. We told them that would be impossible, as the old masters is now dead and soon would be buried. At this thought they cried out, Bless the Lord, and bless the Yankee. We told them that they must not allow themselves to be taken off; and if any viper of the slave tribe should come to take them, they must defend themselves and die rather than be the chattles, or things of any man. There are but few able bodied men left on the farms, as the government has taken most of them to work in, o for the army.

You will hear before this reaches you, of the celebration of Fort Sumter. It was a joy beyond measure to see the old flag, although torn, but proud, as amidst the thunder of artillery and the shouts of the thousands it made its way, slowly, but defiantly, to the top of the Liberty pole erected for the occasion. Just about this time, the old Steamer Planter, Capt. Robert Small, came along close by the Fort loaded with colored people She is employed in Gen. Saxton's department, and is commanded by the same man that brought her and his family out of Charleston and out of slavery. Gen. Saxton has done a great work in this department. Indeed, he is the Moses of the whole business. May God bless and spare him.

The people of North have done much for the freedmen; but they must do more. These men and women must be put to work, so as to earn their own bread. They must be shown the difference between slavery and freedom, and that freedom don't mean idleness; but when they work, they work for themselves; now, not as before. May the Lord direct all. I am your brother.

Eld. Jonathan Wilson, now in his 89th year, writes us, April 23:—I never had better health than now, nor a happier mind, having no anxiety to know the day or hour when Christ will come, nor the day of my death; for I feel that I am perfectly ready for both. As to the death of our President, the Lord can make up for his death, under present circumstances, by giving a double portion of His Spirit to Pres. Johnson, and be more benefit to these United States than four years of his life could have been. So let us pray for it. His death has given us the pitch of the spirit we have been contending with from the South.

God's Will in Earth.

What is implied in the petition, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven?" As perfect obedience to God, and as perfect submission to his will, as is to be found in heaven—that earth shall be as loyal to God, and as faithful to him, as any other province of his great kingdom. It is, then, a prayer for the restoration of that perfectly holy, resigned, and innocent state which existed before the fall. Anything short of such obedience as unfallen man yielded, would not be doing the will of God as it is done in heaven. We all believe that every unfallen angel perfectly obeys God in thought, word, and deed; that among all the hosts of the unfallen there is no sin. As often as we put up this petition of our Lord's Prayer, we pray that it may be so on earth; that every vestige of sin may be forever removed. Indeed, we pray that earth may again be a perfectly loyal province of God's great kingdom; that in all this earthly province there may be nothing to offend.

In the former petition, we pray that God's kingdom may be restored on earth; that the rebellion on earth may cease, so that it shall be a loyal and not a rebel province. In this petition, we pray that it may be a perfectly holy province, just as it was before the fall, and just as is every unfallen world. We do not pray for perfect holiness in heaven, but on earth. It is not that we may be perfectly holy when we get to heaven, but that perfect holiness may exist everywhere on earth, and that not merely in one heart or a few hearts, but in all hearts. It is not a prayer in which we ask that, before the restoration of the Kingdom of Heaven, we may be as holy as the angels in heaven; but as we pray, "Thy kingdom come," we add a petition, that everything that is wrong in this province may be removed, so that all hearts and all lives may be right.

I know that it should be the sincere and hearty desire of every Christian that he should be free from sin. His hatred of sin should be perfect. It should be his fervent prayer that others may be delivered from all sin; but the perfect removal of all sin from all hearts on earth, and the perfect submission of all hearts to God, is something that we have no right to expect until the restoration shall take place, and earth shall again be a loyal province of God's kingdom. So that, while it is the duty of every Christian to heartily desire it, and pray, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven," we have no right to expect it until the kingdom shall come. Indeed, that petition comes first, "Thy kingdom come."

As we see what the kingdoms of this world are, and have been; how desperate has been the rebellion; how fearful have been the effects of sin in this world; it would seem as if every holy heart must heartily pray, "Thy kingdom come; thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." Indeed, until God shall undertake the work, bind Satan, quell the rebellion, and restore the earth to the brotherhood of the heavens, we shall see a miserable state of things in all nations. It seems strange that any one should desire all things to remain as they are, sin reigning as in does; Satan, as a devouring lion, going about everywhere; evil everywhere; misery everywhere; sadness everywhere on earth.

Reader, if you can have any hope in the governments of this world; in the administrations of any man, or any set of men, with Satan helping them; if you think man can reform the earth, then you need not put up these petitions. But if your hope is in God, and only in him, then heartily put up these petitions, and be "looking for and hastening unto the coming" of their fulfilment. Be not satisfied until they are fulfilled.

Will this petition ever be answered? Will God's will ever be done in earth as it is in heaven? Yes. Can any Christian, for one moment, suppose that a prayer of the Saviour will not be answered? Perhaps, at times, their own prayers may be so full of doubt, fear, and unbelief, that they may have the right to expect that they will not be answered; but can they assign any reason why God should refuse to answer the prayer of his own Son? On this point it seems to be great guilt to doubt. Reader, can you doubt; can you, for one moment, doubt? Such are the promises of God that I feel well persuaded that if this prayer is not answered, the great object of the atonement will fail. If it is not answered, I feel assured that the failure will result in rebellion, misery, and misrule in every heavenly world. Let it fail to be answered, and not only is the hope of earth crushed, but the hope of every world. It is a work which Jesus has undertaken, and which he has promised shall be done; and if God's word fails in one thing, he is not worthy to be trusted by any world. But so sure as God is; so sure as the Bible is his word, this petition of the Saviour will be answered. Many passages of the word of God declare it. Jesus has undertaken to repair the ruins of the fall; to effect the great restitution; and it will be done. Jesus has prayed for it; the holy in all ages have prayed for it, and those prayers must be answered. Its accomplishment is certain. Earth is not to remain a revolted province, neither is it to be annihilated. God does not destroy his own works, but the devil's.

I will not detain you, reader, by quoting a great number of passages of Scripture; but I assure you, on their authority, that the day is coming when earth shall again be a holy, loyal province of God's kingdom; when it shall be restored to the brotherhood of the heavens; when it shall be restored to the state from which it has fallen. The day is coming when evil, as well as evil-doers, shall perish out of the earth. The second Adam will restore all that the first has lost,—yes, more. The curse shall be removed. The tree of life will be restored. Its leaves will heal the nations. "There shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain." "God will wipe away all tears from their eyes." He will do it on the earth, and not merely in heaven.—Prophetic Times.

How Petroleum is Made Fit to Use.

Petroleum as it is raised from the rocky cavities in which it is found, is a dark and dirty liquid, disagreeable to the eye and offensive to smell and touch. But fortunately a simple process of refining gives us from this foul substance a beautiful and transparent illuminating oil; a perfect substitute for spirits of turpentine; an excellent lubricating substance; materials for the manufacture of gas and of the most beautiful dyes. It is known that petroleum is composed of two elements, hydrogen and carbon. These two elements combine together chemically to form a large number of chemical compounds, which are mechanically mixed together to constitute petroleum. These hydro-carbons have one property in common, they are all combustible. But their other properties vary very widely; some are gasses, others are liquids, and one at least is a solid almost as hard as lead. As the solids, and to some extent the gasses, are soluble in the liquids, the whole mass is liquid. The volatility of the several hydro-carbons which constitute petroleum is the first property which is considered in the effort to separate them. An oil can be obtained which will boil at 90 degrees, another which will boil at 91 degrees, and another at 92 degrees; even these are found, however, to be not single chemical compounds, but several hydro-carbons mechanically mingled.

Petroleum is distilled from iron boilers, usually holding about fifty barrels each. They are heated by a coal furnace, and the products of distillation are condensed in the usual way by means of worms immersed in cold water. As the oil flows from the condenser it is divided into three portions for different uses. The lightest, that comes over first, is called gasolene. This cannot be used in lamps with safety, as it rises in vapor so freely that it mixes with the atmospheric air to form an explosive compound. It is employed to some extent for making an illuminating gas by mixing its vapor with air. Its specific gravity ranges from 80 to 90 degrees of Beaume's scale. The next that comes over, ranging from 60 degrees to 80 degrees is separated and sold under the name of benzine. This is used in mixing paints and varnishes, and for purposes generally for which camphene was formerly employed. The last of the distillation, constituting the principal portion of the petroleum, is illuminating oil. This ranges in density from 35 degrees to 60 degrees. As the stream of oil flows out from the lower end of the condenser its color is a light, delicate blue. The tar is sold for making illuminating gas, and considerable quantities are sent to Europe to be employed in manufacturing dyes.

The purification of the distilled burning oil, by which it is in a great measure deprived of its offensive odor, is effected by agitating it with sulphuric acid, neutralizing the acid with soda, and finally thoroughly washing it by agitation with water. Nearly all the hydro-carbons of petroleum are neutral—neither acid nor alkaline—but a few have alkaline or basic properties, and it is from these that the crude oil derives its offensive odor. Sulphuric acid enters into combination with these basic oils, forming salts which can be completely removed by washing. The acid also oxydizes a portion of the heavier hydro-carbons, converting them into asphaltum which settles out of the oil with the water. The washing is effected in the same vessels that are employed in treating the oil with sulphuric acid. The oil is pumped or drawn into vessels, the sulphuric acid is added, the fans are set in motion till the liquids are thoroughly mixed, and then the oil is allowed to settle to the bottom of the cask. The bottom is of a conical form, with a hole in the center closed by a stop-cock. The oil and its compounds settle in a dark mass at the bottom, and then the stop-cock is opened and this sediment is drawn off, the workmen carefully watching the flow so as to stop it before any of the clear oil escapes. Next, soda is put into the cask, the agitators are driven awhile, the mass is allowed to settle, and the sediment is drawn off. Finally, water is pumped in with the oil, and the agitating, settling and drawing off process is repeated.—Boston Courier.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known, talented clergyman, was selected by certain ters and others, in New England, to write a Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

ful, be courteous." "Tithe mint, and anise, and cumin," if we we must; but, by the love we bear our crucified and risen Lord, let us not neglect "the weightier matters, judgment mercy and the love of God." The first, may not be left undone; the second, must not be.

The plan of Life as revealed in the scriptures, and committed to "earthen vessels," is a perfect embodiment of justice, mercy and love. Our eyes have been enlightened to see how beautifully they are blended. "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." And now may we who have embraced this precious plan theoretically, let the vital principles that make it what it is, be so planted in the soil of our hearts, that they will take root downward, and bear fruit upward; and demonstrate to all men that we are Christ's disciples, by the love we bear one to another.

A Wonderful "Fertilizer."

Spring, beautiful spring has come at last: suggestive of bright hopes, of pleasant thoughts, and of fondly cherished memories.

The reign of Winter is over. "The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land."

Many of the readers of the Herald of Life are now luxuriating amid the untold beauties of nature. Engaged as they are, in the primitive occupation of tilling the soil,—they are permitted to watch the development of that wonderful mysterious process, by which bread cast upon the waters, is received after many days.

If "they who go down to the Sea in ships, and do business in great waters," should profit by seeing "the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep:" how much more should men, privileged with being "co-workers together with God," in developing the hidden wealth of nature, besuitably impressed with the goodness of the Lord, and with his boundless benevolence.

But it was not to indulge in such reflections, wide as the field may be, that I took up my pen, but to apprise the readers of the Herald, of a "wonderful fertilizer, the use of which will insure an abundent harvest. It is given in an ancient work, whose author was an Agriculturelist of no mean pretentions. Indeed, so thoroughly acquainted was he with the products of the soil, that he was qualified to speak intelligently of "all trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon, to the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." Without question it is wholly reliable, as it is stamped with the King's seal.

Those who are inclined to try it (and may their name be legion) will find it advertised in Proverbs iii. 9, 10. "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase: so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."

Were I upon a dying bed, and this question, "How shall we best honor the Lord with our substance?" the last one I should be permitted to answer, I should be compelled to reply, By spreading in every lawful way, and by every available means, that heaven-born, thrice-blessed, God-honoring truth, which is contained in the record which God gave of his Son.

"And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that not the Son of God, hath not life."

Let us not be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.

Remarkable Biblical Caraitic Manuscipts.

The Russian Government has purchased, for the sum of 100,000 silver rubles, the celebrated collection of Caraitic manuscripts of the learned collector Abraham Firkowitch. After the collection had been duly examined by different savants, and pronounced to be highly important for the criticism of the text of Scriptures, for palæography and chronology in general, and for the history of Southern Russia in particular, it was delivered as property to the public Imperial Library. The Caraitic scholar, Abraham Finkowitch, has devoted, we hear, thirty years of his life to the acquisition of these rare manuscripts. As early as 1830, during his stay in Constantinople, he succeeded in finding some valuable Hebrew codices. This seems to have given him the impulse for his untiring exertions in this field. He sacrificed his fortune in the search for rare and old manuscripts; bore, without murmuring long separations from his family; subjected himself to all sorts of privations, and often endangered his life. Mr. Firkowitch has travelled through and explored the Crimea and the Caucasus in all directions; he has lived for months in church-yards and burial places, to study and copy old inscriptions; he has penetrated into synagogues and other likely places, where the Jews used to hide books on sudden attacks or invasions from the enemy; he never wearied of the struggle with fanaticism and barbarity. Thus he succeeded in collecting 124 Hebrew original copies of the Old Testament, which are older than all other Hebrew codices in any of the libraries of Europe. Twenty-five of the manuscripts in Mr. Firkowitch's collection were written before the ninth, and twenty before the tenth century. Five of the manuscripts on leather are maintained to be the oldest of all the documents on the Scriptures hitherto discovered. The whole collection consists of 47 rolls of the Pentateuch, on leather and parchment; 77 codices of the Holy Scriptures; 33 translations in different languages; 277 works of Caraitic authors; 523 works of Rabbinst authors; 250 miscellaneous letters and articles; 722 inscriptions; 300 documents regarding the history of Caraim in Western Russia, and 300 old plans of different Russian towns.—Athenæum.

Letters and Extracts.

From Thomas W. Smith.

Alden, Hardin Co., Iowa, April 21, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—I am weather-bound again: had expected to leave home to-day, for Goldfield, other wise known as Liberty, where I had agreed to spend a few evenings with Br. Martin in proclaiming life through the Anointed. But last night it commenced snowing, and now there is at least three inches of snow on the ground, and the wind blowing fiercely and would be in my face the whole distance. Just think of it—the 21st of April, and snow deep enough for sleighing! It would be too dangerous to venture across the prairie to-day, for I could not discern the sloughs; and as they are knee deep to the horse, in some places, I might find myself floundering in the mud, and the road filled up with snow so that I could not find my way, with no houses in sight. Br. Martin will excuse me, this time; he knows the nature of this country, and could not expect me to ride 40 miles facing such a storm; I will visit him, however; and suggest the 3d Sunday in May, when we may reasonably expect good roads and pleasant weather. Such weather is not usual for this country. Many do not recollect such a late Spring. But few have made garden yet, and many farmers have not done sowing small grain.

But enough on this theme. I wish to say a few words on another and more interesting one. I have felt for some time an impression that I ought to visit the Brethren scattered abroad in Missouri and Kansas, as I have received earnest and anxious calls from different ones in those States, which I feel that I must respond to. With the close of the "Slaveholders rebellion" a larger field still will be opened in those States. The laborers there are few indeed, and the people must hear the word of life, and shall hear it, if God spares me for the work. I have no means of defraying my expenses, but I know that I can get there, if the Lord wants me there; for his servants will do their duty in the matter. I look for no pay. I expect to sacrifice for Christ's cause. I might stay at home and put in a crop, and raise sufficient to sustain us the coming fall and winter; but I apprehend no danger if my time is employed, instead, in sowing the seed of divine truth.

I propose to go to Br. Baker's assistance first, who lives at least 250 miles from here, and think of starting early in June. If there are any readers of the Herald of Life who live on the line of a south-westerly course from the centre of Iowa, whom I could visit on the way, I wish them to let me know of their whereabouts. I shall probably be gone two months or more, and may conclude to remove to some part of Kansas or Missouri, if the way opens and I consider it my duty to do so. I shall need a good supply of tracts, &c., for the trips. The expenses for such a trip will be considerable, as I shall often have to stay over night among strangers, and I expect to start without a dollar; for, all that I can get by that time I must use to settle my accounts for wagon and harness, providing the whole amount shall be raised for the horse. I suggest that this matter be made a subject of prayer by the friends, that if it is God's will such a trip be made, that it may be successful and much good be done. Don't neglect it.

I propose to give the readers of the Herald an account of Missionary labor, from time to time. I have but little to write on that matter now, as I have only had one opportunity of visiting a new field since I got the horse. Last Sunday week I went six miles west of here, and spoke on Saturday night and Sunday morning to a few. Had some controversy with several after meeting. One man asserted that I "denied that the bible taught eternal life;" which charge I refuted, and when asked what I had said, the man replied, that I said "that the bible did not teach the immortality of the soul," and he "knew it did teach it." I requested a text or two, but he "hadn't time to look now; however, it said 'this mortal shall put on immortality.'" Now, is it not surprising that any one should suppose that that text above all others would prove man to be immortal NOW? But others saw the light that beamed forth from that quotation, and it was impressed more deeply upon their minds, by his quoting it, than perhaps it would have been if I had used it. He then closed by asserting that I was "breaking down Christian institutions, and building up an infidel church," because I remarked that the "creed-churches and Spiritualists stood on the same foundation, immortal soulism; and should that dogma be exploded, they all would fall together."

Last Sunday several strangers came into our meeting here, and got into a discussion with several of the Brn. on the nature of man. On our arrival they turned them over to us, and for a little while the debate was warm; but being so repeatedly challenged to produce some proof from the bible, that the soul was immortal and that endless misery was taught there, and failing to substantiate their position (of course), they desired to hear on the subject, as they had never heard a sermon by one of our faith. So we endeavored to show that immortality and future life could be obtained only through Christ, from the text, "For as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son, to have life in himself." John v. 26; and in connection the 40th verse, and also 1 John v. 11, 12. Can any other idea be received from these scriptures, as well as others, than that Life (other than the present blood life) is in Christ alone? and that there is no life out of Christ? New strength and beauty are added to this grand theme the more it is investigated. The whole bible accords in emitting light upon it. The Brn. here are growing stronger in the faith of no future life for those who reject the Giver of Life.

I rejoice to see the progress that is being made in the cause. I trust friend Burbank will soon be ready to "ride this terrible hobby," and to discuss the "One sided question." There is but one side to that question; for, as strong and as abundant support for the conscious state of the dead is found in the bible, as for the future life of wicked dead men. And why hesitate boldly to advocate the truth of no life out of Christ because a text or two seem to teach otherwise? For, if the Bible be God's word, and is harmonious, and one text that positively and clearly, without the possibility of misapprehension, teaches no resurrection for the wicked dead, a score of inferential texts (which inference is also denied, and justly, too) cannot overthrow it. But investigate, read on, decide calmly, and then "go ahead." Onward, right onward, is our motto. To go back, is to lose all.

Yours unwaveringly.

From James Howard.

To the Herald of Life:—Thinking your readers would like to hear something about the Freedmen of this department, I send you a few lines, hoping they will be of some interest. No doubt it is very gratifying to you and most of your readers to know that the plan of emancipation, through the help of God, is doing well. Many of them are (that is the colored people) settling on the islands along the coast; some of which we have visited lately: found them that were able, employed in planting and cultivating. In general they are very thankful for the blessings which they enjoy, but are somewhat fearful that their old masters, may yet get hold of them. We told them that would be impossible, as the old masters is now dead and soon would be buried. At this thought they cried out, Bless the Lord, and bless the Yankee. We told them that they must not allow themselves to be taken off; and if any viper of the slave tribe should come to take them, they must defend themselves and die rather than be the chattles, or things of any man. There are but few able bodied men left on the farms, as the government has taken most of them to work in, or for the army.

You will hear before this reaches you, of the celebration of Fort Sumter. It was a joy beyond measure to see the old flag, although torn, but proud, as amidst the thunder of artillery and the shouts of the thousands it made its way, slowly, but defiantly, to the top of the Liberty pole erected for the occasion. Just about this time, the old Steamer Planter, Capt. Robert Small, came along close by the Fort loaded with colored people She is employed in Gen. Saxton's department, and is commanded by the same man that brought her and his family out of Charleston and out of slavery. Gen. Saxton has done a great work in this department. Indeed, he is the Moses of the whole business. May God bless and spare him.

The people of North have done much for the freedmen; but they must do more. These men and women must be put to work, so as to earn their own bread. They must be shown the difference between slavery and freedom, and that freedom don't mean idleness; but when they work, they work for themselves; now, not as before. May the Lord direct all. I am your brother.

Eld. Jonathan Wilson, now in his 89th year, writes us, April 23:—I never had better health than now, nor a happier mind, having no anxiety to know the day or hour when Christ will come, nor the day of my death; for I feel that I am perfectly ready for both. As to the death of our President, the Lord can make up for his death, under present circumstances, by giving a double portion of His Spirit to Pres. Johnson, and be more benefit to these United States than four years of his life could have been. So let us pray for it. His death has given us the pitch of the spirit we have been contending with from the South.

God's Will in Earth.

What is implied in the petition, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven?" As perfect obedience to God, and as perfect submission to his will, as is to be found in heaven—that earth shall be as loyal to God, and as faithful to him, as any other province of his great kingdom. It is, then, a prayer for the restoration of that perfectly holy, resigned, and innocent state which existed before the fall. Anything short of such obedience as unfallen man yielded, would not be doing the will of God as it is done in heaven. We all believe that every unfallen angel perfectly obeys God in thought, word, and deed; that among all the hosts of the unfallen there is no sin. As often as we put up this petition of our Lord's Prayer, we pray that it may be so on earth; that every vestige of sin may be forever removed. Indeed, we pray that earth may again be a perfectly loyal province of God's great kingdom; that in all this earthly province there may be nothing to offend.

In the former petition, we pray that God's kingdom may be restored on earth; that the rebellion on earth may cease, so that it shall be a loyal and not a rebel province. In this petition, we pray that it may be a perfectly holy province, just as it was before the fall, and just as is every unfallen world. We do not pray for perfect holiness in heaven, but on earth. It is not that we may be perfectly holy when we get to heaven, but that perfect holiness may exist everywhere on earth, and that not merely in one heart or a few hearts, but in all hearts. It is not a prayer in which we ask that, before the restoration of the Kingdom of Heaven, we may be as holy as the angels in heaven; but as we pray, "Thy kingdom come," we add a petition, that everything that is wrong in this province may be removed, so that all hearts and all lives may be right.

I know that it should be the sincere and hearty desire of every Christian that he should be free from sin. His hatred of sin should be perfect. It should be his fervent prayer that others may be delivered from all sin; but the perfect removal of all sin from all hearts on earth, and the perfect submission of all hearts to God, is something that we have no right to expect until the restoration shall take place, and earth shall again be a loyal province of God's kingdom. So that, while it is the duty of every Christian to heartily desire it, and pray, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven," we have no right to expect it until the kingdom shall come. Indeed, that petition comes first, "Thy kingdom come."

As we see what the kingdoms of this world are, and have been; how desperate has been the rebellion; how fearful have been the effects of sin in this world; it would seem as if every holy heart must heartily pray, "Thy kingdom come; thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." Indeed, until God shall undertake the work, bind Satan, quell the rebellion, and restore the earth to the brotherhood of the heavens, we shall see a miserable state of things in all nations. It seems strange that any one should desire all things to remain as they are, sin reigning as in does; Satan, as a devouring lion, going about everywhere; evil everywhere; misery everywhere; sadness everywhere on earth.

Reader, if you can have any hope in the governments of this world; in the administrations of any man, or any set of men, with Satan helping them; if you think man can reform the earth, then you need not put up these petitions. But if your hope is in God, and only in him, then heartily put up these petitions, and be "looking for and hastening unto the coming" of their fulfilment. Be not satisfied until they are fulfilled.

Will this petition ever be answered? Will God's will ever be done in earth as it is in heaven? Yes. Can any Christian, for one moment, suppose that a prayer of the Saviour will not be answered? Perhaps, at times, their own prayers may be so full of doubt, fear, and unbelief, that they may have the right to expect that they will not be answered; but can they assign any reason why God should refuse to answer the prayer of his own Son? On this point it seems to be great guilt to doubt. Reader, can you doubt; can you, for one moment, doubt? Such are the promises of God that I feel well persuaded that if this prayer is not answered, the great object of the atonement will fail. If it is not answered, I feel assured that the failure will result in rebellion, misery, and misrule in every heavenly world. Let it fail to be answered, and not only is the hope of earth crushed, but the hope of every world. It is a work which Jesus has undertaken, and which he has promised shall be done; and if God's word fails in one thing, he is not worthy to be trusted by any world. But so sure as God is; so sure as the Bible is his word, this petition of the Saviour will be answered. Many passages of the word of God declare it. Jesus has undertaken to repair the ruins of the fall; to effect the great restitution; and it will be done. Jesus has prayed for it; the holy in all ages have prayed for it, and those prayers must be answered. Its accomplishment is certain. Earth is not to remain a revolted province, neither is it to be annihilated. God does not destroy his own works, but the devil's.

I will not detain you, reader, by quoting a great number of passages of Scripture; but I assure you, on their authority, that the day is coming when earth shall again be a holy, loyal province of God's kingdom; when it shall be restored to the brotherhood of the heavens; when it shall be restored to the state from which it has fallen. The day is coming when evil, as well as evil-doers, shall perish out of the earth. The second Adam will restore all that the first has lost,—yes, more. The curse shall be removed. The tree of life will be restored. Its leaves will heal the nations. "There shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain." "God will wipe away all tears from their eyes." He will do it on the earth, and not merely in heaven.—Prophetic Times.

How Petroleum is Made Fit to Use.

Petroleum as it is raised from the rocky cavities in which it is found, is a dark and dirty liquid, disagreeable to the eye and offensive to smell and touch. But fortunately a simple process of refining gives us from this foul substance a beautiful and transparent illuminating oil; a perfect substitute for spirits of turpentine; an excellent lubricating substance; materials for the manufacture of gas and of the most beautiful dyes. It is known that petroleum is composed of two elements, hydrogen and carbon. These two elements combine together chemically to form a large number of chemical compounds, which are mechanically mixed together to constitute petroleum. These hydro-carbons have one property in common, they are all combustible, But their other properties vary very widely; some are gasses, others are liquids, and one at least is a solid almost as hard as lead. As the solids, and to some extent the gasses, are soluble in the liquids, the whole mass is liquid. The volatility of the several hydrocarbons which constitute petroleum is the first property which is considered in the effort to separate them. An oil can be obtained which will boil at 90 degrees, another which will boil at 91 degrees, and another at 92 degrees; even these are found, however, to be not single chemical compounds, but several hydro-carbons mechanically mingled.

Petroleum is distilled from iron boilers, usually holding about fifty barrels each. They are heated by a coal furnace, and the products of distillation are condensed in the usual way by means of worms immersed in cold water. As the oil flows from the condenser it is divided into three portions for different uses. The lightest, that comes over first, is called gasolene. This cannot be used in lamps with safety, as it rises in vapor so freely that it mixes with the atmospheric air to form an explosive compound. It is employed to some extent for making an illuminating gas by mixing its vapor with air. Its specific gravity ranges from 80 to 90 degrees of Beaume's scale. The next that comes over, ranging from 60 degrees to 80 degrees is separated and sold under the name of benzine. This is used in mixing paints and varnishes, and for purposes generally for which camphene was formerly employed. The last of the distillation, constituting the principal portion of the petroleum, is illuminating oil. This ranges in density from 35 degrees to 60 degrees. As the stream of oil flows out from the lower end of the condenser its color is a light, delicate blue. The tar is sold for making illuminating gas, and considerable quantities are sent to Europe to be employed in manufacturing dyes.

The purification of the distilled burning oil, by which it is in a great measure deprived of its offensive odor, is effected by agitating it with sulphuric acid, neutralizing the acid with soda, and finally thoroughly washing it by agitation with water. Nearly all the hydrocarbons of petroleum are neutral—neither acid nor alkaline—but a few have alkaline or basic properties, and it is from these that the crude oil derives its offensive odor. Sulphuric acid enters into combination with these basic oils, forming salts which can be completely removed by washing. The acid also oxydizes a portion of the heavier hydro-carbons, converting them into asphaltum which settles out of the oil with the water. The washing is effected in the same vessels that are employed in treating the oil with sulphuric acid. The oil is pumped or drawn into vessels, the sulphuric acid is added, the fans are set in motion till the liquids are thoroughly mixed, and then the oil is allowed to settle to the bottom of the cask. The bottom is of a conical form, with a hole in the center closed by a stop-cock. The oil and its compounds settle in a dark mass at the bottom, and then the stop-cock is opened and this sediment is drawn off, the workmen carefully watching the flow so as to stop it before any of the clear oil escapes. Next, soda is put into the cask, the agitators are driven awhile, the mass is allowed to settle, and the sediment is drawn off. Finally, water is pumped in with the oil, and the agitating, settling and drawing off process is repeated.—Boston Courier.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wher ever it leads—can come to any other conclusion tha[illegible] the one arrived at in these combined works. [illegible] amine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known, talented clergyman, was selected by certain [illegible]ters and others, in New England, to write a Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with [illegible] egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy —more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE BURIAL OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Oh, slow to smite and swift to spare,
Gentle, and merciful, and just!
Who, in the fear of God, didst bear
The sword of power, a nation's trust.

In sorrow by thy bier we stand,
Amid the awe that hushes all,
And speak the anguish of a land
That shook with horror at thy fall.

Thy task is done; the bond are free;
We bear thee to an honored grave,
Whose noblest monument shall be
The broken fetters of the slave.

Pure was thy life; its bloody close
Hath placed thee with the sons of light,
Among the noble host of those
Who perished in the cause of right.

THE FOURTEENTH OF APRIL.

There stands on the bank of the great tank at Sibsagor, in Assam, a temple of Siva, surmounted by a hollow golden ball. The natives tell us that attempts have been made to shoot at this ball, but the bullets have uniformly stopped in their course, and been hurled backward by unseen power against the impious men who shot them. A good eye can detect several bullet-holes in the ball, but still the Hindoo maintains faith in the potency of his gods.

Underneath this ancient superstition lies a great truth. Divine Providence so shapes the actions of men as to make them accomplish results very different from what the actors intended. God hurls back the missiles shot by wicked men into their own faces. There is in human affairs an under-current, that carries mankind to a different port from the one in which they expected to cast anchor. In the loom of destiny there are others at work besides the visible weavers. God's angels stretch the warp, while men are filling in the woof.

What knoweth the worm, reared by the skillful hand of the silk-grower, of the beautiful fabric he is helping to construct? What knoweth the bee of his owner's design in furnishing him a hive and transferring him from one apartment to another, as the industrious little insect fills up cell after cell with his honied hoard? So toils man, freely, intelligently; yet what he is to accomplish depends not on his own purpose, but on the overruling Providence that controls his movements.

Obstinate indeed must be the infidel that cannot recognize the influence of the celestial weavers in the web we are weaving this day. No human wisdom could have executed the grand drama which is working out the redemption of our country.

President Lincoln had almost reached the goal of his hopes. Four years of brave struggling had given him the victory over his foes. Weary days and sleepless nights had worn his nerves, weakened his step, and wrinkled his brow with furrows, and now the prospect of a free, glorious, happy country, began to dawn on his vision as the clear shining sun after a night of storm. In obedience to the nation's will, he is seated in the chair of empire for another four years. Deep and solemn are the words he utters. They are borrowed not from books of law, but from the oracles. He spoke as Moses would have spoken; he talked of justice and eternal principles; in all the mighty panorama passing before our eyes he could only recognize the hand of a Divine Being, guiding the destinies of mortals and measuring out righteous retributions. But he did not seem to share the confidence of those around him that the dark and bloody day was over. Prompted, as by some heavenly monitor, he intimated his apprehension that the reckoning would not be closed, "until every drop of blood drawn with the lash should be paid by another drawn with the sword!" Ruler and high priest of a nation, thy words are prophetic. The clouds which roll up before thy vision are divine premonitions. Angel's pen will underscore that prediction with thine own heart's blood. The age of sacrifice has not yet passed away. Liberty has her altar, and upon it thou must lie. The hundreds of thousands already slain will not suffice. There must be a royal victim; the blood of the nation's ruler and representative must mingle with the crimson flood that washes the curse from our land. God will have a sacrifice that corresponds in magnitude with the dignity of the era.

The President enters Richmond. Rebel armies throw down their weapons at his feet. The magnanimous conqueror forgives. Vengence is to be known no more. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," is superseded by kindlier precepts. Those who have stabbed at the nation's heart have repented, and may now be intrusted with place and power. To their keeping we again commit three millions of slaves, now elevated to the dignity of freedmen. We trust them to the magnanimity of their former masters, believing they will legislate for them well and wisely, each state making such provision for the emancipated as it deems fitting. Such was the almost universal sentiment. In all human probability the work of liberation was to be left half-completed.

Four years have elapsed since the beautiful flag of our fathers was lowered from the ramparts of Fort Sumter, and the same hand that reverently bore it away now raises it again to float in its glory and grandeur for ages to come. Booming artillery from all the surrounding forts pour out their joyful salute. But hark! There is another flag raising. Celestial guardians are bending over the nation's capital. To the ear of mortals there is the crack of an assassin's pistol, but the echo rolls onward and upward, in circling waves, till it reaches the home of the angels and thunders through the mighty amphitheater of heaven. As Dr. Williams remarked in his funeral sermon;—that pistol shot was the salute for a banner that should never come down. The stabs of the Washington assassians were the nails that pinned to its shaft the flag of emancipation for the enduring ages of time. The hand that feebly, tremblingly, hesitatingly, hopefully, raised that banner, is stricken down; but the strength we have lost in that arm has flowed out into the atmosphere, and is nerving the sinews of twenty-five millions. The dull, heavy, death sobs that heaved that noble frame fell with talismanic power on every loyal ear, from the Atlantic border to the Pacific. "Thorough work now," is the cry that comes back from hearth and hamlet, and sounds through the land, like the sharp, quick, piercing ring of clanging steel. Who pleads for Baal now? Who now will throw himself against the car of emancipation? Who now demands that treason shall go unpunished?

"Whatsoever God doeth, it shall be forever; nothing can be put to it, nor anything taken from it." Abraham Lincoln might come short: his heart might soften, or his hand relax, in the stern mission so uncongenial to his gentle nature; but this stroke of Heaven has accomplished its work, and rounded off the complete emancipation for which we prayed.

Henceforth the Fourteenth of April will be the second great holiday; it will even surpass, in heroic interest, the Fourth of July. Two bright names will tower above all others in American history, the Hero of Emancipation, and the Hero of Independence; and in foreign realms, when speaking of this country, men will call it the land of Washington and of Lincoln.

Such is the effect of the assassination upon the object of its hate; it elevates to an immortality of honor the man whom it sought to destroy. What is the effect upon the conspiracy and the conspirators? It has done for them what the sacrifice of Elijah did for the prophets of Baal. There was no power in Israel to execute upon those defiers of God the penalty of his law. The Israelites were demoralized by treason. The proposal to slay four hundred and fifty priests, for worshipping another God than Jehovah, would have been regarded by them as perfectly monstrous. But the nation was educated up to this by the events of a single day. The stern old prophet seized the moment, and with unshrinking fidelity to the God of his fathers, he ordered the people to lay hold on the false prophets, and they obeyed him. And Elijah brought them down to the brook Kishon, and slew them there. When Andrew Johnson administers like punishment to the authors of this rebellion, all the people will say amen. The fourteenth of April has educated them. Nothing less terrible would have done it. The precise means was adapted to the precise end. Ordinarily,

"'Tis not for us, with prying eyes,
To point the judgments of the skies;
But lessons such as this,
Which sent for man's instruction, bring
A written label on their wing,
Cannot be read amiss.'"

The prophet Micah had a vision of the inner springs of the divine machinery, when he saw the Lord sitting upon his throne, and all the host of heaven standing on his right hand, and on his left. Who, said the Lord, shall entice Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? Then came there out a spirit and said, I will entice him. "Thou shalt entice him and thou shalt also prevail; go out and do even so." These old records are looming up, fresh from the dust of centuries, and have a new significance as we read them in the light of this rebellion. Every step of the conspirators, during the whole four years, seems to have been prompted by enticing spirits, leading them by superhuman skill into the trap of destruction. Ordinary wisdom would have prevented the mistakes they have made. But

"Quem deus vult perdere, prius dementat."

Whom God wills to destroy, he first deprives of reason.

"Be wise now, therefore, O ye kings, be instructed, ye judges of the earth." Truth shall prevail; righteousness shall endure; the just shall be held in everlasting remembrance, but the name of the wicked shall rot.— The American Baptist.

NO FUTURE LIFE OUT OF CHRIST.

BY ELD. JONATHAN WILSON.

VERMONT P. O., N. Y. April 24, 1865.

Paul asks, Gal. iii. 21, "Is the law then against the promises of God?" and answers his own question by saying, "God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. But the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. In verse 16 Paul says, "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." Verse 29, "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." This promise had no allusion to Abraham's natural seed, but to his spiritual seed. Rom ix. 8, ". . . they which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed." Acts ii. 39, "For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." These are the children of promise and not the natural seed. Rom. iii. 9—21, "What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise; forwe have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin. As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one: There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips: whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: their feet are swift to shed blood: destruction and misery are in their ways: and the way of peace have they not known: there is no fear of God before their eyes. Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world are guilty before God. Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin."

I have read the report of the debate on the subject of God's system of the resurrection from the dead, which took place, in Boston, between two of my good brethren. They have given us the measure of the branches of the trees of knowledge and of life,—so I thought I would dig down and measure the roots of them.

In the system of creation, roots are the first thing that start from the germ of every thing that is planted. Mortal creation was made for a platform, that God might form a perfect family to enjoy happiness with himself, in immortality. He did not design that mortal creation, in that state of existence, should be eternal,—for the nature of mortality forbids eternal existence,—but that Adam, with all his posterity, might form a character, by obedience, worthy of immortality. The lower animals were made for their use and support while they were fulfilling this test of their obedience. The tree of life would for ever have prevented death if they had obeyed God. The change of existence, from mortality to immortality, would have been their reward for obedience. In announcing the penalty, "In dying you shall die," (Margin) God revealed the only penalty for sin that has ever been threatened to man. Inasmuch as the penalty was made known before Adam sinned Paul, Heb. ix. 27, calls it an "appointment." As Adam's trial was a representative one, the same sentence was on all his posterity, which we daily see carried out. Not an intimation of any resurrection from the dead in all the above trial. And as Adam was our representative, if no other system for our recovery is found, all is lost in nonenity, and God's plan of separating an immortal family out from Adam's posterity is totally lost.

But hark! While despair was making her last moan, a voice was heard, "I have found a ransom." Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, has proffered himself to be a sacrifice for the redemption of Adam's lost race; that this lost race might have the privilege of forming a character, through faith in His blood, worthy of that immortal world and family of God. A redemption, by a resurrection, from that death which otherwise would have been eternal.

Christ's answer to the Sadducees' question, as to the resurrection, is full of light. He contrasts the present world with the future by saying, The children of this world marry and are given in marriage; but they which shall be accounted worthy of that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more, for they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Thus we see "the wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23. This being true, the resurrection, cannot be applied to the wicked, for they are under the sentence of death. They are criminals against the law of God. But, says my good brother, The penalty now on Adam's race is "the second death." We will look at it, and if so, reason and scripture will prove it.

We have seen that God's law to men was given out in the garden of Eden, and no second death or resurrection mentioned. A criminal case tried by God himself, and no "second death." The world drowned 1600 years after creation—no second death. Sodom an example to those who, in the future, should live ungodly lives—no second death there. If the second death penalty is a bible one, then God gave his law to men 4000 years before he made known what the penalty of it was. Christ, after he arose from the dead, came to his disciples, saying, all power in heaven is given unto me, and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations; baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things I have commanded you. See Math. xxviii. 19. Mark's testimony on this point, chap. xvi. 15, 16, "And he said unto" his disciples, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." From this quotation we learn that all of Adam's race who will believe, shall be saved.

From a perusal of numerous passages such as Luke. xxiv. 47, John iii. 36; v. 12, 13; vi. 53, 54; v. 40, we deduce the following as God's plan of salvation: When the sinner repents and believes on the Son of God, he forgives his sins and meets the law's demand on him by being made righteous through Christ. In 1 Cor. i. 30 Paul says, But of him are we in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption. The sinner is saved by grace, without the deeds of the law; for the law of the spirit of life in Christ hath made him free from the law of sin and death. Rom. viii. 2. A question, Why should the redeemed Christian die? Because he must be changed from mortality to immortality, or never inherit the kingdom of God; but death, through a resurrection or translation, separates mortality by leaving it in the dust. But from that spiritual seed, implanted by Christ in the sinner's heart, comes his resurrection identity and raises him a spiritual body. This being the entire use, in God's plan of redemption, of a resurrection and translation. We see that neither of them can ever be used on the wicked, for Christ said they should not see life.

THE FIFTH COMMANDMENT.

"Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."—Exodus xx. 12.

Do you remember how many tables of stone there were, on which the Ten Commandments were written? Two. There is another question I want to ask. I remember when I was a little boy, this question was asked me, and I gave a wrong answer to it. One day the minister was catechising the children, in the church to which I went, and he asked me this question: "How many commandments were there on each of the tables?" None of the other children answered the question, so I thought I would answer it. I was a little fellow, and had not learned much about the commandments; but I understood enough about division, to know that the half of ten is five, and thinking that was the most natural division to make, I spoke out, and said—"Five on each, sir." The good minister shook his head, and said, "No, that's not right." Then he went on to tell us that the commandments, when written on the two tables given to Moses, were divided, not according to number, but according to subjects. He told us that these ten commandments all referred to two great subjects. These are, our duty to God, and our duty to our neighbor. Our duty to God takes in four of the commandments. Our duty to our neighbour takes in six. And so there were four commandments on the first table, and six on the second. This was the way in which I learned how many commandments were on each of the tables. I never forgot the lesson I learned that day: It is about thirty-five years ago since that took place. It seems like a long while to look back to; and yet I remember it just as clearly as though it only occurred yesterday.

Now we have got through with the first table of the commandments. We have considered the four which relate to our duty to God. To-day we begin the second table With this begins the subject of our duty to our neighbor. What are the words of the fifth commandment!

"Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Notice my dear children, how this second table of the commandments begins. God is going to show us our duty to our neighbor. How does he begin? Not by telling us how kings ought to reign, or soldiers ought to fight, or how merchants ought to conduct their business; but how boys and girls ought to behave at home.

This is the most important thing for every young person to consider. God thought it important enough for Him to write it, with his own finger, on a table of stone. That shows us how very important it is. When you want to do any thing well, you must be careful to begin right.

Suppose you are going to raise a tune. Well, you must be careful to start it on the proper key. But if you want to sing "Old Hundred," and start it with the key-note of "Yankee Doodle," why you never could get on with it. You would have to stop. You would be sure to break down, and have to begin again.

And so if you begin to put up a house, and lay the foundation wrong; or to build a ship, and make a mistake in laying the keel; you'll have to take it all down, and begin again. Oh! it is very important to begin right. It is so in every thing. And it is so in trying to do our duty to our neighbor.

The fifth commandment shows us how we must begin to do this. We must begin at home. You show me a boy or girl, who is not a good son or daughter, who does not honor father and mother, and I will show you one who will not make a good man or woman. What does the fifth commandment require us to do? To honor our father and mother. This starts two questions for us to consider. The first is: How are we to honor our father and mother? The second is: Why should we do this? You see there are just two words on which these questions hang. One is the word—How? The other is the word—Why?

If you look into your wardrobe, you will see pegs, or hooks, on which things are hung. Just so these two words—How? and Why? are the hooks on which this whole sermon will be made to hang. There are four things to hang on the first hook; and two on the second.

Now we come to the first hook;—How? How are we to honor our parents? Four things are to go on this hook. If we describe these things according to granmer, we may call one of them a noun; that is, the name of a thing; the other three are adjectives, which qualify the noun, or show what sort of a thing it is.

The first thing to go on this hook—How?—is the word—obedience.

To honor our parents, means to obey them. But, then, our obedience must be of the right kind, or else it will be no honor to them.

The other day I was coming home from New York. In the seat before me, in the car, sat a plain woman, with two children, a boy and a girl. They were going out to Ohio. I was sorry to see that the children did'nt seem to mind much that their mother said. After awhile, I saw the mother trying to get something out of a basket on another seat. I thought, perhaps, she had some cakes or candy in it, and that she wanted to give these to the children to make them mind what she said. But when she got the basket open, she drew out from it, not cakes or candy, but a rope, about a yard long, and as thick as my little finger. It had a knot on each end of it; and she doubled it up, and held it in her hand, and shook it at the children whenever she told them to do any thing. She would say—"John, sit down there," and shake the rope at him. Down John would sit.

"Mary, move over into that other seat."

"John, put down that window, this minute." John obeyed, instantly. He knew what would come if he didn't. These children obeyed their mother, but did they honor her? No. They didn't honor their mother; they honored the rope. That kind of obedience might be called rope's end obedience. It isn't good for much. The motive that leads to it is the fear of punishment. This is a wrong motive. But if we want to have right actions, we must be sure and have right motives. We ought to obey our parents, because it is the will of God that we should do so, and because we love them. These are the proper motives for obedience to our parents. What are these motives? The will of God, and love to our parents.

Now, suppose that the woman I have spoken of, had pursued a different plan. Suppose that, instead of shaking that rope at her children all the while, she had taken her Bible, and said to them:—

"My dear children, that is God's word. In it God speaks to us, and tells us what He wants us to do. Let me read to you what God says about children. Here in Exodus, 20th chapter and 12th verse, He says—'Honor thy father and mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.' Now, you see, when I tell you to do anything, or not to do it, it is just the same as if God told you. When you obey me, you obey God. When you disobey me, you disobey God; yes, the great, the good, the glorious God, whom all the angels of heaven obey. Only think what a dreadful thing it must be to disobey Him!"

Suppose she had spoken to them in this way, and that, instead of scolding, and slapping, and storming at them continually, she had been kind, and tender, and affectionate, in her treatment of them. Then she would have taught them to obey her. After this she might have left the rope behind her.

Now, we have got one thing on the hook—How? It is the noun—obedience. Obedience is necessary, if we would honor our parents. But it must be the right kind of obedience. Here we want our adjectives to qualify the noun.

It must be ready obedience. Now we have two things on the hook—How?

If we want to honor our parents by our obedience, we must not stop to ask questions about what we are told to do, or try to find out the reason for it. It is reason enough that our parents tell us to do a thing.

I was reading the other day, about two little girls, who had a dear, good mother whom they loved very much. She was poor, however, and often had to be away from home all day, on business. On these occasions, the children always looked forward, with great interest, to their mother's return in the evening. That was the happiest hour of the day to them.

One day, when she was absent, they had been making something nice for her, which they knew would please her very much. This made them unusually anxious for their mother's return that day. The hours rolled slowly away, and it seemed, to the impatient waiters, as if the evening would never would come. At last they spied their mother coming up the lane. They then scampered down the garden walk to meet her. But, instead of opening her arms to receive them, as usual, they saw her motioning them to go back. When she got nearer, she said, in a stern voice, "Go back directly, into the house, and don't come near me till I call you."

This was a great disappointment to the poor girls. One of them began to cry, as if her heart would break. She couldn't understand it, and thought it very hard for their mother to treat them so. The other told her to wait a little while, for she was sure that mother had some good reason for what she did, which would make it all right when it was explained to them.

Presently, when their mother had changed her dress, and washed herself, she came out of her room, with her usual smile upon her face, and was as kind to them as ever. Then she told her little girls that on her way home, she had stopped to visit a poor family. On entering the house, she found that one of the children had just died of the scarlet fever. She had helped to lay out the dead child. They knew that that dreadful disease was catching. It is often carried in a person's clothes, so that others may take it in that way. She was afraid her daughters might take it, if they came near, before she had time to wash, and change her clothes. This was the reason why she told them to go back, and keep away from her. Then the girls saw how right it was to obey their mother readily, whether they understood the reason for what they were told to do or not. Ready obedience is necessary, if we would honor our parents.

But absent obedience, as well as present, is necessary.

I mean by this, that we must obey our parents when we are away from them, as well as when we are with them.—How? Obedience; ready; absent.

A little boy, about seven years old, was on a visit to a lady, who was very fond of him. Although he was a great way from home, he behaved very well, and endeavored to do every thing that he thought would have pleased his parents had they been present.

One day, at breakfast, there was some hot bread upon the table. It was handed to him; he refused to take it.

"Don't you like hot bread?" asked the lady of the house.

"Yes ma'am," said he, "I'm very fond of it."

"Then my dear, why don't you take some?"

"Because my father doesn't want me to eat hot bread."

"But your father is a great way off, and will never know anything about it. You had better take some for once, if you like it. It will do no harm."

This was very wrong in the lady. She ought to have been ashamed of herself. She was tempting her little visitor to break the fifth commandment. But listen to the little boy's answer. "No," said he, "I will not disobey my father, although he is not here to see me. He might never know it, but I should know it, and that would be enough."

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

TERMS:—Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar FOR SIX MONTHS; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York city, 48 cents additional. Persons sending five new subscribers, with advance pay, will be entitled to a sixth copy for their services.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, any where out of the United States. Anywhere in the United States, the subscriber may just as well pay the postage at his own Post Office, as to send the amount to us, and subject us to the trouble of doing it here. It is far less trouble to the subscriber than to us, and we must absolutely decline doing it for any within the States. Let this be remembered.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed—

THE WICKED DEAD AND JUDGMENT.

Br. Grant's first assertion, in the Crisis, respecting the positions taken in our late discussion, is as follows: "It was stated the first evening that the resurrection was not necessary for judgment." This statement of my brother should have been more guarded. What I did say was this: that the negative himself held opinions by which, if he adhered to them, he would "be logically required to admit that the resurrection of the wicked is not essential to their judgment—which," I added, "is the very thing that I believe and teach." And I claim that in this light the matter should be placed before the Crisis readers. As they now have it, they will conclude that the ground imputed to me was made to cover the righteous equally with the wicked; and this inference ought to be corrected, for the simple reason that it is not true. Another natural but equally erroneous inference is, that I laid it down as an independent proposition, that resurrection is not necessary for judgment. Whatever I might legitimately have done on this head, had I felt disposed, the fact is—and Crisis readers should behold the fact—that I sought to fasten the proposition upon Br. Grant himself, as the inevitable deduction from certain premises that he admits to be true. What I said on this subject, on the first evening, had been previously reduced to writing; and that our readers may know what my remarks on the point actually were,—bating only one word, and that a redundant preposition,—I give the following

EXTRACT FROM MY SPEECH.

Proposition II.—The theory of the Negative punishes the wicked one thousand years before it judges them.

My reason for presenting this point, and insisting on it, at the outset of this debate, will readily appear. My brother on the negitive, in a former discussion, took the ground that judgment must precede punishment and resurrection must precede judgment. Now, if he will adhere to the positions, 1st, that the wicked will remain dead for a thousand years after the resurrection of the righteous, and, 2d, that the judgment of the wicked must precede their punishment,—then, if I prove that the wicked dead will be in a state of punishment during the one thousand years immediately following the Second Advent, my brother will be logically required to admit, that the resurrection of the wicked is not essential to their judgment—which is the very thing that I believe and teach.

I ask, therefore, Is my proposition true? I answer, yes; for the reason that that which—according to a theory assented to as firmly by my brother as by myself—constitutes the essence of eternal punishment, commences at the very moment when the Saints of God are glorified. My brother's doctrine, stated in his own emphatic words, is this: "The wages of sin is death,—not DYING, but DEATH, which is the END of dying." He has also said that—"Eternal death is the highest possible punishment. The wicked lose all that the righteous gain." Here, then, is the sound principle, that loss, resulting from impenitence, is punishment. "The wicked," says my brother, "lose all that the righteous gain." But if they "lose all that the righteous gain," they must lose that condition of immortal blessedness which the saints will enjoy during the first thousand years of the life to come. Now, if all their loss is punishment, it follows, enevitably, that their punishment is not delayed an instant beyond the time when the good are glorified.

For my brother to say, that the death-condition of sinners during the thousand years in question, is not called punishment,—even if it were not (what it is) a begging the question,—would be of no avail. Names do not alter the nature of things; and, since the thing we are considering has the nature of punishment, it is punishment. The man who assails this position, aims a blow at the very foundation of our whole theory of literal death as the penalty of impenitence. The advocate of endless misery could not ask a more vital concession, in respect to the principles underlying the doctrine of future punishment, than my brother will be compelled to make, unless he admits what I am now maintaining. Should he refuse to admit it, I beg leave to ask—having distinctly in view the point of time marking the termination of the thousand years under consideration,—wherein does the sinner's condition, after that point of time, differ from what it was before that time is reached? Is the after-condition one of loss? So is the other. Is the after-condition in consequence of final impenitence? So is the other. Is the after-condition the result of a determination with God that the sinner must eternally perish? So is the former. Will the sin of Adam in Eden account for the after-condition? Just as much as it will for the former. What more do we need on this point? But we have more.

ADDITIONAL REMARKS.

When I had got thus far my time was up. In subsequent speeches, other arguments, from positive Bible statements, were offered to prove that the infliction of the divine penalty is not to be deferred to a period a thousand years beyond the coming of the Lord. Two passages were for this purpose pressed with emphasis, and their crushing force the negative found himself wholly unable to turn aside. One of these was 2 Thess. i. 9, 10, which announces the fact that "WHEN" Christ "shall come"—not a thousand years after that event—"them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," "shall be PUNISHED with EVERLASTING destruction." The negative staggered under the weight of this testimony, and knew not how to reconcile it with his theory. He suggested two explanations: 1. That the class here named (referring, he thought, to the generation of sinners who should be alive at the Advent) might be destroyed but once and so escape "the second death." 2. That the term "everlasting" might in this passage denote, not endless duration, but a period of a thousand years. Thus there might be a resurrection, to be followed by an endless "everlasting destruction."

Br. G. seemed to think that one of these hypotheses was the true one, but which of them he could not tell. Admit the first, and you have, from his stand-point, a cluster of anomalous results. 1. The true death penalty (to-wit, a second dying) is escaped. 2. During a thousand years all the generations of sinners are—on account of their impenitence, be it ever remembered—in a state of death, and of consequent exclusion from the joys of the saved, and yet only those whose career was cut short by the advent of Jesus, are in a state of punishment! 3. Br. G.'s claim, that justice to sinners demand that they shall be restored to life from what he calls "the first death," comes to nought. Should he evade the force of this remark by affirming that this plea from justice does not hold good in the case of those who are cut off by a special visitation of Divine wrath, he will at once open a wide door for unwelcome deductions respecting innumerable multitudes who in the past have thus perished. But I need not pursue these points.

Allow the second of the proposed explanations of our passage, and we have the doctrine of a punishment lasting a thousand years before its subjects are judged. But would nullify the revealed fact that the Lord reserves "the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." Besides, if the "everlasting destruction" of 2 Thess. i. 9 may be reversed, by a resurrection, what certain proof of the final extinction of the wicked can we find in the Bible. But the explanation in question seems too unreasonable to be entitled to serious consideration. The negative himself virtually gave it up when he admitted that the "everlasting punishment" of Matt. xxv. 46, is of illimitable duration. This passage from Matthew he could not harmonize with his theory, which locates judgment and punishment a thousand years beyond the time "when the Son of man shall come in his glory" (ch. xxv. 31). The Evangelist is right—the theory wrong.

The reasoning offered in support of my "Proposition II" the negative could not answer. His attempt to make my logic responsible for the notion that some dead saints have been punished for 5000 years, was shown to be entirely futile. The negative's citation of Rev. xx. 13, to prove that the wicked must be made alive in order to be judged, will hereafter be noticed. R. W.

A SOUL: ITS VALUE.

As we are informed that he that converteth a sinner shall save a soul from death, and as the question has been propounded by the Great Preacher "What is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" it may be proper to occupy ourselves a little with contemplating its value.

By the term soul, here, we are to understand a human being; for a parallel passage represents the gainer of the whole world, as "loosing himself or becoming a cast away."

This question of the Saviour, in itself, would be sufficient to awaken our attention to a consideration of the value of man—as he seems to throw him singly into the scale, and weigh him against the world—certainly he must be of immense and incalculable value.

We sometimes attach value to an article on account of its origin. And if the lovers of the beautiful, would spare no wealth to obtain a block of marble chisseled by the hand of a Praxiteles, or a picture drawn by the pencil of an Angelo, what must be the value of the living specimen of Jehovah's handiwork? What must be the price of that clay that has been moulded in beauty by the hands of Elohim, and enlivened by the breath of his lips?

Or, if we estimate the value of a substance by the associations that it recalls, if we value some battered and mutilated statue because it presents not only the glory of Grecian art, but also the image of a Grecian Hero, and the story of his noble deeds,—then how highly shall man be valued—since he furnishes us with our nearest and most perfect type of Him, in whose image he was created, and also appears to be as a rich though ruined relic of the golden age that has long since passed away?

But this is an age when men are busy inquiring after the profit, the practical value, and utility of things. And in this point of view, if we value the mechanism that in its operation transcends the wildest fancy of days gone by; if we prize the master products of human ingenuity; if we contemplate with astonishment and admiration the fruits of human intellect, wherewith shall we value the being that has within him not only the elements of these magnificent productions, but also the germs and seeds of other and mightier ones, that are yet unborn?

We value a seed because it may with careful culture expand and display a gorgeous flower, or spring upward and become a stately tree. We value a helpless child because he is the father of the man, and within that infantile mind are undeveloped powers that will grow with its growth, and strengthen with its strength, until earth shall tremble with fear, or smile with delight at the mention of his name. And if we thus value these things, how shall we value man, the noblest work of God, who, if planted in a nobler soil, and beneath a kindlier sky, and endowed with continuance there, might and would, in his expansion, as far transcend his present littleness as the tree in the branches of which all the fowls of the heaven do lodge, exceeds "the mustard seed," "which is the smallest among the seeds."

Not the least valuable property of man is his capacity for enjoyment. If his ice-like heart was warmed by no kindly glow; if he was void of emotion, as the machinery that he produces; if joy never could cause his heart to beat higher, and his eye to beam with an unwonted brightness, then his value would well nigh be gone. Who would desire to preserve a race unfeeling as the stones? Who would weep to see the waters of oblivion close for ever above a generation that could never be happy?

But man is not so. O, there are even in this world, days of joy that would repay long years of toil. There are hours into which the bliss of a life-time seems to be crowded, and which make the weary son of sorrow forget his toils and repent of his murmurings, and say, "It is good for me that I have lived upon the earth." But these mountain tops with their sun-gleams are rare, and the intervening valleys with their gloom are deep and dreary. But there is another world, where the gladness of an earthly life may be comprised in the period of a single hour; where all the melody of earth shall be forgotten in one glorious burst of music from "harpers harping with their harps"; where all the grand and thrilling anthems of this world shall lose their harmony in that one song of "Salvation to our God." And man may be there! Man who takes so much delight in earthly joy, may share that which shall be perfect and unending. Man who wears out his life in the pursuit of a few evanescent pleasures, may share that fulness of joy, and possess those pleasures for evermore.

Yes: for ever; for man may be brought up from the dust of death; his weakness may become power; his dishonor may become glory; and that which was natural and dying in its constitution, may become spiritual and immortal by the will and power of God. And does not this render his value incalculable? The proudest works of man must pass away and moulder down. History shows us this. But while of the Temple of Jerusalem, with its magnificence, only a few pilgrim-kissed stones remain; while the Parthenon, the brightest gem of earth's broad zone, is but a heap of ruins; while the Palaces of the Cæsars has become a rope-walk—the Roman Forum, a cow-market—and the Tarpeian rock a cabbage garden; while even the Pyramids themselves are all hastening to decay; while earth and all its glory rolls on to dissolution and desolation; while the works that are in it, however costly or enduring, must kindle the fires of the burning day, man may survive them all and though in the cycles of eternity, star after star may disappear from view, yet shall the saint of God live onward. And is he of no value?

Let us look from another point of view. Go, mourner, go and gather to thyself all the wealth of many lands. Enter the caverns of the deep and bring up the riches of sunken argosies, ransack the bowels of the earth; enter the coffers of the rich and the covetous; traverse the broad world and return and bring its gold and silver and heap it in one vast and glittering pile. Go, again and bring "each gem that glows amid earth's treasures of darkness," bring the sapphire and the emerald, the ruby and the crystal, the diamond and the onyx, bring up each pearl that lies hidden beneath the ocean wave, and pluck each brilliant that sparkles in the coronet of royality; bring all these, and lay them with all the broidered and costly apparel, with all the fragrant perfumes and precious spices of eastern lands; by the loved one's grave, and thus see if you can buy back a single one from the embrace of death. Yea, go and bring every gem that sparkles in the foundations of the City of God—bring every treasure that is there displayed, and bribe the grim king of terrors to let thy loved one go; and there, while the gates of the grave are yet unclosed, and while no answer comes from the guardian of those gloomy realms, learn the value of a soul!

Nay, we must go farther to learn it. We must pass by the treasures of earth as of no account—we must leave behind us the precious wisdom of the sages of olden time—we need not bring the prayers of the good, they will not avail, even the tear of penitence, so precious in the sight of God, is worthless here. We must forget all these and yet inquire the value of a soul. We must traverse every land, and survey every product of God's creative energy, and having sought throughout the universe, we must come back, and stooping down beside the cross of Calvary, we must grope amid the "darkness" that is "throughout all the land," until the returning light reveals to us the Saviour dead, and the earth crimsoned with his trickling blood. Here shall we find the value of a soul, and here standing beneath the shadow of the cross we will read—"Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot."

Here is the long-sought price—the equivalent of the soul. No wonder thatthe Apostle exhorted his brethern to care for the flock of God, since he had bought them with his own blood. This is the price—the blood of the Son of God for the soul—the man.

And now need I say one word to influence any to engage in the work of saving mankind? This soul once lost is lost forever. This soul must be saved "from death," or it must "die." It must live onward while eternity shall roll its ample cycles, or it must be "punished with everlasting destruction," and "be as though it had not been." These are the utterances of inspiration, the oracles of eternal truth. And that "soul" is yourself, or your brethern, your sister, your wife, your husband, or your neighbor.

Brethern, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him, let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins. H. L. H.

Plymouth, Mass., Feb., 1853.

"CONSISTENCY A JEWEL."

The Voice of the West, April 25, has two articles on the subject of the end of the wicked, which illustrate the consistency of that sheet very finely. The first is a quotation of three different translations of John v. 28, 29 and Acts xxiv. 14, 15, and concludes with the question, "Are men safe guides to follow, who figure away these Scriptures to mean some thing else?"

The imputation isa false one; for we who hold the non-living of the wicked dead do not make the texts "mean something else" than what the Scriptures teach; but we harmonize them with the plain declarations of the Bible that, "they are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise;" and like testimony, with which the scriptures abound; and does not the Voice do the same thing with other subjects? Let the following article, Editorial, in the same paper, show how consistent the Voice can be in its opposition to "No life out of Christ." It is as follows:

THOUGHTS ON DIFFICULT TEXTS.

Question.—Will you explain Isaiah lxvi. 24; Mark ix. 44—48; Revelation xiv. 11, xx. 10.

"And they shall go forth, and shall see the carcasses of the men who rebelled against me: for their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring to all flesh." (Is. lxvi. 24.)

"Their worm shall not die." This alludes to Gehenna, or the valley of Hinnom, south-east of Jerusalem. Here, in the degenerate days of Israel, they sacrificed their children to Moloch, after the custom of the heathen. After the reformation by good Josiah, this place was made the repository of the filth of the city, of dead carcasses which bred worms and vermin. As a sanitary measure, fires were kept continually burning. It was also called the "valley of slaughter," or of death. It referred to nothing in the unseen, or future world. (Jer. vii. 30–34.)

But the Saviour has used these symbols to illustrate the punishment of the wicked. "Their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched;" and, also, "Go into hell, into the fire that shall never be quenched" (Mark ix. 43—49). This latter phrase, "the fire that shall never be quenched," is regarded as a spurious reading by some eminent critics. But, take it as it is, and it does not teach eternal misery. The fire is to consume, and the worm is to destroy. These agents are said to be unquenchable in the one case, and undying in the other. But the victim is eaten by the worm and consumed by the fire. Else the figure cannot be carried out: for in the valley of Hinnom, the carcasses of dead men, cattle, and dogs, were consumed by fire and worms. The figure cannot be made to mean that the wicked are cast into Gehenna, to be kept alive, and suffer a double punishment of scorching fire and gnawing worms. Bishop Whately, Dr. Alexander, and Albert Barnes agree that the worm feeding on the dead carcasses shall not die till they are devoured, and the fire shall not be quenched till they are consumed. The figure, therefore, denotes great misery, and certain and terrible destruction. But it is said that it does not mean literal fire and worms. It is mental suffering; but the word of God does not say it is mental suffering.

The expression, "fire that shall not be quenched," is used by the Holy Spirit elsewhere, in which there is no reference to future punishment. God said to the Jews, "If ye will not hearken unto me, I will kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem; and it shall not be quenched." (Jer. xvii. 27.) "My anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place, and it shall burn and not be quenched." (Jer. vii. 20.) And the punishment of Edom is also in point, "And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. It shall not be quenched night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up forever: from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it for ever and ever." Isa. xxxiv. 9, 10.

In the above and other passages, the phrase, unquenchable fire, or fire that shall not be quenched, are used to denote destruction. And in Matt. iii. 12 our Saviour speaks of the penalty and punishment for sin, as "burning up the chaff [the wicked] with unquenchable fire."

The next passage is in Rev. xiv. 11, "And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever." In reading carefully the connection of this phrase, it will be seen that it has no reference to the future state. It describes the punishment that is to be brought upon the Roman Papal power in its final overthrow, like Sodom and Gomorrah. Dr. Barnes says, "It tells the final overthrow of all the upholders of the Papacy." No critic in our day will quote this text to prove eternal misery.

The last passage of the list is Rev. xx, 10. You will find an exposition of this text in No. 49 of the Voice. If it is not satisfactory, let us hear from you again.

The old construction of these texts, which has come down to us from the church of Rome, will not stand an enlightened criticism. Our habits of thought and education have been much influenced by papal theology. It is time we were emancipated from those views of God and his word that only fill us with agony, and embrace those that are in harmony with God's parental character, as well as his word.

The last paragraph of the forgoing article is a home thurst, in which we heartily concur. We wonder the Voice cannot see the application of these remarks to the horrible doctrine of a revival into life of all the wicked dead to torment and kill them again. But the eyes of the blind man opened gradually. At first he only saw "men as trees walking:" another touch of "the life and truth" enabled him to see "all things clearly." So it may yet be with the Voice, and its last paragraph in the above article makes us hopeful.—Editor of Herald.

THE INSCRUTABLE.

Narrow-minded bigots, and persons of limited intellect, have a foolish prejudice against the investigation of the unknown. The great American philosopher, Benjamin Franklin—whose memory the world now delights to honor—was pronounced an infidel, and in league with the devil, when with his kite he was trifling with the lightnings and attempting to find out the inscrutable. Had he lost his life in those somewhat dangerous experiments, the verdict of ignorant superstition would have been, "Served him right; he should not thus have tempted God by prying into his secrets." Human reason is both limited and fallible, but does this imply that we should not use it?

Geologists were charged with trying to overthrow the sacred Scriptures, when they announced on the evidence of the "rock of ages," that this earth was more than six thousand years old. As though the discovery of one scientific truth could overthrow another.

The early Astronomers suffered persecution and even imprisonment for endeavoring to penetrate the so-called inscrutable, and make new revelations in the great unexplored field of natural science. So it has been from the beginning—before and since the time of Galileo. All new discoverers have been more or less martyred! Harvey, who discovered the circulation of the blood, was persecuted. Dr. Gall, the discoveror of Craniology, was driven out of Vienna, his native place, at the instance of the bigoted priesthood, who feared the dawning mental light of Phrenology.

But the early Christians suffered far more than this, for accepting and teaching the sublime yet simple, beautiful, and truthful principles taught by Him who was without sin.

How was it with the Apostles? By ignorant, prejudiced bigots, they were all, with one or two exceptions, put to death! And how was it with the author of our holy religion? By whom was He, who revealed to a benighted world the doctrine of "faith, hope, and charity," that incomparable plan of salvation—by whom was He nailed to a cross? Was it by good men, of broad and liberal views, who were seeking to enlighten, develop, and elevate man-kind? Or was it by the ignorant rabble, set on by wicked priests, who preferred "place" to truth? Let us pause a moment and look on that spectacle, the like of which never was, and never can be surpassed. What grandeur! what majesty there is in simple truth and trust! This was the most heroic action ever performed or conceived. Let that divine example of truth, trust, and resignation be ours!

What! afraid of truth! and with such examples before our eyes, must we forever drag along in the muddy ruts of ignorance and superstition? must we ignore our reason, and submit our bodies and souls to blind bigots? Mind grows! The souls of MEN expand. Only bigots, moles and bats prefer the darkness of mental night.

Because some of our forefathers burned heretics and criminals at the tree or the stake, and hung men and women for witchcraft, must we do so too?

Because some men were once cannibals and savages, are we, in this era of the world's progress, not to develop into a higher civilization? Have we reached the top round of the intellectual ladder? Then why erect "scare-crows" to frighten silly people or throw impediments in the way of discovery, invention and human progress? It seems to be the nature of bigots, donkey-like, to pull back, to oppose, and take a negative view of all things. They persecute, threat, and throttle those who would set the world ahead. Would we enjoy liberty to think; they would take away the right. Would we have spiritual and intellectual freedom? they will have the most abject slavery Would we have peace? they will have war. Would we have the benefits of a universal education? they would have it partial, and limited to a few. Would we establish a democratic or a republican form of government, and place mankind on something like an equal footing, so far as natural rights, and privileges are concerned? they would break it up, and put a monarchy, and a Pope in the place of a President. One class is in favor of the largest liberty compatible with law and order; the other class, of liberty for the few to rule, to lord it, and to ride over the many.

One class is in favor of free religion—the right of each to worship God according to his own conscience; the other impose on the people a state religion, to which all must pay tribute. The one sends out exploring expeditions into the uttermost ends of the earth, periling life and limb, searching for knowledge; the other, with folded hands, and eyes sealed to all things new, growls out to the more active, enterprising, and progressive, bidding them stop peering into the earth, sea, and sky, lest some new discovery may upset some old theory!

The one has grown old in bigotry, and has fallen into a state of dilapidated dotage; the other is young, vigorous, spirited, and progressive. The one is hopeless, desponding, and wanting that living faith which animates the other, and which grows with his growth. The small mental cup of the one is full, and can hold no more. The larger vessel of the other not only holds more, but by action will expand into mind and soul, which reaches toward the Infinite.

We are no bigots, nor are we afraid of truth. By "investigation, truth is established." But there is no danger of our ever finding out the inscrutable, or that which God would not have us know. Nor will he keep anything from us which would be useful for us to know. He has given us faculties to see, to hear, to taste, to smell; to investigate, discover, invent to comprehend and to understand his laws. He has made us all alike—so far as faculties and functions are concerned—except in degree; and all are alike accountable to Him rather than to self-elected persons, of whatever "cloth."

When will blind bigots see the folly of trying to bottle up the light of Heaven, and to deal it out in homeopathic doses to a hungry, rising, growing, and progressive race? When will they learn that they, too, are only "miserable sinners," "the blind leading the blind," and in the same boat with all the rest? and when will they modestly concede that there are some things in heaven and earth which they have not found out? "Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit; there is more hope of a fool than of him."

The most profound minds are usually the most modest and unpretentious, while the small-minded "braggarts" are generally pretenders and imposters.

Let us "live and learn," long as we may, in this world, the wisest will never know all, nor is there any possible danger of their ever penetrating very deeply into the inscrutable."

Notes of Missionary Labor.

BY THOMAS W. SMITH.

Left home on Friday morning, April 28th, for Pritchard Grove, Hardin Co. Rode through the rain for twenty-five miles of the way; reached Br. Clover's near sundown, wet and cold; but kind hands and warm hearts greeted us, and a generous fire and substantial supper soon made us comfortable. As no appointment had been given out for that evening, we spent several hours in conversation on Bible themes. Saturday visited several families and distributed tracts, and talked on no life out of Christ; spoke at night to a large congregation on the subject of Life only thro' the LIFE-GIVER; was listened to with much attention. Sunday spoke twice of the blessed results here and hereafter, of being in Christ; circulated some Heralds, and tracts; obtained one subscriber. Had several interesting conversations on weekly and yearly observance of the Lord's Supper. All with whom we conversed, after some discussion, were willing to relinquish the idea of weekly communion; several embraced the glorious doctrine of Life future and eternal only through Christ; among whom we might name Eld. Clover, an earnest and able preacher, who will henceforth preach life for life-lovers. Our meetings were interesting, and harmonious, and successful. To God be all the praise. We returned home on Monday, May 1st. Rained most of the way, and hailed severely just as we arrived home. We had to wear an overcoat because of the cold. Such was our first of May.

Alden, Iowa, May 2d.

In a later note, Br. Smith sends a subscriber, who is a minister. He says of him, "He likes the paper first rate; has given up the future torment theory, and believes in no life out of Christ. He is an earnest, able speaker, and is much liked. Doubtless he will aid the Herald. After an interesting discussion he gave up the 'weekly communion' notion, and so did several others."

STEPHEN BENTON, Middlebury, Vt., writes: I send $2. One for the Herald of Life, and one to help pay for the horse for Br. Smith, that he may be able to proclaim the glad tidings of Life only in Christ, the LIFE-GIVER. Your paper is hailed with joy; for I am alone in this place. I am looked upon as worse than an infidel by my christian neighbors. They proclaim that there are infants in hell not a span long. One good old Elder, when I was a boy, said, "Hell was lined with infants' skull bones." That was how I was taught; and now I try to tell them the error, and have them read; but not one word will they read in my paper.

JULINE FRENCH, Providence, R. I., writes:—I prize the Herald of Life next to my Bible. I rejoice in the truth it proclaims, and, also, thank God for the light I have received from perusing its columns. I can truly say, I believe there is no life out of Christ, who is our LIFE-GIVER.

AN UNKNOWN friend, Philadelphia, writes: I send you fifty cents, the first fee, or income, of a new business I have begun. Please invest it in Tracts, and send them to the "one armed preacher" we read of in your paper. May the blessing of the Lord go with them; and may they do some good in the far West. Yours in glorious hope.

DR. A. E. COLERICK, Western N. Y., passed through this city several months since, going South to spend the winter; we gave him "Life from the Dead: or, the Righteous only will live again." He now sends pay, and writes: —Those texts contained in that book were so plain and convincing that I was forced to believe in the non-resurrection of the wicked; which to me, now, looks like a merciful and wise plan of an all-wise Creator. Yours in hope of eternal life when our Redeemer comes.

"The Horse Stock Company."

Our friends have done nobly in providing a "Missionary Horse" for Br. Thos. W. Smith, Iowa, and the Shares are nearly all taken up. Less than $30 will complete the requisite amount, and already the Horse is on its work, as will be seen by the "NOTES" of Br. Smith in this week's Herald.

BR. S. A. KEMP, Florida, Mass., writes:—"I can truly say, it is more blessed to give than to receive. I have been considering the the subject of the Missionary Horse and have come to the conclusion that I must have a few shares in that enterprise. I will take five shares."

Now friends as the Horse is in the work for which it has been procured, let us clear off the few dollars still due for it, at once; for we wish to push forward the "Western Mission" cause next.

FRANCE has had sixty-seven queens. Eleven were divorced. Two executed. Nine died young. Seven were widowed early. Three cruelly treated. Three exiled. The rest were either poisoned or broken-hearted.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, MAY 17, 1865.

THE EDITOR expects to preach in KAST HALL, Boston, Mass., next Lord's day and the one following; or, May 21 and 28. This he has consented to do by the urgent and oft repeated request of the friends there. The HERALD OF LIFE will be looked after, in his absence, by Br. J. T. CURRY. The Editor will be away about ten days. If business letters are not responded to as early as usual our friends will know the cause—absence.

Backbiting.

A Backbiter is a poor moralist. It is much like "Satan rebuking sin." A man professing to be your friend writes a private letter to one who is antagonistic to you, and tells him a certain writer in a periodical you edit "does not seem to live in hailing distance of 1 Corth. xiii, nor entertain the meekness of Christ," and that he himself, is "grieved and indignant at the manner" a "gentle explanatory note was treated by him," &c., moreover, this private letter-writer, while he takes your paper and says he helped to start it, because he believed in "no life out of Christ," has "never dared to ask any one to subscribe for it" because of the "bad spirit" of the one writer he complains of. This letter-writer has made no attempt to reform the person he complains of, but sets in motion a secret machine, which the receiver of the private communication sets in motion as if the eye of the all-seeing ONE was not upon the backbiting operation.

The person complained of may have sometimes been what is called "severe:" but that is not always a sign of lack of "the meekness of Christ." Jesus himself called some men a "generation of vipers," and denounced them as "hypocrites;" and said, "ye devour widows' houses; and for a pretense make long prayers." That class of men has always had its "brood," who under pretense of great abhorrence of "severity" cover up their own and others' sin by private operations, which show them to be backbiters. Paul called some men "deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ," and said, it was "no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light," &c., Did all this import that Paul did not "live in hailing distance of 1 Corth. xiii?" or, that he did not "entertain the meekness of Christ"?

The parties for whom the foregoing is intended will understand what is meant by it. The writer of the private letter is unknown to us, as the author, and none will feel themselves intended unless they are the guilty ones: to them we commend the careful study of Psa. xv. "LORD who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?......He that backbiteth not with his tongue [or pen], nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor: in whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoreth them that fear the LORD." Let the backbiter go and learn what that meaneth; and let those who "take up" such backbiting and circulate it understand they belong to the same class.

Capture of Jeff. Davis.

The Ex-president of the defunct bogus "Confederacy," who is charged with being one of the Conspirators for the assassination of our late Chief Magistrate—President Lincoln of blessed memory—has been captured in Irwinsville, Ga., while attempting to make his escape from the officers of Justice: but justice is not so easily cheated by sinners as some seem to think. Jeff. Davis is the "Agag" of the late infamous rebellion, and let him be "hewn in pieces before the Lord," if we expect to wash out blood guiltiness from our national escutcheon. The blood of thousands and hundreds of thousands who have perished by this godless rebellion—multitudes of whom have been literally starved to death in Jeff. Davis' prison houses, by his knowledge and consent—cries for just and righteous retribution on the head of a man who is so lost to all sense of justice, mercy, and truth. Let him receive "the wages of sin" by the hands of "God's Ministers" who are His "revengers to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil." We say these things in no spirit of revenge; but in the full belief that our rulers are bound by their oaths of office, and the appointment of God, to execute the "death penalty" against such reckless sinners as Jeff. Davis and his willing associates; and not to do it, is to bring fresh judgments on the land by showing our disregard of justice, and thereby dishonoring that attribute of JEHOVAH.

The following is Gen. Wilson's official announcement of the capture of Jeff. Davis. It is dated MACON, Ga., May 13, and directed to Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War. Gen. Wilson says:

Lieutenant Colonel Harden, commanding the First Wisconsin, has just arrived from Irwinsville. He struck the trail of Davis at Dublin, Lawrence county, on the evening of the 7th, and followed him closely night and day through the pine wilderness of Alligator creek and Greek swamp, via. Cumberlandsville, to Irwinsville. At Cumberlandsville Colonel Harden met Colonel Pritchard, with one hundred and fifty picked men and horses, of the Fourth Michigan. Harden followed the trail directly south, while Pritchard, having fresh horses, pushed down the Ocmulgee towards Hopewell, and thence by House creek to Irwinsville, arriving there at midnight of the 9th. Jeff. Davis had not arrived. From a citizen Pritchard learned that his party were encamped two miles out of the town. He made dispositions of his men and surrounded the camp before day.

Harden had camped at nine P. M. within two miles, as he afterwards learned from Davis. The trail being too indistinct to follow, he pushed on at three A. M., and had gone but little more than a mile when his advance was fired upon by men of the Fourth Michigan. A fight ensued, both parties exhibiting the greatest determination. Fifteen minutes elapsed before the mistake was discovered. The firing in this skirmish was the first warning that Davis received. The captors report that he hastily put on one of his wife's dresses and started for the woods, closely followed by our men, who at first thought him a woman, but seeing his boots while he was running, they suspected his sex at once. The race was a short one, and the rebel President was soon brought to bay. He brandished a bowie knife and showed signs of battle, but yielded promptly to the persuasions of Colt's revolvers, without compelling the men to fire. He expressed great indignation at the energy with which he was pursued, saying that he had believed our government more maganimous than to hunt down women and children.

WESTERN MISSION.—If our friends in Illinois will arrange for four meetings, of three or four days each, at points where the best hearing can be had—in convenient halls, other buildings, or groves—each meeting to commence Thusday, and to hold over the following Sabbath, and let us know immediately, some preacher from the East will be there, the Lord willing, to help on the work; probably Br. J. T. Curry or the Editor of this paper. Let the first meeting commence Thursday, June 8.

Our friends who wish to help on this mission we hope will do so immediately by contributing to the MISSION & TRACT funds of their substance, as the Lord has prospered them.

We wish to send out a large quantity of Tracts into that western field.

"Thy Kingdom Come."

Not only did Jesus encourage his disciples to pray for the re-establishment of the throne of David over Israel, but he also showed them their personal interest in it. "Behold," said the ardent Peter, "we have forsaken all, and followed thee: what shall we have therefore?" The Master promptly responded—"Verily I say unto you, that ye who have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. xix. 27, 28. Here Jesus gives them a clear intimation that when he takes his seat as King over Israel and over all the earth, he will not be alone in his great work. He will have associates. This enables us to appreciate the prediction of Jeremiah. "As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured; so will I multiply the seed of David my servant." Jer. xxxiii. 22. Thus far we have considered David's seed as one person—Jesus the Messiah—but now we perceive that Jesus has the authority and disposition to call others to share in the government. The seed of David is not only one, it is many. "Thus saith YAHVEH, If my covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth, then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my servant, that I will not take of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them." Jer. xxxiii. 25, 26. The seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, will return to their own land, and the seed of David will be rulers over them. This seed or house of David consists of Jesus and his chosen associates. This makes certain the literal interpretation of Rev. ii 26, 27; iii. 21. "He that overcometh and keepeth my words unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I received of my Father." "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my thone, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

Intimations of this plurality of rulers in the future government are scattered through the Scriptures. "Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when YAHVEH of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and before his ancients, gloriously." Isa. xxiv. 23. "Ancients" refers to magistrates—the governing class. "His ancients" are those who sit with him on his throne. "Behold, a King [Jesus] shall reign in righteousness, and princes [his ancients] shall rule in judgment." Isa. xxxii. 1. "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Luke xii. 32. "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom [a figure of companionship], and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Luke xxii. 29, 30. "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world?" 1 Cor. vi. 2. "And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God king and priests: and we shall reign over the earth." Rev. iv. 9, 10.

Jesus reigns in his kingdom an immortal being: as his associates in the government will "be like him," they must therefore be immortal. Hence "except a man be begotten from above, he cannot see the kingdom of God." John iii. 3. We obtain this present mortal life by a natural generation; the next life being immortal and spiritual is preceded by spiritual generation. "Except a man be begotten of water even the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom [government] of God. That which is begotten of the flesh is flesh; and that which is begotten of the Spirit is spirit." John iii. 5, 6. "Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." 1 Cor. xv. 50. So that when we pray "Thy kingdom come" we ask for the coming of Jesus the Life-giver "who shall change our vile body, that it may be faishioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself."

The subjects of the future kingdom are not only restored Israel and Judah in the flesh, but "all peoples, nations, and languages" on the earth. Dan. vii. 14. All races of men will be brought under the administration of a just and holy central government. At the coming of our Lord to the earth there will be a great destruction of all who are found in wicked opposition to the Lamb. "The Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of hosts, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful." Rev. xxii. 14. The redeemed of Israel, standing on "the sea of glass, having the harps of God," "shall sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of nations. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest." Rev. xx. 3, 4. These manifested judgments of God in restoring his banished and afflicted people and making bare his arm of destruction among his enemies, will be the text of the great sermon, "the everlasting gospel" which will be carried "to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people." "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of judgment is come: and [instead of continuing the adoration of idols, and instead of the Parse worship of the sun, the Hindoo worship of the river Ganges, and other detestable superstition] worship him that made [all things, and that made] heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." Rev. xiv. 7. "And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which come against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, YAHVEH of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles." Zech. xiv. 16. "For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord YAHVEH will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations." Isa. lxi. 11. In praying "Thy kingdom come," we pray for the advent of the immortal King, the immortalization of "the church of the first-born" who are to "come to Mount Zion" and are to receive "a kingdom that cannot be moved," the restoration of outcast Israel, and the introduction of the great missionary age for the benefit of all flesh who shall see the glory of YAHVEH together. Pray ye saints for the coming kingdom! "Ye that make mention of YAHVEH, keep not silence, and give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth." Isa. lxii. 6, 7. J. T. C.

Christian Politics.

"What! unite Christianity with Politics—horrible!" We sympathize with you, dear friend, in your aversion to this subject. We have but just escaped from the ugly ditch of prejudice ourselves. We have been covered over with the mud of ignorance. At length we breathe freely. Shall we now give you a lift? It is our duty, so here we come.

Let us first have the requisite definitions. What is Christianity? and what is Politics? Mr. Worcester answers. Christianity is "the religion taught by Christ." Politics is "the science or the art of government, or the administration of national or public affairs; that part of ethics which consists in the knowledge or the practice of conducting the various affairs of a state or nation." Well, wherein consists the incompatibility of the two? Why shall we not unite them, and talk of Christian Politics?

"But all human governments are more or less corrupt." Granted; but is it therefore wrong to uphold the good that is in them? Is it sinful to strive to improve them? Suppose our forefathers had refused to identify themselves with human governments? When the colossal power of Spain would ride defiantly over every principle of justice and religion, they manfully opposed and eventually over threw the Papist Goliah. Were they wrong? If so, how and why? Did they sin in establishing their independence on these western shores? If so, how and why? The more we think of this subject, the more do we marvel at our stupidity in denying and opposing the clearest dictates of reason and the Bible.

"What! does the Bible countenance our identification with human governments?" We think it does. The Bible presents certain men for our respect—a Moses, a David, a Josiah, a Hezekiah—yet they were all representations of the human government. "Ah, it was Divine government as well. God presided over the Hebrew commonwealth." And yet that government was exceedingly imperfect. But waiving this, look at Daniel. He was a most estimable character, an especial favorite of the Almighty, a prophet inspired by the Holy Spirit, and yet, a politician, a prominent official under a heathen and despotic ruler. Here is a case beyond all objection. Imperfect, despotic, and godless as were the Babylonian and Medo-Persian governments, Daniel a favored child of heaven was closely connected with them. And was not Joseph prime-minister of Pharaoh? The only way out of this dilemma is to say that even these governments were ordained of God. And here we touch bottom. "There is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God." Rom. xiii. 1. "He removeth kings, and setteth up kings." The Most-High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men." Dan. ii. 21. iv. 17.

Governments, then, have a right to exist, for they are ordained of God. Then the subjects must respect the government. And so thought Paul. "Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake. For, for this cause pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing. Render therefore to all their dues; tribute to whom tribute, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor." Rom. xiii. And so thought Peter. "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the king, as supreme; or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well." 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14.

Our brother Peter calls up another point. He speaks of "the punishment of evildoers." Then, the government has a right to punish evildoers. To be sure; what would it be worth without this right? This is one of the main objects of its establishment, to rebuke and keep in check the powers of evil, that well disposed people may live quietly and free from harm. But where now have we come? At this rate, the government may put down insurrection—heavily "fall on crushed rebellion." Another step and we are beyond reach of mercy (we mean the mercy of uncharitable religionists). If government has a right to punish evildoers, then it may call on its subjects as its proper instruments. This being allowed, then the government has a right to defend itself against foreign invasion, and to call on its subjects for aid. At last we have got in the very fore-front of the battle. Now, my objecting friend, when you find a flaw in this argument, it will be in order to reconsider.

"But the Bible says we must not fight." The Bible says nothing against fighting in obedience to our legitimate government. It is full of lawful fighting from Abraham down. Abraham fought and Melchisedek, priest of the Most High God, and type of Jesus Christ, blessed him on his return from the slaughter of the kings. Moses held up his hands that the enemies of Israel might be overthrown. Joshua, another type of the Messiah, was a great warrior. And so we might select instances throughout the history of the nation led by the God of hosts when no one thought of rebuking just warfare.

It may be said that what was lawful under the Mosaic dispensation is not therefore lawful under the Gospel. True, but where is there anything in the Gospel that nullifies the duty of defending lawful government? And is it not clearly upheld in the Epistle to the Hebrews? Does not the epistler set as examples those "who through faith subdued kingdoms....waxed valiant in fight, turned to fight the armies of the aliens"? We are aware that there are passages quoted as evidence that Christ forbade the use of war-weapons. We know these passages by heart. "Resist not evil," "Turn the other cheek," &c., But these commands evidently apply to social life. They no more affect governmental action and loyal obedience to government than the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" affected David when he slew Goliah, or Samuel when he commanded Israel and they "hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord."

On a candid survey of the whole ground we are firmly convinced of the importance of Christian Politics, concerning which we have some thoughts to offer in our next. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." J. T. C.

A Deluge of Blessings.

"It never rains but it pours" is an old adage, not precisely true, and yet suggestive of what is often noticed in the course of this world. At the most unanticipated moment misfortunes "in battallions" strike dismay into our fainting hearts, or blessings crowd upon us in surfeiting profusion. Our beloved country has, for the last four years, drunken to the dregs the bitter cup of God's righteous judgment. Blow following blow in quick succession have at length forced the stubborn knees to bow and the marble hearts to soften in humble contrition before Him who governs the nations. And now the windows of heaven open and the Father of Israel pours out the treasures of his love upon us. Peace has broken upon us with the suddenness of a tropical daybreak, and amid the musical sound of broken fetters and the rise of the grateful Hallelujahs of disenthralled missions, prosperity again presides over the nation and justice sheds her approving smile on the grateful scene. Last, but not least, in the catalogue of good is the wonderful change of sentiment among the multitudes on the question of human rights. This change may well be deemed decisive when the keen glance of that sometime malignant defender of oppression—the N. Y. Herald—detects the inevitable tendency of the popular will, and the prompt steersman puts his helm hard down for a stretch to windward on the ocean of political reform. We can do nought but heed the mandate,—"Be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the nations, I will be exalted in the earth." The following is is from the N. Y. Herald of May 6, 1865.

"The war has killed southern slavery. Let it be buried and put out of the way as soon as possible. It ends the slavery agitation. But there is yet something left for abolition capital in the negro agitation. Against this demand that as slavery is abolished, and that as the African race have powerfully assisted us in putting down the rebellion and in saving the life of the nation, they should have a share in the political right of the ballot box, what valid objection can be made? We cannot long resist this demand in view of the extinction of slavery and the services of the southern blacks during this war. With every opportunity and in every way they have been our faithful allies. We have had two hundred and fifty thousand of them in the service of the army and navy, Their battle of emancipation, involving four millions of their race, has turned the scale in our favor, and we must yield to the sagacity of President Lincoln's emancipation edicts. It is folly to argue agains established facts. We adhere to the lights of experience and common sense. Hence we would say again to President Johnson that he has nothing to fear in laboring to give the southern blacks the right of suffrage in the reconstruction of the rebellious states."

The same paper, May 11, has this editorial:

THE QUESTION OF NEGRO SUFFRAGE SETTLING ITSELF.—We print below a letter which shows how warmly the negroes in our midst feel the great interest that they have at stake in the questions in relation to them now before the country, and with what honest earnestness and graceful courtesy they appreciate and can recognize a word in their favor:—

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1865.

JAMES GORDON BENNETT, Esq:—

DEAR SIR:—Please allow me, in behalf of my race, to thank you for the generous and encouraging words which you have recently given through the HERALD to my long suffering people. Especially do I thank you for the article which appeared last week treating upon the suffrage question. Coming from a journal which exerts so great influence over the minds of the American people, we are led to indulge the hope that we are entering upon a brighter future. It affords me great pleasure to find that our conduct during the rebellion has dissipated the doubts and fears that were entertained respecting our courage and loyalty to the government. Trust us, dear sir, and I think that you will not be disappointed. We make no unreasonable requests, we wish not to be petted, nor to be exempted from labor or sacrifice but simply plead for "a fair and equal chance in the race for life." Your good words have called forth the prayers and best wishes of tens of thousands, and we pray for your long life and happiness. This note is the expression of a sincere and grateful heart, and is intended only for Mr. Bennett's private notice. I am, dear sir, your humble and obedient servant,

HENRY HIGHLAND GARNET.

Mr. Jefferson's opposition to slavery was based upon considerations of the welfare, not of the negro, but of the white man. It was his opinion that the character of thought and the conduct that the relative positions of the races induced on the part of the white tended directly to barbarize the white, and in that way injured him more than it did the negro. And Mr. Garnet's note naturally suggests the the notion that the white men of the South, while they barbarized themselves by their treatment of the slaves, did in reality beat a good proportion of their own ancient civility and suavity into the negro race. Thus natural laws give an equivalent of good for every evil.

"Spiritualizing Interpretation."

The nominal Christian Church glories in spiritualizing interpretation. It looks upon it as the height of spiritual attainment; while, all the time, it is nothing more than the 'tares' which the enemy has sown. From whence but from the Father of Lies has it come that all the magnificent promises made to the Jews, and to the earth, have been wrested from their design, and applied to the Church? and that Church not the true Church of Christ, but an imaginary thing, made up of professors of every description,—a Church established by man, and carried on by external human mechanism. From whence but from the Father of Lies has it come that the Kingdom of Heaven, which means the reign of Christ over the earth, is now understood to mean nothing more than the rude, imperfect, feeble Christianity, which we find scattered here and there over the world?"

The foregoing we take from the last Prophetic Times. We bid it God speed in its efforts against "spiritualizing interpretation," but cannot refrain from saying, "Physician, heal thyself!" How about the terms "life" and "death" scattered through the scriptures? are they not literal? If so, why does the respected opponent of "spiritualizing interpretation" countenance the immortality of the soul?" From whence but from the Father of Lies has it come that the magnificent promises made to the" children of God—such as "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life," "If any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever," "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live," "This is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day,"—"have been wrested from their design" and made to harmonize with the doctrine that every man "hath everlasting life," that every man "shall live for ever," that every man "though he were dead, yet shall he also live," that Jesus will raise every man "up again at the last day"? Will the Times explain? J. T. C.

The Non-ressurrection of the Wicked.

The Millennial Harbinger, May 3, contains an attempt to prove that the direct non-ressurrection assertions of the Bible do not affect "actual transgressors of the Law of God." The writer's theory is that while all transgressors of known law will be raised from the dead, "the heathen who have not had the opportunity of developing a character by the Law of God, either by obedience or disobedience, will remain in the congregation of the dead." By this view several positive non-ressurrection texts are disposed of. But the writer has swept at least two passages too many in his drag-net. The forty-ninth psalm claims a release from unjustifiable capture. The writer says that the psalmist in verse 15, "places his ressurrection in contrast with the non-ressurrection of the heathen lords and nobles who had ruled over his people." But unfortunately for this statement, the psalmist expressly addresses himself to "all peoples," to "all inhabitants of the world, both low and high, rich and poor together." It would be a singular thing if the principal nation, the one that possessed the solemn record, should not be affected by the message. Indeed with such interpretaion we defy any one to get the truth from the Bible. Any unbiased mind must be convinced by a single perusal of that straightforward announcement of the Psalmist that it covers not merely the nations of the earth in general, but the nation which had the record in possession in particular.

The other text which for the same cause claims immunity from the service of our theorist is Prov. xxi. 16, not directly quoted to be sure, but partly used in the first extracted sentence above. "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." By what law of common sense is this text applied to "the heathen" while the people addressed by the royal teacher are utterly excluded from its dictation? What a grand reversal of Scripture is this? The text is not "to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile;" but "to the Gentile first, and to the Jew not at all." From all such attempts to escape legitimate conclusions we hope to be safely delivered.

Another consideration doubles the condemnation of this ephemeral theory. In both the passages referred to, the condemnation consists in an opposition to "understanding." "Man that is in honor, and understandeth not" is condemned in the first case, and "the man that wandereth out of the way of understanding," is condemned in the second case. Here is certainly a clear "development of character by disobedience," and the penalty of transgression is to perish like the beasts; to remain in the congregation of the dead. As the writer criticized denies that the heathen develop character and are affected by penalty, it follows that according to his own position he is not justified in the use of the cited texts. His "little discrimination between the relative position of heathen and actual sinners," instead of "avoiding," as he hopes, "the figuring away, mystifying, or denying plain Bible statement," has actually dropped him in that very pit. May he speedily get out.

The Soul.

"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground." How much of a man was Adam at this stage of the processof his creation? Was he a mere conglomerate of dust or clay? or did he not at that instant present the same physical appearance that he did when "the breath of lives," afterward imparted to him, was withdrawn from him, nine hundred and thirty years later? In short, was he not, at this time, a fleshly—though inanimate—body? This granted, then were not the organs of sense and intellection (which all philosophers allow to be necessary to rational existence) in common with other physical organs, perfect within him? Were not the faculties of memory, imagination, reason, perception, and the rest, or at least the physical structure dependent on which these subsist, as entire within the material corpse, as afterward they were in the animated Adam? Mind you, I do not assume that there was any remembering, or conceiving, or reasoning, or perceiving, or willing, or any activity, spiritual or material, in the as yet uninspired Adam; but only that the corporeal conditions of such activity were as complete prior to as subsequent to the inbreathing of "the breath of lives."

"And breathed into his nostrils the breath of lives; and man became a living soul." If the view just presented respecting the physical mechanism of man prior to his animation be a correct one, then the divine act described in this last quoted clause was one purely of of vitalization. In this second and finishing stroke, God did not augment the creature's already perfect structure, but only brought into contact with it the motive element, by virtue of which its capacity and powers became operative. Before the act of inspiration, man was a dead soul, and by this act he became not any more a soul than before, but only that soul in exercise. We hold, then, on the ground of our original hypothesis, that "the breath of lives," which was breathed into man in common with all animated nature, possessed no intelligence-giving or psycologic unction; but that it was merely the actuating influence, the motive power, which, operating upon the already perfect organism, evolved thought, feeling, conation and physical activity: in a word, that "the breath of lives," was only atmospheric air.

Let us illustrate this idea. Picture to yourself a steam engine without steam. There it stands—piston-rod, fly-wheel, governor, valves, etc.: a complete piece of machinery. No part is wanting, or out of place; and yet, so far as its accomplishing any useful function is concerned, in its present inert state, it is as inefficient, as the original one of which it was made. Yet we call it an engine—a perfect engine. Such, I apprehend, was man before endowed with life—a perfect specimen of human machinery. Now open a valve and let into the engine a current of steam, and lo! a moving, living, effective, engine. But what have you added to the material structure of the engine? Any part which it did not have prior to the ingress of the steam? Certainly not. What then is the office of the steam? Evidently merely that of a motive element—that is, it is "the breath of life" of the engine.

But you will observe, that this contact of material and aeriform parts, has been productive of a new and compound element, viz., power. The engine without steam was not power, and had it remained in this state, never could have become even an element of power. Neither was the steam power; for if permitted to escape into space rather than into the engine, it could never have been instrumental in effecting those all but intelligent revolutions which, when in contact with the machinery, it does effect. But if neither the iron frame, nor the subtile steam are power, what then is power? I answer, the unique resultant of both, without either of which it could never have been, and with a loss of either of which it must cease to be.

Apply this statement to man's case. We used the adjective dead and living in a preceding sentence in connection with soul, but neither is strictly admissible; for there can be no soul apart from the principle of life; hence dead is inapplicable, and living redundant. Now was the physically finished but inoperative body of Adam a soul? I reply, no. Was the "breath of lives" a soul? Again I answer, no: for we have no knowledge nor can we conceive of intelligent being existing in unorganized, aeriform substance, or rather *non*substance. What then is the soul? I answer; a unique resultant of corporeal and incorporeal elements. It isn't dust, nor yet breath; for if the latter, I may add that the Bible accords such souls to every living creature; but it is that mysterious,—not more mysterious, however, than the element of power—dissimilar, outgrowth of both these; and which, independent of either of these, does not, and cannot exist.

I am well aware that this view will at once be branded by some as degrading to man's high orgin, and as a materialism; which term to many expresses as much as sophism or diabolism. First, is it insulting to man's nature to term "the breath of lives" atmospheric air? True, its constant presence is apt to depreciate it, for we respire it freely and unconsciously. But exhaust it from around us, and what would be left of life? Then in its deprivation we recognize it to be one of the most essential elements of our being, our creation, and our destiny, and hence one of the benignest gifts of the Maker. Secondly is this view of man's soul a material one? I ask, are virtue, love, power, wisdom, goodness, and the like, material? You reply in the negative. But virture, love, and so forth, are the ligitimate offspring of material elements, as much as is the soul according to our view. The soul is the man, the self, the ego. But what is the man? His carcass? His breath? Neither: but these are only material elements accessible to us. What then is the man? I answer that the man or the soul—the two being identical—is (whether material or not I know not) that which loves, hates, wills, wishes, thinks, reasons, and etc., and which, so long as its conditions of being are maintained, namely, body and breath, exists, but which when they separate, also dissolves into its original unknown. Beyond and paramount to these mere philosophical considerations is this; Is this view of the soul consonant with the view of it as revealed in the word of God? I reply, I have yet to meet a passage which in any wise conflicts with it, or which may not be made luminous by it.

Emancipation Demanded.

"The old construction of these texts [Isa. lxvi. 24; Mark ix. 44—48; Rev. xiv. 11; xx. 10], which has come down to us from the church of Rome, will not stand an enlightened criticism. Our habits of thought and education have been much influenced by papal theology. It is time we were emancipated from those views of God and His word that only fill us with agony, and embrace those that are in harmony with God's parential character, as well as His word."

Thus speaks the Editor of the Voice of the West. The emancipation commended can be fully experienced only by embracing the anti-future-life-torment doctrine of Life only in Christ. The notion of raising sinners from death to a miserable temporary future existence, savors very much of "papal theology." The "old construction" of the Scripture texts that are supposed to teach it, "will not stand an enlightened criticism." God's "word" is against the torment theory advocated by the Voice, and so is His "parental character." Hence "it is time" that that paper should make one more advance.

Anisteemi—Its Meaning.

By a misprint in my article of last week, Robinson's Lexicon is misrepresented, and a point of some importance is thereby conceded to the doctrine of the revival of the wicked dead. In reference to anisteemi, I am made to say: "Often it does refer to the resurrection of the dead; but, according to Dr. Robinson, its proper and literal sense is to wake up, to rise up 'from a sitting posture.'" The last clause, corrected, should read as follows:—its proper and literal sense is "to make stand up, to raise up" "from a sitting posture."

The word "believe"—printed in Italic in the last paragraph but one—should, to make any sense, read "believed."

R. W.

An Exposition of John xi. 26.

"Whosoever liveth and beliveth in me shall never die."

My conviction is, that the commonly received exposition, that Christ here refers exclusively to those who are alive and remain unto his coming, is incorrect. While it is a fact that those who are Christ's at his coming who are alive, will not die, yet I am fully persuaded that in the text before us, Christ does not refer to that portion of his followers only, but to his followers then living, and all who ever live after them. One text will at once give us the true exposition, and that is in John viii. 51,—"Verily, verily, I say unto you, if a man keep my saying he shall never see death." Every one that keeps Jesus' saying, who believes that he is "the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the word," "shall never see death."

There is an apparent discrepancy, when comparing these statements of Christ with the words he uttered in the 25th verse, which are, "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Yet Christ does not contradict himself, and prayer, study and thought will, through the Holy Spirit, remove all difficulty in the matter.

All are willing to admit that the words "perish" and "perisheth" have a restricted sense, and an absolute sense also. When applied to the wicked, as in the text, "The wicked shall perish," we understand the word has its fullest or absolute sense. It is the punishment, or end of the wicked. But in the texts, "there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness;" "The righteous perisheth and no man layeth it to heart;" we understand the words to be used in their restricted sense; because the righteous will not perish as the wicked: for Christ says plainly, "I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish."

So with the words "die," "death" and "dead." When applied to the righteous they are to be understood in their restricted, or accommodated sense. The case of Jairus' daughter illustrates this point. Christ said, "The maid is not dead, but sleepeth. And they laughed him to scorn, knowing that she was dead." See Luke viii. 53. Also, Luke xx. 37, 38,—"Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; for he is not a God of the dead, but of the living; for they all live unto him." Hence there is a wide difference between "the death of the righteous," and of "the soul that sinneth." One is temporal, the other eternal. Thus the first is used in the restricted sense, the other in its absolute.

The language in the text was addressed by Jesus to Martha, the sister of Lazarus. Lazarus believed that Jesus was "the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world," hence, according to the promise of Jesus, he should "not see death." There was another class, who would not believe, to whom Jesus said, "Ye shall die in your sins." John viii. 24, 51. When the sisters of Lazarus sent word concering the sickeness of their brother, Christ answered, "This sickness is not unto death, but that the Son of God may be glorified thereby." Jesus remained two days longer in that place, then went with his disciples into Judea, saying unto them, our friend Lazarus sleepeth. I go that I may awake him out of sleep." His disciples, weak in the faith, "thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep." "Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead." Doubtless Christ used the word in its accommodated sense. At the grave, Jesus said, "Thy brother shall rise again. Martha said unto him, I know that he shall rise in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die. Believest thou this? She saith unto him, yea, Lord; I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world."

By reading all of the eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh chapters, we get the whole truth of the matter, as I have endeavored to explain. Hence the dead believer "is not dead" in the absolute sense of the term, "but sleepeth." And those who are living, and believers in Jesus, "shall never die;" "shall never see death," for though we fall asleep, yet "all live unto him."

Philadelphia.—World's Crisis.

THE ASSASSINATION IN ENGLAND.

The steamship Asia arrived at Halifax the 10th inst. The English press teems with news of meetings of sympathy and condolence. London, Liverpool, Birmingham, the whole country joins with America in grief. The public meeting in London must have been intensely interesting. We give an abstract of the report.

London, April 30, 1865.

On Saturday evening, 29th of April, an immense public meeting convened, under the auspices of the Emancipation Society, in St. James Hall, to express feelings of grief and and horror at the assassination of President Lincoln, and sympathy with the government and people of the United States and with Mrs. Lincoln, Mr. Seward and family.

The galleries of the hall were draped in black. Over the end of the gallery hung the American flag. The hall was crowded with an audience who manifested not merely their warm admiration of the character and capacity of the late President, and sincere sympathy with the people of the United States in the loss sustained, but their hearty approval of the great cause Mr. Lincoln represented.

The platform contained an array of Parliamentary gentlemen and many leading citizens of the metropolis. Many ladies were present, a majority of whom were in mourning.

Various resolutions were carried, not merely with unanimity, but with an intense feeling rarely seen at public meetings.

The chair was occupied by William Evans, President of the Emancipation Society. Messrs. Forstor, Stansfield, Leathern, Taylor, Potter, Baxter and Baines, members of Parliament, commenced the proceedings with expressions of deep sympathy with the American government and people, and entire confidence in the administration of President Johnson.

The Chairman was supported by twenty influential members of Parliament, and a large array of distinguished presidents, representing every section of the community.

W. E. Forster, member of Parliament, moved the first resolution, that this meeting desires to give utterance to the feelings of grief and horror with which it has heard of the assassination of President Lincoln, and the murderous attack on Mr. Seward, and to convey to Mrs. Lincoln, and the United States government and people the expression of its profound sympathy and heartfelt condolence.

Mr. Forster said this was the time when the tie of blood binding Englishmen to Americans was indeed truly felt. A thrill of grief, horror and indignation which had passed through the length and breadth of Europe, and especially possessed the heart of every Englishman as though some painful calamity had fallen on himself. (Cheers.) This meeting would send by the ship which left their their shores that night its sympathy with the widow and orphans and country who had not lost their faith for the future. He was confident in the belief that they had so learned the lesson of common history that they would prove what strength free and Christian people have to bear up against every blow like this, though it be such a blow as had rarely ever fallen upon any commonwealth. He expressed his convictions that President Johnson would continue President Lincoln's work of restoring peace to the country and insuring freedom to all who dwell in it. (Great cheering.)

P. A. Taylor, M. P., seconded the resolution. He expressed deep sympathy with the American nation, which had lost a worthy successor of Washington. Lincoln's great task had been fulfilled. He had crushed the rebellion of the slaveholders. Time, the destroyer, had not withered one leaf in the chaplet of his glory. He had no fear that the government of the United States would fall into the career of revengeful retribution. He asked the audience to remember that for years portions of the press and people had heaped every epithet of abuse on Lincoln, and were now trying to do the same thing by Johnson. (Shame.) He felt confident that the efforts of the new government would be continued in the same direction as Lincoln's and that it would soon effect the complete restoration of the Union, with the complete emancipation of the negro. Lincoln died for that principle; but his death was not the symbol of its defeat, but of its glorions triumph. (Cheers.)

Mr. Stanfield, M. P., moved the next resoltion, viz:—That this meeting desires to express its entire confidence in the determination and power of the people and government of the United States to carry out to the fullest extent the policy of which Abraham's Lincoln's Presidential career was the embodiment, and establish free institutions throughout the whole American republic. Mr. Stanfield said they had met not only to give an expression of their horror at a deed so foul that history could produce no parallel, but to show sympathy for a cause which begins by being honorable and great to be righteous, and which, by the acts and by the life and death of its martyr President, had now become sacred in their eyes. (Loud cheers.) The South had been fighting for the avowed and deliberate purpose of promoting and perpetuating human slavery. It attempted to found its subsistence upon a national crime, and had met the deserved fate of those who set themselves against the laws of God and man. The North had been fighting for a common country, which they would share, but which they would not allow to to be torn assunder. Step by step the North rose to the height of the great and holy argument on which their cause was founded. Each delay, each defeat seemed but to make their resolve firmer, and higher and purer their policy. When the South finally abolished slavery throughout its States then victory would finally crown the cause. Throughout all this period Lincoln guided his country with honor. If anything could strengthen the States in their trial, it would be the deep felt, spontaneous and universal sympathy which was now travelling to them from Europe. He was sure all prayed that the government and people might be true to the example of him who was the guide of their cause.

Mr. J. B. Potter, M. P., seconded the motion. He said he now stood in Parliament as successor of Richard Cobden, whose object it was, equally with that of Lincoln, to dignify labor. Lincoln destroyed slavery in America. It should be their wish to destroy serfdom at home. And he trusted the result of the conflict in America would be to give an impetus to the cause of reform in Europe.

Mr. Caird, M. P., moved that copies of the foregoing resolutions be placed in the hands of Mr. Adams for transmission to the President of the United States, Mrs. Lincoln and Mr. Seward. He paid a warm compliment to the American Minister, whose moderation and firmness and conciliation had been the best preservation of peace between the two countries.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

Article I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustainiug a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

Note.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted intheir design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—Ed. of Her.

Notice.

We wish, through the Herald of Life, to notify the Brethren, generally, that we are publishing a work, containing about 250 12mo pages, showing that the second personal appearing of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, will take place no later than 1867, and probably in the spring of that year.

The work will contain an exposition of all the periods relating to the time of that event both in the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation.

It will contain seven different expositions of Revelation alone, which are so plain, we think, as to be within the reach of the understanding of every child of God.

We propose to send the work to all who may desire it, on receiving six cents to pay the postage, leaving it entirely to them to pay for it or not, as they shall feel disposed after reading it. The work is expected to be ready for mailing about the 20th of the present month.

To the Brethren we would say send in your orders, at once, and get the book. We want you to have it, pay or no pay, for we are confident that you can not fail to see, if you read it through with a prayerful heart, that it contains the truth on this all important subject.

The price of the book, to those who may feel disposed to pay for it after reading it, will be seventy-five cents. To those unable to pay, "without money and without price."

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known talented clergyman, was selected by certain ters and others, in New England, to write a Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

THE GOSPEL FEAST.

BY MRS. L. R. K. BISHOP.

Love hath prepared her feast,
  Her table spread;
Said to each bidden guest,
  'Come and be fed!

You'll perish where you are,
  Amid earth's strife:
The "bread of God" alone,
  Can give you life!

Provision rich and rare,
  Boundless and free;
Poor famished soul! is made
  For such as thee.

The "righteous," and the "whole,"
  Can have no share;
But needy "sinners," all,
  Thrice welcome are!

The living manna, yea,
  The bread of heaven
(The only source of life.)
  To thee is given!

Eat, and your soul shall live;
  Refuse, and die!
Why will you perish thus?
  O sinner! Why?

A crown of life, awaits
  Thine aching brow;
The glittering pearly gates,
  Are open now;

Inviting thy worn feet,—
  Why longer roam,
And starve in foreign lands?
  Sinner! come home!

Thy Father bids thee come!
  He'll pardon speak;
And press the kiss of peace,
  Upon thy cheek.

"The fatted calf" he'll kill,—
  "The best robe" bring,—
Put on thy feet the "shoes",—
  Thy hand, the "ring!"

A harp of burnished gold,
  He'll give to thee;
And teach thee how to wake
  Its melody!

Then leave the gates of death,
  Nor more be sad.
Take hold of life and peace;
  "LET US BE GLAD!"

CHRISTIANITY AND THE WAR POWER.

Now that the war against the slaveholder's rebellion has so nearly come to an end, it may be proper that our readers be more fully instructed on the right of civil government to defend itself against such as wickedly attempt to undermine and destroy it. To us it seems clear that many sincere christians have very imperfect views of their obligations to support lawful government in its struggles against invasions of its authority. No doubt there are hypocritical pretenders to non-resistance who hold such views from a cowardly spirit, or a disregard of all human authority; but there are also sincere persons, who really think christianity prohibits all war, whatever the cause. To such we commend the following article from the Methodist Quarterly Review for April 1865.—ED.

The times in which we live naturally suggest inquiries relative to the lawfulness and morality of war. Taught as we are, and rightly too, that the tendency of Christianity is to produce "peace on earth and good-will toward men," there will arise unbidden the doubtings of a tender conscience, and the fear lest in grasping the "carnal weapon" at the call of his government a man should be doing violence to the principles of that "holy evangel," in whose provisions and precepts he hopes to find "the way of life," and to secure endless felicity. Opinions on this subject greatly vary. With reference thereto, men of equal conscientiousness have assumed antagonistic positions. In the same community, and oftentimes in the same family, from whence will go forth with brave heart the men of stalwart frame to do battle even to the death against armed foemen, there may be found those who, while sympathizing with the objects to be accomplished, will by no means voluntarily enter upon active warfare, nor suffer their resources, except under distraint, to be applied to the support of the Government in its struggle to maintain "by force and arms" its legitimate authority, its national status, or the integrity of its domain. Now, by whatsoever number of such men there may be in any country, by so much is the military arm of the nation weakened. And this weakness consists not merely in the abstraction of that number from military duty, but in the moral influence which such may exert upon the minds of others who go forth to the combat. For, claiming to be actuated wholly by considerations of a moral and religious nature, and being chiefly men of real worth and integrity, sincere and honest in their profession and belief, it cannot but be that with reference to those who are cognizant of their opinions, and have respect for their persons and character, the influence exerted will be calculated to fill the mind with doubt, and by so much unnerve the arm as it would strike the blow for the vindication of national right and honor, even though it may not avail to prevent their going into the service of their country. Every doubt of right is traitor to the accomplishment of an intended purpose. It may, therefore, be subserving a purpose of value—"operæ pretium"—to our struggling nationality, if we calmly examine the question as to the rightfulness of the claim of a government to declare and wage a war, to use the military force of its people in defense of its rights and honor, or for the suppression of a rebellion against its legitimate authority.

By those who contend against the lawfulness of war, it is alleged that absolute non-resistance is the doctrine of Holy Scripture. And this it is said is the rule for both nationality and the individual; both for the authorities of a civil government acting in their official capacity, and the individual subjects of those authorities. But we apprehend that this is not a correct presentment of Scripture doctrine. The "non-resistance" of Scripture applies not, as may be shown, to the government, but is strictly personal, applies simply to the individual. It may be at once admitted that "resistance" is forbidden to the individual under certain circumstances and conditions. Thus, for example, it is doubtless prohibited when by such resistance there could not be secured personal safety, or could not be obtained deliverance from impending evils, or could not be prevented a repetition or aggravation of personal injury. Whenever the objects proposed to be accomplished by such resistance as we can offer are beyond the bounds of human probability or possibility of attainment, then resistance being vain may well be conceived to be forbidden. Hence there is no difficulty whatever in accounting for Christ's prohibition of any attempt on the part of Peter to prevent, by violence, his own arrest by the Jewish authorities; even though we leave out of view the obvious principle to which it may be referred, of our constant duty to submit to the constituted civil authorities, acting in accordance with recognized law, to resist whom it is to resist the ordinance of God. For, humanly speaking, contravention of the purpose of the authorities was in that case improbable, if not impossible, and the result must have been an aggravation of the injury, and perhaps the involving of the entire discipleship in destruction and ruin. True, if Jesus had chosen to use his own supernatural power, and called for the "legions of angels," his arrest might have been prevented; but in that case the swords of his terrestial adherents would have been unnecessary, wholly useless. In the view now presented there is seen also the force of the reason which Jesus gave for the prohibition: "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword." For it cannot be that Christ intended to say that all who in any circumstances should take up the sword should perish by the sword, since such an interpretation is forbidden by the facts of history, and would imply ignorance or falsehood on the part of Christ. It must be interpreted with reference to the particular case, and is applicable only to similar occurrences. We must understand him simply to mean that they who, in such cases as this, and against the legitimately constituted authorities in the full and untrammeled exercise of the powers accorded them, shall attempt resistance, shall perish by the sword of its power, that such resistance is hopeless and vain, and can but result in the destruction of those who enter upon it. Thus this prohibition is defended as well on the principles of religion as upon the ground of common sense and common prudence.

It may be further admitted that resistance is forbidden when such resistance would partake rather of the nature of revenge than of simple self-protection and defense, or the assertion and vindication of legitimate right. As a rule for judicial action and decision the doctrine "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," may perhaps be admitted. But as a rule for private life and for personal individual action, it is distintly repudiated by the author of our religion. It was to the abuse of the "public law," in its illegitimate application and indiscriminate use "by private" parties, that Christ was directing attention when he uttered the injunction, "Resist not (antistenai, that is, retaliate not upon the) evil" (person). Matt. v. 39, etc. The several illustrations of the doctrine thus enounced show that it was intended only for matters which affected solely the personal feelings and property of the individual. To make this clear, we have only to advert to each of the instances which he proceeds to cite, not one of which seems to be a case which could permanently affect the well-being of the individual, much less his life; and by no fair interpretation can any of them be made to apply to the affairs of a government or a state.

His first instance is that of a personal insult and indignity: the "smiting (rapizei, a quick smart slap upon) the cheek," in which case rather than get into a personal brawl in in the effort to retaliate or avenge ourselves, we are taught to endure even a repetition of the injury or insult as a matter of but trivial importance and affecting only ourselves. But in proof that such acts are not to be suffered to pass without rebuke, we have the example of Jesus, who, when struck by the officer near him, because of the supposed rudeness of his response to the high priest, answered with sufficient curtness and spirit: "If I have spoken evil, then bear witness of that evil; but if well, why smitest thou me?" John xviii. 22, 23. The same spirit was also manifested by Paul when smitten by command of the high priest, and in this instance there is also inculcated the lesson that expressions of rebuke and severity which may be proper in response to indignity or suffering put upon us by a private individual, are not so proper when that individual is fully understood to be "a ruler of the people." Acts xxii. 2, 3.

The second instance is the case of a private lawsuit, the evil which may be done us by a litigious or quarrelsome person. The instance implies at lest dispute, and on the one side or other doubt as to how the matter might be determined in a court of law. In such cases the teaching is that it is better to give to the litigious person the benefit of his doubt. The subject of dispute, it is to be noted, "a coat," indicates a matter of comparitively trivial importance, affecting only for the moment the well-being of the injured party. There is further inculcated also a disposition to even do more than is demanded to satisfy the asserted claim, if that be necessary to restore amity and good will.

The third instance is the case of a compulsory exaction of service by one in authority; needlessly it may be, and working temporary and personal injury, yet the service is to be performed not grudgingly, and with intent of vexatiously annoying the authorities in retaliation by a niggardly and rigid interpretation according to its letter rather than its spirit, but with the manifestation of a willingness to do with alacrity not only the literally demanded service, but a much greater one if required to accomplish the purpose of the demand. "If compelled to go a mile" with the intent of accomplishing a certain end, "go with him twain," if by the one mile the end is not attained. It may receive passing illustration in the noble and generous spirit of the mass of the American people, who, compelled to bear the burdens of a heavy taxation and the drain of men for the prosecution of the purpose of the Government, the suppression of the cruel rebellion, not only do this, but with cheerfulness and unexampled patriotic devotion are contributing of their wealth in such benevolent enterprises as those of the Christian and Sanitary Commissions; and by private and munificent bounties relieving the necessitous, and encouraging those who are engaged in the actual conflict.

The fourth illustration is drawn from private and personal charity, and teaches that it is better to relieve the alleged wants of those who apply to us, even though thus we are sometimes imposed upon by the unworthy, than to demand that every one who shall appeal to us for our benevolence shall be rigidly compelled to show that he possesses all the characteristics by which he would be entitled to relief on principles as strict as those involved in the precept "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth:" the exact measure of relief to be in the exact and rigid measure of the characteristic and necessity. The evident design was to teach that a rule which was intended for judicial cases must not be made the absolute rule of private life, and that the disposition of benevolent love, the charity that "thinketh no evil and worketh no ill to one's neighbor," is a better guide for individual life and personal intercourse, than the determination and effort in every case unfeelingly to exact the demands of a rigid and unbending justice.

Similarly must we interpret the apostle's injunction, "Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath," (dote topon to orgee,) to the wrath, that is, of God, or the constituted authorities, who are God's ministers, and by whom vengeance will be executed as far as is consistent with the true interests of the individual and the purposes of good government. "For vengence is mine, I will repay it, saith the Lord." It is simply a prohibition of all private and personal revenge, and the direction to transfer the vindication of private and personal right to God and his authoritative representatives upon earth, which right is indeed pre-existent in God, and the transfer is implied in the very organization of all governments; and thus there is also intimated the ground for such non-resistance as is taught in Scripture, namely: the existence of God, in whom by original sovereignty inheres the right of vengeance and protection, and the existence of government, his representative on earth, in which, subordinately to himself, he has vested this right.

In cases dissimilar and other than those which come under the priciples now named, it is apprehended that resistance is not disapproved. This, indeed, seems to be intimated in the declaration of Jesus, "I came not to send peace on earth, but a sword." Matt. xx. 34. For in the conflicts and variances which were to arise by reason of the introduction of the Gospel kingdom, it can hardly be supposed that its promulgators and professors were always to yield their rights without an assertion of them by such means as were in their power; and, indeed, somewhat of right to appeal to the sword seems implied in the instruction which he gave his disciples just before he was betrayed: "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." Luke xxii. 36. The additional remark may here also be made, that on a comparison of the narratives of the different evangelists it will be found that Peter was prohibited the use of the sword, not from the consideration of the sinfulness of such use, but simply from the inappositeness of time and circumstances, and the necessity for his arrest and death to fulfil prophecy, and accomplish to the full "love's redeeming work."

It is clear, then, that these passages and those of like character are not applicable to the authorities of a nation acting for it in their official capacity. There is, therefore, nothing in them nor in the true scripture notion of non-resistance which can interfere with the right of a government to wage and conduct war.

[TO BE CONTINUED]

THAT faith which is counted for righteousness, consists not in believing without evidence, but in being open to evidence; not in believing without good reason, but in listening to reason.—Whately.

EXPOSITIONS OF SCRIPTURE PROPHECY.

"Christ's Second Coming; is it Pre-millennial or Post-millenial?" is the title of a work by the Rev. Richard Cunningham Shimeall, just published for the author by John Trow and Edward Brinkerhoff, of this city. The title of the work indicates veryfully its subject.

It is remarkable that whenever events of great interest and importance are taking place among the nations, the attention of commentators on the Scriptural books is especially turned to the exposition of the prophetical part. When the kingdoms of Europe were engaged in the mighty wars of Napoleon, and old dynasties were overthrown and new ones set up in their places, and more than half the civilized world was convulsed by revolutions, there appeared a great number of elaborate works aiming to expound the prophecies in such a manner as to apply them to contemporary events. The great civil war of our own republic, with the change of institutions of which it is the cause, seems to have a like effect. We have already noticed one or two works of this nature, and that before us is one of the most remarkable for its research and the care with which it is written. Mr. Shimeall has given to the subject of his work the study of many years. His treatise bears evidence not only of the zeal with which he maintains his own view of the subject, but of the diligence with which he has explored the writings of others. In regard to the second advent of the Messiah, he has collected all the differeut theories which have been proposed, stated the arguments in their favor, and replied to them in all instances in which he does not accept them.

The majority of the Christian church at the present day, as is truly stated by Mr. Shimeall, hold that the second coming of Christ is a spiritual or allegorical coming. They believe that this coming will consist in the diffusion of religious truth, and the extirpation of religious error, in the conversion of the heathen, the universal acceptance of the gospel, and the general conformity of the lives of men to its precepts. Mr. Shimeall includes all this in his interpretation of the prophecies, but he goes further, and holds that there will be a personal and corporal coming of the Messiah, that the risen Saviour will return to earth in the body in which he left the grave—in his glorified humanity—to dethrone all powers adverse to the spirit of the Gospel, to destroy Anti-Christ and his armies, to rule in person over all the nations of the earth, and to inaugurate a reign of justice, mercy and truth. This second coming of Christ, according to Mr. Shimeall's view, is to precede and usher in the millenium. It will prepare the way for that age of innocence, peace and love which is to succeed the present age of dissension, bloodshed and crime, and to which the Milenarians look with earnest longings for its immediate arrival. Although Mr. Shimeall acknowledges himself in a minority, he gives the names of various eminent persons, both of ancient and modern times, who have adopted views similar to those set forth in this work.

A part of the volume is taken up with a reply to Professor Shedd, of the Union Theological Seminary in this city, who, in his History of Christian Doctrine, affirms that Millenarianism, by which he means similar views to those held by Mr. Shimeall, had never been the recognized doctrine of the Christian church. Mr. Shimeall takes issue with him on this point, and brings forward many examples of persons in the early ages of the church, and the middle ages, and in modern times, who were Millenarians. Lest the view taken by Mr. Shimeall should be confounded with what is called Millerism, he takes care to show wherein he differs from the Millerites. In the first place, he denies the possibility of fixing the day and hour of Christ's second coming, though he holds that there are certain symptoms from which its near approach is to be inferred. In the second place, he maintains that the conflagration of the world is not, as the Millerites hold, contemporaneously with this second advent of the Messiah, since the promised reign of Christ on earth could not in that event take place.

The reader may not accept Mr. Shimeall's conclusions, but he cannot look over the book without being interested in the discussion of a question which has engaged the thought of many eminent men in every age of the Christian era, which could occupy such a mind as that of Newton, and which has so strong an attraction for persons of a lively imagination when studying the prophetic books of Scripture.—N. Y. Evening Post.

THE RESURRECTION STATE.

Our Swedenborgian friends are happy in knowing so much. Where Christ and the apostles spoke only in general terms, they talk of all the circumstances and particulars. The future is even more clear to them than the past or present. If they understand anything perfectly, it is the process of the resurrection, and the condition of the soul in the spiritual world. Hear the Rev. Chauncey Giles in one of his recent lectures in this city:

"During the process of his resurrection from the material body, man is in a state of total unconsciousness. He falls into a profound sleep, and wakes in the spiritual world. He has no power to effect his resurrection himself. His soul does not escape from the body as gas from a vessel, by its comparative levity. His spiritual body must be withdrawn from the material body; and this separation is effected by the Lord through the ministry of angels by a spiritual attraction. And when the delicate task is fully accomplished, without any pain or consciousness on the part of him who is undergoing the change, he is gradually and gently awakened, and he finds himself among angels and friends in the spiritual world. He is in the same form, and he does not even know that he is dead until he reflects upon what he sees around him. He has all the bodily organs he ever had.* He sees, hears, and uses all his senses the same as he ever did. He talks with those present, and walks from place to place, as he did when in this world. Indeed, there has been no more change in his mind or bodily form and organization than there would have been by going from one house to another in this world.

"No change in his intellectual or moral character has been effected by his death and resurrection. He knows no more and no less; he is no better and no worse. Every one takes all his memory, and all his mental faculties act the same as before. He loves, hopes, fears, reasons, desires, reflects, forms opinions and expresses them. In a word, he is the same person, and he knows it."

"It must be observed," says Burke, in his Enquiry into our ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, "that the power of the imagination is incapable of producing anything absolutely new; it can only vary the disposition of those ideas which it has received from the senses." Hence it happens that our Swedenborgians's future is little more than the present state repeated. We are to have the same form, the same bodily organs, we are to walk and talk as we do here, and so on to the end. This may all be so, but we do not know. We will wait a little and see!—Christian Ambassador.

* We have never seen a finer exhibition of the ludicrous, which so naturally arises out of the theory of an immortal soul in man, as the one here presented. This fancied resurrection man "does not even know he is dead until he reflects on what he sees around him"! It is thus assumed that the man "is dead," and yet so perfectly alive that he does not know he is dead only by reflecting on what he sees. The Scriptures affirm, "The dead know not any thing:" but the folly of man's being dead, and yet so alive as not to know he is dead, remained to be invented by men wiser than prophets, inspired seers, apostles or Jesus Christ himself. Truly, we have been spoiled by the traditions of men after the rudiments of the old serpent, who said, "Ye shall not surely die." May Heaven kindly deliver us from the corrupting influences of immortal soul philosophy.—ED. HER. OF LIFE.

TRUST IN GOD.

The following circumstance occurred in the state of Massachusetts when I was a child, but I distinctly remember the impression it made upon my mind at the time. From my native town to an adjoining one there had been a new road made. It was a much shorter and more level route than the old one, but part of the way was very lonely, there being no houses near it for nearly two miles. For a considerable distance the road ran between a river on the one hand and a range of hills on the other, once thickly wooded. The trees were cut down and the ground burned over, giving it a very doleful appearance.

In the town of W. there lived a very pious, godly man. He was poor in this world's goods but rich in faith, and all who knew him believed him to be a Christian. He had occasion at one time to come to the town in which I lived, on business. As he was riding through the lonely place referred to, he remembered that his business would probably detain him until nearly night, and he thought, "what a place this would be for a robbery." Under the impression which the thought gave him he stopped, and cutting quite a cudgel, placed it in his wagon and rode on, thinking no more of it.

It was as he expected nearly night before he started for home. While riding along he meditated on the goodness of God until his heart was filled with love and gratitude to him for his mercy, and for the blessed hope which was all his support and comfort. He had come into the lonely place, but did not think of it, and if he had would probably have felt no fear. Suddenly a man jumped from behind a clump of bushes and, stopping his horse, presented a pistol, demanding "his money or his life." Without a moment's hesitation he replied, "I am a poor man and have but very little money which I need for my family; and as for my life," said he, raising his voice with earnestness, "you can not have that, for it is hid with Christ in God." Astonished beyond measure, and unable to move or speak, the robber stood before him, trembling from head to foot, while prompted and aided by the Spirit of God, he faithfully reproved him, warning him to flee from the wrath to come, and seek for mercy and pardon. The young man, for so he proved to be, burst into tears, asked forgiveness for his wrong and his prayers in his behalf. He said this was his first offence of the kind, and should be the last. After promising to pray for him, the good man went on his way rejoicing, believing more strongly than ever, that "the angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." All this time his cudgel lay forgotten in the wagon. But his trust was in him whose arm is stronger than that of flesh.

Surely "it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man." We may all of us so love and believe in him that we may ever have him for our friend and protector.

AUNT LOUISA.

AN APPEAL TO MOTHERS' BOYS.

My dear little brothers, and you who are older:—Are you "mother's boys"? and do you ever cause that tender heart of hers the anguish of seeing the one she holds as dear as her own life, going in the way of sinners? Do your precious feet tread the broad way which leadeth to destruction? If you do, O stop and consider! Remember the one who, in your infant moments, was your joy and support. She, whom you once loved with all the devotion a young and innocent nature is capable of. Think how sin has hardened those tender feelings; has learned you to despise her loving face; and even to scorn her gentle entreaties. Are you following the sinful and reckless? Ah, think, my brother, when you assemble with the enemies of God, that they are also your enemies. They are taking away all the good of life, dragging you step by step down the fearful chasm of darkness and death. Think, as you may assemble nightly in the gaily lighted saloons and witness the amusements of sin, think of the meek One who suffered and died to keep your feet from the way of death: think (O my Father help them to think!) of the devil who is drawing, blinding, and facinating you with all the glitter of sight and sound. Let me draw back the curtain which covers his hideous face, and let you see that that which so facinates you is but the glistning eye of the serpent, with his fangs ready to fasten upon you as soon as you are wholly within his power. O, I warn you, be not deceived. Most cruelly has he enticed the noblest hearts God ever gave to men; changed their fair brows, their speaking eyes, and lightsome forms, to ruin and decay, and sent them to eternal silence and death. How he chuckles over his spoils, and thirsts with fiendish hatred for more. His eye is on you; dare you face it? It will allure you. O fly to the rock of ages; hide your trembling soul beneath the wing of the Almighty. Look not on sin; "touch not, taste not, handle not." Let your soul be bathed in the blood of Jesus: that alone will drive the tempter in shame from you. Nothing else will save you from destruction. Wait not till to-morrow; come now, and be saved; for why will you die?

A word before I close to fathers and mothers. Have you a son or sons who are fast being drawn from your home circles by the allurements of sin? Are you awake? Do you know where your dear ones are to-night? Are you a christian, having faith in God as all powerful, and willing to give you whatever you ask; and yet suffer the darlings of your bosom to perish and die? Arouse you! and call upon your God mightily, that he may deliver you. Bestir yourselves. Sleep not on your easy beds while the loved ones are in the snare of satan: follow hard after them, and make the rooms of iniquity and death, which now ring with profanity and mirth, ring with warning and entreaties. Then will your God hear and save, not only yours, but others as precious. You can not excuse yourselves. God will require their lives of you. If their lives are lost, the expense must be the loss of your own, unless your lives are pleasing in the sight of your heavenly Father. You was not made simply to earn your bread. God made you for a nobler work; to live for the good of others. Are you doing it? Beware, you who lack faith in God, least he destroy you in a moment you think not. Be up and doing, fighting manfully every day against the powers of darkness: and they shall tremble. God has said so. Do you believe it? Then show your faith by your works. Be not discouraged, humble, praying mother; your sighs and tears are known to God. Be humble, obedient servants to your Father, and He will work for you gloriously in his own good time. Trust Him, seek the good of others, and his reward is as sure as himself.

A PROMISE HARD TO KEEP.

The Editor of the Crisis, by visiting Rabbi Noot, during the late discussion, to consult him on Daniel xii. 2, got himself into a really embarrassing predicament. He asked the Rabbi for exegetical "bread," from which the notion of the revival of the wicked dead might derive sustenance, but the learned Israelite gave him instead a "stone" of the most indigestible kind. At that time, and even for some days afterwards, my brother seemed to think he had received veritable bread. Vain was the effort of the affirmative to undeceive him, and so the illusion clung to him long enough to find a record in the first of the two articles that have appeared in the Crisis in relation to the debate. There is reason, however, for believing that the negative got his eyes open before he had completed his second article. His zeal to connect the verb "awake" with the "shame and everlasting contempt" of the passage in Daniel, led him into a theological pitfall that will look deeper and deeper to him the more he explores it. And he will find—if he has not already found—that deliverance from his situation can only come from the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked. The alternative of either remaining in his present plight, or accepting the view just named, may be a disgreeable one, but there is no help for it. The case is very plain and simple, and too interesting to be kept from our readers. A statement of it will show, that a fact, which was a "fish" in the hands of the affirmative, became, in those of the negative, a troublesome "scorpion." Dismissing the figures, let us look at the facts.

In the Crisis account of his interview with Dr. Noot, Br. Grant—in reference to the belief of the PHARISEES—says:—

> "They believed in the resurrection 'of the just and unjust,' but not of the notoriously wicked. The information gathered from the Jew helped us to understand Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15, better than ever before. This we will notice in due time."

It would appear, from the forgoing, that, prior to the debate, Br. G.'s understanding of Acts xxiv. 15 was not perfect. This is unquestionably true, and the admission of the fact is worth something. Now, then, what discoveries does his "better" acquaintance with the passage comprehend? An analysis of his statement furnishes the desired answer to this question. 1. According to Br. G., the Pharisees held to the resurrection of those termed the "UNJUST" in Acts xxiv. 15. 2. They believed that the "notoriously wicked" would not be raised. Here, then, Br. G. stands squarely committed, by the remorseless logic of his own assertions, to the position that there will never be a resurrection of the "notoriously wicked." But since—according to Br. G. and the Pharisees—the "UNJUST," named in the passage in Acts, are better persons than the "notoriously wicked," the resurrection of the former class must, by every dictate of reason, be held to be not a curse, but a blessing. But if it be a blessing, it should secure salvation—ETERNAL SALVATION; and that—according to the information derived by Br. G. from the Rabbi—is precisely what the Phaisees believed it would secure. The conclusion, therefore, of the whole matter is this: Br. Grant's "better" understanding of Acts xxiv. 15, results exclusively from his having discovered that the "notoriously wicked," are not in the passage at all, and that the "UNJUST," whom it does mention, are a class that are to be SAVED. This is the platform on which my brother's article places him. If he does not occupy it in fact, let him tell his readers, if he can, in what way his conference with "the Jew" helped him to a "better" comprehension than he previously had of "Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15."

"A Promise Hard to Keep"—stands at the head of this article. Its import will now be explained. It will be seen that, in reference to his new light on "Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15," Br. Grant says—"THIS WE WILL NOTICE IN DUE TIME." Here is a promise to his readers, and it relates to what he designed to do in his article of the succeeding week, wherein he introduced the passage from Acts to show "that the wicked would as certainly arise as the just." But the promise was not kept. The "due time" arrived, and with it an editorial on "The Discussion in Boston," but with them the looked-for "notice" did not come. Nor has it come yet. My conviction is, that the promise is one that cannot be fulfilled, inasmuch as what Br. G. learned from the Rabbi is not in favor of the revival and subsequent destruction of any of the dead, but utterly against that view. His ommission to allude to the matter when the "due time" came, justifies the inference that he discovered how unavailable the faith of the Pharisees would be for the purposes of his argument. He is perfectly excusable for not doing an impossible thing; but he is fairly bound, it seems to me, to withdraw a pledge which he finds himself unable to keep. It may be a little humiliating to do so, but what of that? The truth of God is ten thousand times more important than the concealment of our blunders can possibly be. If we always evince a cheerful readiness to confess our mistakes, one good at least will result from our having made them. This willingness to retreat when we are wrong, gives weight to our opinions when we are right.

It will give me great pleasure, "in due time," to show how the faith of the Pharisees enforces the doctrine which the affirmative contended for in the debate. This will come up in connection with Acts xxiv. 15.

VEHAMASKILIM YABINU,

"AND THE WISE WILL UNDERSTAND."—Dan. xii. 10.

Thus it is translated in our English Bible, aud also in most other translations, the Hebrew not excepted. We shall endeavor to show that this translation is, to say the least, incorrect, and no other mistranslation of any other passage in Scripture has been so injurious to many good people, Jews and Christians, as that with which we headed this article. By virtue of that mistranslation, and, consequently, misunderstood declaration of the angel to Daniel, the Jews of old tried to make out the time of their final deliverance by the Messiah, and were, too often, misled by false pretenders of the Messiah, and thousands, nay, tens of thousands came to a miserable end. The disappointment of one generation was by no means sufficient to make the following one wiser, the sad experience of the people in one country was not able to teach the people of another country to be on their guard; they fell into the same fatal error and perished likewise. Each successive generation entertained the idea that the former misunderstood the prophecies of Daniel, and their calculations of the times and seasons mentioned in that highly figurative book were wrong, while they, the present generation, understood the book perfectly, and cannot be mistaken as concerning the exact time of the Advent of Messiah. In such days, then, any shrewd deceiver or fanatic could succeed in misguiding the unfortunate people, and their end was the same as that of their ancestors. The Rabbies, finally, put a stop to these unfortunate and destructive occurrences, by prohibiting the study of the book of Daniel, and threatened all who should dare to disregard their decree with excommunication.

Not less fatal, though perhaps, not so destructive, was that mistranslation and misinterpretation to many Christians in almost every century of the present era. In addition to the book of Daniel, Christians have that of John, called the "Revelation" which is even more figurative than the former. We shall not stop to speak of the many disappointments in past centuries, when, misguided, either by deceivers or fanatics, Christians expected the second advent of Jesus, the Messiah, but would only make mention of events which have taken place in our days and in this country. No man ever doubted the piety and sincerity of Mr. Miller, who calculated, out of those two books that Messiah must come again, the second time, in 1843; but, at the same time, every man knows that he and all who believed with him were sadly disappointed, and that many lost all they possessed, and many gave up all hope, not only in the speedy coming of Christ, but in the whole plan of redemption, and turned infidels. Many, however, believed that Mr. Miller was mistaken on certain points, which they now discovered, and set down the time to 1854 and made their preparation to welcome the king at his coming. These too were disappointed; and yet there are now learned and pious men who squander their time, their talents and their energy in studying chronology in connection with the books of Daniel and John, in order the find and appoint the times and seasons which the Father has kept for himself.

"Blessed is he who readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand." Thus the Divine introduces his prophecy. We do not think that the Prophet here indicates that any one who readeth and keeps—at heart—which he readeth should be able to find out the appointed time when these things, which he marks by "shortly" shall come to pass. Daniel, on the other hand, received the exact time when Messiah should come the first time, and when He should be cut off, but not for himself, that is, not for any sin of his own, but the time of the end, that is, the second advent of Messiah, in his kingdom to reign supremely over all the earth, was not revealed to him, though he was shown in a vision, how the Father, the Ancient of Days, will deliver the kingdom to his Son.

Moreover, there were shown unto John as well as unto Daniel, most stirring events which will precede the advent of the glorious king, and by which those that read and keep the words of prophecy should become aware of the approach of the greatest of all events, namely, the appearance of the King to occupy the throne of His father. This, and not more, is it what Gabriel said to Daniel, that the "Maskilim" should understand. "Maskilim" are those who consider the events passing around them, and apply them to that which they read in the books of prophecy, and only they will understand what they indicate.

No prophecy, wrapped in a figurative or highly poetical language, was ever understood until that prophecy became a historical fact; and even then, it was only understood by the "considerate ones" while the world at large did not. Isaiah prophecied the birth of Messiah, of his Divine titles and attributes, of his sufferings and humiliation; of his death and resurrection and of his final exaltation and glory; but who of the people understood these sublime predictions? none; and even when the child of Bethlehem was born, when he entered upon his great mission and received publicly the testimony of John the Baptist whom the people believed to be a prophet, and the testimony of the voice from heaven: "Thou art my beloved Son in thee I am well pleased," people did not understand the prophecies of the princely Isaiah. John only, and a few mere "considerate ones" understood. Signs were hung around the birth of the Messiah which should have identified him as the child born and the son given; but their eyes were closed to these signs; they perceived them not. They crucified their king, and at last the Romans came and destroyed the city and sanctuary, and that indignation spoken of in Daniel commenced, and which will not end till the appointed end. Thus, events which shall come to pass before the second coming of Christ were revealed to Daniel and John, and through them to us, so that when these events will become historical facts we shall understand their meaning, lift up our heads and look for the speedy advent of our glorious King. To the world at large, however, these events will be like all other events in the world's drama, the world will, even then, not understand that the end of this dispensation is near, and to them therefore, Christ will appear, as a thief in the night," unawares, but not unto us, not the "Maskilim" the "considerate ones," who read the words of prophecy and keep it. The heart of the "considerate ones," is comforted with the assurance that there is a time appointed; a set time, when the Lord shall return to reign and all his saints with him.

Let us, therefore, not calculate the times and seasons, but watch the march of events in the world's history; when we discover that they are those shown by visions to the prophets of old, the men of God, let us rejoice; but, should these events not take place in our days, let us, notwithstanding be prepared and our lamps trimmed. For, what Gabriel said unto Daniel is also said to us and to us all: "But go thou thy way till the end be, for thou shalt rest and stand up in thy lot at the end of days."

The exact time of the end was not even revealed unto Daniel, the beloved; for when he cried out: "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" he received the following answer: "Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. Many shall be purified, and made white and tried; but the wicked—the world at large—shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand—the passing events—but the considerate ones shall understand."—Israelite Indeed.

ISRAEL AND THE JEWS.

THE CASE OF THE SO CALLED LOST HOUSE OF ISRAEL AS CONTRASTED WITH THAT OF THE JEWS.

That the land of Israel, was given to Israel and not merely to the Jews, would seem to require but liltle proof. It is true that the Jews, or inhabitants of Jerusalem, did say of old to the ten tribes, Ezek. xi., "Get you far from the Lord; unto us is this land given in possession." But did the LORD approve of this denial of their brethern? Did he allow the justice of their claim? Most decidedly not. Repeatedly does he impress upon the prophet, the truth that they were still his brethern, and they where "All the house of Israel," even they whose expatriation was thus rejoiced in by the Jews. For the Jews had their wish gratified, so far as that the house which is called "All Israel," was removed from beside them, and taken away by the Assyrians into the north country; where they have lost the very name of Israel, and whence they are supposed never to have returned to contest the right of the Jews to the whole possession of the land appointed to the twelve tribes of Israel. But what, at the same time saith the LORD to their being sent far off from him? He saith, "Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a Little Sanctuary in the countries unto which they shall come." So he was to be more to Israel in their outcast state, than he has promised to be to the Jews in their dispersion: for these were to seek him and not to find him, until the time of his return; whereas those shall be found of him, and he shall be to them as a Little Sanctuary, and that previous to their restoration, and when they are yet in the countries into which they should come. Thus would he be to them, before they were brought back into their own land which hath been so long lying desolate without them. But their restoration to the land shall also take place. Not only did the LORD say with regard to the Jews—"I will even gather you from the people, and assemble you out of the countries where ye have been csattered; and I will give you the land of Israel," but with regard to their outcast brethren of the house of Israel, he said: "And they shall come thither, and shall take away all the detestable things thereof, and all the abominations thereof from thence." Israel's heart has been divided, but Judah's requires to be renewed; "and I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you." Israel's heart shall cease from being hardened against his own flesh of the house of Judah: "And I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and I will give them an heart of flesh; that they may walk in my statutes, and keep my ordinances and do them: And they shall be my people, and I will be their God."—Time of the End.

MOROSENESS REBUKED.

The rebuke of moroseness contained in Matt. vi. 16—18, should be well pondered by every Christian. Surely he, of all men on earth, ought to be cheerful. How can he, who has God for his friend and the kingdom of God for his home, indulge in sullenness and gloom? Come what may, he knows that "it shall be well with the righteous." He may lose children, friends, health, reputation, property, still he knows that "all things work together for his good." Let him, then, show forth his cheerfulness and "contentment," as well as his "Godliness," that others may get "great gain" from his example. The moroseness and austerity of semi-professed Christians have done much injury to the cause of the Redeemer, and brought reproach upon His religion. The sour countenance of Pharisaic disciples has often made the young regard Christianity as the embodiment of all that is dismal and lugubrious; and thus a stone of stumbling has been thrown in the way of the youthful and light-hearted.

Historians tell us that the ribaldry, buffoonery and gross licentiousness during the reign of Charles II. of England, were brought about in good part by the cant, nasal tones, long prayers and sour visages of the Puritans. Those who could not appreciate the bright and noble qualities of the Puritans, could ridicule their dress and manner. Had the purest and best men that the world has ever produced been more cheerful, more joyous, more courteous, and more conciliating, England might have been spared the ignominy of the disgraceful reigns of Charles II. and James II.

The fact is, that the Puritans at the outset never could have gained a party sufficiently strong to overthrow the throne of Charles I., but for the popularity of their great leader, John Hampden. All know how much of his popularity was due to that "natural cheerfulness, vivacity, and flowing courtesy to all men," of which Clarendon speaks. The broad and genial humor of John Bunyan makes him more read than any other author. Our Saviour, though "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," yet mixed freely with the people in kind and cheerful conversation. He honored a marriage by his presence. He eat with publicans and sinners. He talked with a poor, ignorant woman by the well of Samaria. He wept with the bereaved sisters at the grave of their brother Lazarus. All this shows a disposition the farthest removed from the sullen and selfish gloom of morbid religion. Major Hill.

THE TRANSFIGURATION ON THE MOUNT.

This vision, which opened to the gaze of the three disciples the appearance of their master in his glorified state, was the fulfilment of a promise which he gave them but a few days before. Luke ix. 27, "But I tell you of a truth, there are some standing here who shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God," says our authorized version. Other learned men, however, translate it: "God's Royal Majesty." In the transfiguration, then, Jesus showed the three how he will appear when he comes the second time, and establishes the kingdom of God on the earth. If, as it is asserted, the kingdom of God, or the reign of Messiah, had been set up on the Mount of Transfiguration, it must be there now, because, when once established, this kingdom is to stand forever and ever. Is the kingdom of God on the Mount, or anywhere on the earth? If the kingdom of God is already set up on the earth, how is it that all peoples, nations and languages do not render obedience to its king, the Messiah? It is said that those among the nations who believe in Messiah, constitute his kingdom. To this we object, for two reasons: first, the true and faithful believers, the saints, are comparatively very few; while we are assured by the unerring word of truth, that all people will serve and obey Him to whom the everlasting government is given. Secondly, even these few saints, the best of them, render but a very imperfect obedience to their king, and need continually the mediation of the Great High Priest who now sits on the throne of his Father in heaven, or else he would not find even one co-ruler when he comes to reign over the earth.

"My kingdom is not of this age," says Jesus to Pilate; and what He says is true; and therefore he taught us to pray—Thy kingdom come: which, indeed, we still do pray; all Christians pray it every day. But what those who believe the kingdom of God to be already on the earth do mean by it, we cannot understand.

The same is the case with the passage in Luke xvii. 20, which is generally referred to by those who believe the kingdom of God is in the hearts of the faithful disciples. "The kingdom of God is within you," is the translation in the authorized version; while the literal translation reads thus: "For God's Royal Majesty is among you." It is evident, from the context, that Christ did not say, "the kingdom of God is within you;" for he speaks to unbelieving Pharasees, within whom the kingdom of God could not dwell, even if it were in the heart of believers—Israelite Indeed.

WEIGHING THE EVIDENCE.—A clerical correspondent of the Presbyterian relates an account of a recently deceased jurist, which is interesting. This man had been for many years a Judge of the Supreme Court of a southwestern State. His learning, sagacity, integrity, and morality gave him a very high position in the community. But, while an attentive hearer of the gospel, he was not a professor of religion. On one occasion the clergyman who had had some previous acquaintance with him, having concluded his call, was about to withdraw, when the Judge said to him, with emotion, "Sir, I have good news for you. Although I feel myself the unworthiest of them all, I am I trust, one of the children of God." As he spoke, his eyes filled with tears, and he proceeded to give me a narrative of his case. He had been for years undecided, if not skeptical in regard to the Bible. Feeling himself advancing in age, he determined to decide the case for himself once and forever. He gave one year to an investigation of scripture, and the evidence for and against it exactly as he would have done a complicated and important case laid before him as Judge of the Supreme Court. After a full, calm, impartial examination, he deliberately decided that the Bible was from God—was all it professed to be. He then felt the clear obligation to believe and to act upon its teachings. A little while he hesitated in regard to what was faith in Christ—puzzled by its very simplicrty. But the Holy Spirit completed his work by opening his eyes to see and acknowledge Christ as his Saviour; and after some months of serious consideration of that part of Christian duty also, he became a member of the Presbyterian Church in the place in which he lived. If all skeptics would only thus weigh the evidence, how surely would they attain the like precious faith of God's elect!—Christian Intel.

THE JEWS AND JERUSALEM.—The following from the Revival, shows that there is a great movement on foot in reference to the Jewish people and the holy city. A correspondent thus writes:—

"In January last there was a notice in the Times to the effect that the Emperor of the French desired a conference of the leaders of the Jewish nation to be held in Paris, and the Prefect of Paris had issued notices accordingly; and I have very recently learned that the conference will be in the summer, and probably about the month of June. The Rothschild family are taking a very active part in this movement; and the object of the meeting is, the taking into consideration the immediate preparation of Jerusalem. Deeming this to be a very remarkable sign of the times, I thought you might wish to make use of such information for the benefit of the Lord's people in general."

SALUTARY THOUGHT.—When I was a young man, there lived in our neighborhood a farmer who was usually reported to be a very liberal man, and uncommonly upright in his dealings. When he had any of the produce of his farm to dispose of, he made it an invariable rule to give good measure—rather more than could be required of him. One of his friends, observing him frequently doing so, questioned him as to why he did it—told him he gave too much, and said it would be to his disadvantage. Now mark the answer of this excellent man. "God almighty has permitted me but one journey through the world; and when I am gone, I cannot return to rectify mistakes." Think of this. But one journey through the world!

☞ To dare to believe less, or to pretend to understand more, than God has expressly revealed, is equally profane presumption.—Whately.

GLORY, HONOR, IMMORTALITY.

"God will render to every man according to his deeds: To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor, and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. ii. 6, 7.

1. "GLORY."—Greek, doxan. The term glory, is one often used, and generally includes in the mind the ideas of excellence and happiness: or some thing splendid connected with much enjoyment. As the glory spoken of in the text is some thing to be attained in the future, and after effort on our part in the present time, it is worth while to endeavor to get as clear a conception of it as may be.

We regard it as that "change," of which the Scriptures speak, to be experienced by the saints at the second advent of Christ. Or, in other words, that change to be wrought at the resurrection from among the dead, viz.: the resurrection of the just. Paul informs us, 1 Cor. xv. 43: "They are sown in dishonor, they arise in glory."—Syriac.

The present state of man is one of dishonor, because one of corruption. Great pains are now taken to adorn our persons—to make ourselves look beautiful; i. e., glorious. But after all the labor and toil, corruption prevails—the most beautiful form and countenance is changed, its appearance becomes offensive, and we willingly lay it away out of our sight. "They are sown in dishonor." But the followers of Christ will be raised in glory.

How shall we obtain an idea of the glory to be attained? Paul informs us, Phil. iii 21, that "Our LIFE-GIVER, the Lord Jesus Christ," will come "from heaven;" and that then he shall change our vile body, (or, body of our abasement—Syriac) that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body," (or the body of his glory.—Syriac.) But how can we get an idea of that glory which Jesus possesses? Paul has, in this text, given us the pattern of the glory, and Peter shall give us the clue to its full discovery; 2 Peter i. 16–18. Peter says,—"We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty; for he received from God the Father, honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased: and this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount." Another eye-witness of the same manifestation, viz., John, says,—"We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father." John i. 14.

We will now turn to the manifestation of that glory, as recorded by Matthew, chap. xvii. 1: "Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John, his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them, (Syriac—was changed before them,) and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light." Here, in this vision, was the manifestation of "his glorious body," like unto which, Paul tells us, "our vile bodies shall" be "changed" when Christ "comes from heaven." Surely here is glory enough to satisfy our largest desires. The sight of it in vision, made Peter say, "Lord, it is good for us to be here." O, how satisfying the sight, and so much more so the realization when "vision" will be swallowed up in the reality. Such is the glory presented as one of the benefits of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

2.—"HONOR"—Greek, timeen. "A state of honor, dignity: a distinguished mark of favor." Such is the state to which the followers of Christ are to be exalted. "A Royal Priesthood;" to be "kings and priests unto God and the Lamb," to "reign on the earth, and over the nations." This is what Christ has promised those who obey him; and the Scriptures everywhere confirm the same thing. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne." Rev. iii. 21. Christ's own throne is "the throne of his father David," which Jehovah has sworn to give him, and which will be bestowed upon him when the judgment is executed, or in process of execution upon the "fourth" dynasty of rulers on earth, symbolized by a "dreadful and terrible beast." That beast is to be slain—the body of rulers overthrown and destroyed; then one is seen coming in the "clouds of heaven," who is "like the Son of Man;" and he "came to the Ancient of days, ... and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and tongues, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii. 13, 14. This dominion and kingdom is that in which Christ has promised his followers a share: and "judgment" is to be "given to the saints of the Most High," when the time has come "that the saints possess the kingdom;" verse 22: then "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, (or the greatness of the kings—Septuagint,) under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Verse 27.

Such is the royal honor presented to our

A PROMISE HARD TO KEEP.

The Editor of the Crisis, by visiting Rabbi Noot, during the late discussion, to consult him on Daniel xii. 2, got himself into a really embarrassing predicament. He asked the Rabbi for exegetical "bread," from which the notion of the revival of the wicked dead might derive sustenance, but the learned Israelite gave him instead a "stone" of the most indigestible kind. At that time, and even for some days afterwards, my brother seemed to think he had received veritable bread. Vain was the effort of the affirmative to undeceive him, and so the illusion clung to him long enough to find a record in the first of the two articles that have appeared in the Crisis in relation to the debate. There is reason, however, for believing that the negative got his eyes open before he had completed his second article. His zeal to connect the verb "awake" with the "shame and everlasting contempt" of the passage in Daniel, led him into a theological pitfall that will look deeper and deeper to him the more he explores it. And he will find—if he has not already found—that deliverance from his situation can only come from the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked. The alternative of either remaining in his present plight, or accepting the view just named, may be a disgreeable one, but there is no help for it. The case is very plain and simple, and too interesting to be kept from our readers. A statement of it will show, that a fact, which was a "fish" in the hands of the affirmative, became, in those of the negative, a troublesome "scorpion." Dismissing the figures, let us look at the facts.

In the Crisis account of his interview with Dr. Noot, Br. Grant—in reference to the belief of the PHARISEES—says:—

"They believed in the resurrection 'of the just and unjust,' but not of the notoriously wicked. The information gathered from the Jew helped us to understand Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15, better than ever before. This we will notice in due time."

It would appear, from the forgoing, that, prior to the debate, Br. G.'s understanding of Acts xxiv. 15 was not perfect. This is unquestionably true, and the admission of the fact is worth something. Now, then, what discoveries does his "better" acquaintance with the passage comprehend? An analysis of his statement furnishes the desired answer to this question. 1. According to Br. G., the Pharisees held to the resurrection of those termed the "UNJUST" in Acts xxiv. 15. 2. They believed that the "notoriously wicked" would not be raised. Here, then, Br. G. stands squarely committed, by the remorseless logic of his own assertions, to the position that there will never be a resurrection of the "notoriously wicked." But since—according to Br. G. and the Pharisees—the "UNJUST," named in the passage in Acts, are better persons than the "notoriously wicked," the resurrection of the former class must, by every dictate of reason, be held to be not a curse, but a blessing. But if it be a blessing, it should secure salvation—ETERNAL SALVATION; and that—according to the information derived by Br. G. from the Rabbi—is precisely what the Phaaisees believed it would secure. The conclusion, therefore, of the whole matter is this: Br. Grant's "better" understanding of Acts xxiv. 15, results exclusively from his having discovered that the "notoriously wicked," are not in the passage at all, and that the "UNJUST," whom it does mention, are a class that are to be SAVED. This is the platform on which my brother's article places him. If he does not occupy it in fact, let him tell his readers, if he can, in what way his conference with "the Jew" helped him to a "better" comprehension than he previously had of "Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15."

"A Promise Hard to Keep"—stands at the head of this article. Its import will now be explained. It will be seen that, in reference to his new light on "Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15," Br. Grant says—"THIS WE WILL NOTICE IN DUE TIME." Here is a promise to his readers, and it relates to what he designed to do in his article of the succeeding week, wherein he introduced the passage from Acts to show "that the wicked would as certainly arise as the just." But the promise was not kept. The "due time" arrived, and with it an editorial on "The Discussion in Boston," but with them the looked-for "notice" did not come. Nor has it come yet. My conviction is, that the promise is one that cannot be fulfilled, inasmuch as what Br. G. learned from the Rabbi is not in favor of the revival and subsequent destruction of any of the dead, but utterly against that view. His ommission to allude to the matter when the "due time" came, justifies the inference that he discovered how unavailable the faith of the Pharisees would be for the purposes of his argument. He is perfectly excusable for not doing an impossible thing; but he is fairly bound, it seems to me, to withdraw a pledge which he finds himself unable to keep. It may be a little humiliating to do so, but what of that? The truth of God is ten thousand times more important than the concealment of our blunders can possibly be. If we always evince a cheerful readiness to confess our mistakes, one good at least will result from our having made them. This willingness to retreat when we are wrong, gives weight to our opinions when we are right.

It will give me great pleasure, "in due time," to show how the faith of the Pharisees enforces the doctrine which the affirmative contended for in the debate. This will come up in connection with Acts xxiv. 15.

VEHAMASKILIM YABINU,

"AND THE WISE WILL UNDERSTAND."—Dan. xii. 10.

Thus it is translated in our English Bible, aud also in most other translations, the Hebrew not excepted. We shall endeavor to show that this translation is, to say the least, incorrect, and no other mistranslation of any other passage in Scripture has been so injurious to many good people, Jews and Christians, as that with which we headed this article. By virtue of that mistranslation, and, consequently, misunderstood declaration of the angel to Daniel, the Jews of old tried to make out the time of their final deliverance by the Messiah, and were, too often, misled by false pretenders of the Messiah, and thousands, nay, tens of thousands came to a miserable end. The disappointment of one generation was by no means sufficient to make the following one wiser, the sad experience of the people in one country was not able to teach the people of another country to be on their guard; they fell into the same fatal error and perished likewise. Each successive generation entertained the idea that the former misunderstood the prophecies of Daniel, and their calculations of the times and seasons mentioned in that highly figurative book were wrong, while they, the present generation, understood the book perfectly, and cannot be mistaken as concerning the exact time of the Advent of Messiah. In such days, then, any shrewd deceiver or fanatic could succeed in misguiding the unfortunate people, and their end was the same as that of their ancestors. The Rabbies, finally, put a stop to these unfortunate and destructive occurrences, by prohibiting the study of the book of Daniel, and threatened all who should dare to disregard their decree with excommunication.

Not less fatal, though perhaps, not so destructive, was that mistranslation and misinterpretation to many Christians in almost every century of the present era. In addition to the book of Daniel, Christians have that of John, called the "Revelation" which is even more figurative than the former. We shall not stop to speak of the many disappointments in past centuries, when, misguided, either by deceivers or fanatics, Christians expected the second advent of Jesus, the Messiah, but would only make mention of events which have taken place in our days and in this country. No man ever doubted the piety and sincerity of Mr. Miller, who calculated, out of those two books that Messiah must come again, the second time, in 1843; but, at the same time, every man knows that he and all who believed with him were sadly disappointed, and that many lost all they possessed, and many gave up all hope, not only in the speedy coming of Christ, but in the whole plan of redemption, and turned infidels. Many, however, believed that Mr. Miller was mistaken on certain points, which they now discovered, and set down the time to 1854 and made their preparation to welcome the king at his coming. These too were disappointed; and yet there are now learned and pious men who squander their time, their talents and their energy in studying chronology in connection with the books of Daniel and John, in order the find and appoint the times and seasons which the Father has kept for himself.

"Blessed is he who readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand." Thus the Divine introduces his prophecy. We do not think that the Prophet here indicates that any one who readeth and keeps—at heart—which he readeth should be able to find out the appointed time when these things, which he marks by "shortly" shall come to pass. Daniel, on the other hand, received the exact time when Messiah should come the first time, and when He should be cut off, but not for himself, that is, not for any sin of his own, but the time of the end, that is, the second advent of Messiah, in his kingdom to reign supremely over all the earth, was not revealed to him, though he was shown in a vision, how the Father, the Ancient of Days, will deliver the kingdom to his Son.

Moreover, there were shown unto John as well as unto Daniel, most stirring events which will precede the advent of the glorious king, and by which those that read and keep the words of prophecy should become aware of the approach of the greatest of all events, namely, the appearance of the King to occupy the throne of His father. This, and not more, is it what Gabriel said to Daniel, that the "Maskilim" should understand. "Maskilim" are those who consider the events passing around them, and apply them to that which they read in the books of prophecy, and only they will understand what they indicate.

No prophecy, wrapped in a figurative or highly poetical language, was ever understood until that prophecy became a historical fact; and even then, it was only understood by the "considerate ones" while the world at large did not. Isaiah prophecied the birth of Messiah, of his Divine titles and attributes, of his sufferings and humiliation; of his death and resurrection and of his final exaltation and glory; but who of the people understood these sublime predictions? none; and even when the child of Bethlehem was born, when he entered upon his great mission and received publicly the testimony of John the Baptist whom the people believed to be a prophet, and the testimony of the voice from heaven: "Thou art my beloved Son in thee I am well pleased," people did not understand the prophecies of the princely Isaiah. John only, and a few mere "considerate ones" understood. Signs were hung around the birth of the Messiah which should have identified him as the child born and the son given; but their eyes were closed to these signs; they perceived them not. They crucified their king, and at last the Romans came and destroyed the city and sanctuary, and that indignation spoken of in Daniel commenced, and which will not end till the appointed end. Thus, events which shall come to pass before the second coming of Christ were revealed to Daniel and John, and through them to us, so that when these events will become historical facts we shall understand their meaning, lift up our heads and look for the speedy advent of our glorious King. To the world at large, however, these events will be like all other events in the world's drama, the world will, even then, not understand that the end of this dispensation is near, and to them therefore, Christ will appear, as a thief in the night," unawares, but not unto us, not the "Maskilim" the "considerate ones," who read the words of prophecy and keep it. The heart of the "considerate ones," is comforted with the assurance that there is a time appointed; a set time, when the Lord shall return to reign and all his saints with him.

Let us, therefore, not calculate the times and seasons, but watch the march of events in the world's history; when we discover that they are those shown by visions to the prophets of old, the men of God, let us rejoice; but, should these events not take place in our days, let us, notwithstanding be prepared and our lamps trimmed. For, what Gabriel said unto Daniel is also said for us and to us all: "But go thou thy way till the end be, for thou shalt rest and stand up in thy lot at the end of days."

The exact time of the end was not even revealed unto Daniel, the beloved; for when he cried out: "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" he received the following answer: "Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. Many shall be purified, and made white and tried; but the wicked—the world at large—shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand—the passing events—but the considerate ones shall understand."—Israelite Indeed.

ISRAEL AND THE JEWS.

THE CASE OF THE SO CALLED LOST HOUSE OF ISRAEL AS CONTRASTED WITH THAT OF THE JEWS.

That the land of Israel, was given to Israel and not merely to the Jews, would seem to require but liltle proof. It is true that the Jews, or inhabitants of Jerusalem, did say of old to the ten tribes, Ezek. xi., "Get you far from the Lord; unto us is this land given in possession." But did the LORD approve of this denial of their brethern? Did he allow the justice of their claim? Most decidedly not. Repeatedly does he impress upon the prophet, the truth that they were still his brethern, and they where "All the house of Israel," even they whose expatriation was thus rejoiced in by the Jews. For the Jews had their wish gratified, so far as that the house which is called "All Israel," was removed from beside them, and taken away by the Assyrians into the north country; where they have lost the very name of Israel, and whence they are supposed never to have returned to contest the right of the Jews to the whole possession of the land appointed to the twelve tribes of Israel. But what, at the same time saith the LORD to their being sent far off from him? He saith, "Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a Little Sanctuary in the countries unto which they shall come." So he was to be more to Israel in their outcast state, than he has promised to be to the Jews in their dispersion: for these were to seek him and not to find him, until the time of his return; whereas those shall be found of him, and he shall be to them as a Little Sanctuary, and that previous to their restoration, and when they are yet in the countries into which they should come. Thus would he be to them, before they were brought back into their own land which hath been so long lying desolate without them. But their restoration to the land shall also take place. Not only did the LORD say with regard to the Jews—"I will even gather you from the people, and assemble you out of the countries where ye have been csattered; and I will give you the land of Israel," but with regard to their outcast brethren of the house of Israel, he said: "And they shall come thither, and shall take away all the detestable things thereof, and all the abominations thereof from thence." Israel's heart has been divided, but Judah's requires to be renewed; "and I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you." Israel's heart shall cease from being hardened against his own flesh of the house of Judah: "And I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and I will give them an heart of flesh; that they may walk in my statutes, and keep my ordinances and do them: And they shall be my people, and I will be their God."—Time of the End.

MOROSENESS REBUKED.

The rebuke of moroseness contained in Matt. vi. 16—18, should be well pondered by every Christian. Surely he, of all men on earth, ought to be cheerful. How can he, who has God for his friend and the kingdom of God for his home, indulge in sullenness and gloom? Come what may, he knows that "it shall be well with the righteous." He may lose children, friends, health, reputation, property, still he knows that "all things work together for his good." Let him, then, show forth his cheerfulness and "contentment," as well as his "Godliness," that others may get "great gain" from his example. The moroseness and austerity of semi-professed Christians have done much injury to the cause of the Redeemer, and brought reproach upon His religion. The sour countenance of Pharisaic disciples has often made the young regard Christianity as the embodiment of all that is dismal and lugubrious; and thus a stone of stumbling has been thrown in the way of the youthful and light-hearted.

Historians tell us that the ribaldry, buffoonery and gross licentiousness during the reign of Charles II. of England, were brought about in good part by the cant, nasal tones, long prayers and sour visages of the Puritans. Those who could not appreciate the bright and noble qualities of the Puritans, could ridicule their dress and manner. Had the purest and best men that the world has ever produced been more cheerful, more joyous, more courteous, and more conciliating, England might have been spared the ignominy of the disgraceful reigns of Charles II. and James II.

The fact is, that the Puritans at the outset never could have gained a party sufficiently strong to overthrow the throne of Charles I., but for the popularity of their great leader, John Hampden. All know how much of his popularity was due to that "natural cheerfulness, vivacity, and flowing courtesy to all men," of which Clarendon speaks. The broad and genial humor of John Bunyan makes him more read than any other author. Our Saviour, though "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," yet mixed freely with the people in kind and cheerful conversation. He honored a marriage by his presence. He eat with publicans and sinners. He talked with a poor, ignorant woman by the well of Samaria. He wept with the bereaved sisters at the grave of their brother Lazarus. All this shows a disposition the farthest removed from the sullen and selfish gloom of morbid religion. Major Hill.

THE TRANSFIGURATION ON THE MOUNT.

"This vision, which opened to the gaze of the three disciples the appearance of their master in his glorified state, was the fulfilment of a promise which he gave them but a few days before. Luke ix. 27, "But I tell you of a truth, there are some standing here who shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God," says our authorized version. Other learned men, however, translate it: "God's Royal Majesty." In the transfiguration, then, Jesus showed the three how he will appear when he comes the second time, and establishes the kingdom of God on the earth. If, as it is asserted, the kingdom of God, or the reign of Messiah, had been set up on the Mount of Transfiguration, it must be there now, because, when once established, this kingdom is to stand forever and ever. Is the kingdom of God on the Mount, or anywhere on the earth? If the kingdom of God is already set up on the earth, how is it that all peoples, nations and languages do not render obedience to its king, the Messiah? It is said that those among the nations who believe in Messiah, constitute his kingdom. To this we object, for two reasons: first, the true and faithful believers, the saints, are comparatively very few; while we are assured by the unerring word of truth, that all people will serve and obey Him to whom the everlasting government is given. Secondly, even these few saints, the best of them, render but a very imperfect obedience to their king, and need continually the mediation of the Great High Priest who now sits on the throne of his Father in heaven, or else he would not find even one co-ruler when he comes to reign over the earth.

"My kingdom is not of this age," says Jesus to Pilate; and what He says is true; and therefore he taught us to pray—Thy kingdom come: which, indeed, we still do pray; all Christians pray it every day. But what those who believe the kingdom of God to be already on the earth do mean by it, we cannot understand.

The same is the case with the passage in Luke xvii. 20, which is generally referred to by those who believe the kingdom of God is in the hearts of the faithful disciples. "The kingdom of God is within you," is the translation in the authorized version; while the literal translation reads thus: "For God's Royal Majesty is among you." It is evident, from the context, that Christ did not say, "the kingdom of God is within you;" for he speaks to unbelieving Pharasees, within whom the kingdom of God could not dwell, even if it were in the heart of believers—Israelite Indeed.

WEIGHING THE EVIDENCE.—A clerical correspondent of the Presbyterian relates an account of a recently deceased jurist, which is interesting. This man had been for many years a Judge of the Supreme Court of a southwestern State. His learning, sagacity, integrity, and morality gave him a very high position in the community. But, while an attentive hearer of the gospel, he was not a professor of religion. On one occasion the clergyman who had had some previous acquaintance with him, having concluded his call, was about to withdraw, when the Judge said to him, with emotion, "Sir, I have good news for you. Although I feel myself the unworthiest of them all, I am I trust, one of the children of God." As he spoke, his eyes filled with tears, and he proceeded to give me a narrative of his case. He had been for years undecided, if not skeptical in regard to the Bible. Feeling himself advancing in age, he determined to decide the case for himself once and forever. He gave one year to an investigation of scripture, and the evidence for and against it exactly as he would have done a complicated and important case laid before him as Judge of the Supreme Court. After a full, calm, impartial examination, he deliberately decided that the Bible was from God—was all it professed to be. He then felt the clear obligation to believe and to act upon its teachings. A little while he hesitated in regard to what was faith in Christ—puzzled by its very simplicrty. But the Holy Spirit completed his work by opening his eyes to see and acknowledge Christ as his Saviour; and after some months of serious consideration of that part of Christian duty also, he became a member of the Presbyterian Church in the place in which he lived. If all skeptics would only thus weigh the evidence, how surely would they attain the like precious faith of God's elect!—Christian Intel.

THE JEWS AND JERUSALEM.—The following from the Revival, shows that there is a great movement on foot in reference to the Jewish people and the holy city. A correspondent thus writes:—

"In January last there was a notice in the Times to the effect that the Emperor of the French desired a conference of the leaders of the Jewish nation to be held in Paris, and the Prefect of Paris had issued notices accordingly; and I have very recently learned that the conference will be in the summer, and probably about the month of June. The Rothschild family are taking a very active part in this movement; and the object of the meeting is, the taking into consideration the immediate preparation of Jerusalem. Deeming this to be a very remarkable sign of the times, I thought you might wish to make use of such information for the benefit of the Lord's people in general."

SALUTARY THOUGHT.—When I was a young man, there lived in our neighborhood a farmer who was usually reported to be a very liberal man, and uncommonly upright in his dealings. When he had any of the produce of his farm to dispose of, he made it an invariable rule to give good measure—rather more than could be required of him. One of his friends, observing him frequently doing so, questioned him as to why he did it—told him he gave too much, and said it would be to his disadvantage. Now mark the answer of this excellent man. "God almighty has permitted me but one journey through the world; and when I am gone, I cannot return to rectify mistakes." Think of this. But one journey through the world!

To dare to believe less, or to pretend to understand more, than God has expressly revealed, is equally profane presumption.—Whately.

GLORY, HONOR, IMMORTALITY.

"God will render to every man according to his deeds: To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor, and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. ii. 6, 7.

1. "GLORY."—Greek, doxan. The term glory, is one often used, and generally includes in the mind the ideas of excellence and happiness: or some thing splendid connected with much enjoyment. As the glory spoken of in the text is some thing to be attained in the future, and after effort on our part in the present time, it is worth while to endeavor to get as clear a conception of it as may be.

We regard it as that "change," of which the Scriptures speak, to be experienced by the saints at the second advent of Christ. Or, in other words, that change to be wrought at the resurrection from among the dead, viz.: the resurrection of the just. Paul informs us, 1 Cor. xv. 43: "They are sown in dishonor, they arise in glory."—Syriac.

The present state of man is one of dishonor, because one of corruption. Great pains are now taken to adorn our persons—to make ourselves look beautiful; i. e., glorious. But after all the labor and toil, corruption prevails—the most beautiful form and countenance is changed, its appearance becomes offensive, and we willingly lay it away out of our sight. "They are sown in dishonor." But the followers of Christ will be raised in glory.

How shall we obtain an idea of the glory to be attained? Paul informs us, Phil. iii 21, that "Our LIFE-GIVER, the Lord Jesus Christ," will come "from heaven;" and that then he shall change our vile body, (or, body of our abasement—Syriac) that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body," (or the body of his glory.—Syriac.) But how can we get an idea of that glory which Jesus possesses? Paul has, in this text, given us the pattern of the glory, and Peter shall give us the clue to its full discovery; 2 Peter i. 16–18. Peter says,—"We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty; for he received from God the Father, honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased: and this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount." Another eye-witness of the same manifestation, viz., John, says,—"We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father." John i. 14.

We will now turn to the manifestation of that glory, as recorded by Matthew, chap. xvii. 1: "Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John, his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them, (Syriac—was changed before them,) and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light." Here, in this vision, was the manifestation of "his glorious body," like unto which, Paul tells us, "our vile bodies shall" be "changed" when Christ "comes from heaven." Surely here is glory enough to satisfy our largest desires. The sight of it in vision, made Peter say, "Lord, it is good for us to be here." O, how satisfying the sight, and so much more so the realization when "vision" will be swallowed up in the reality. Such is the glory presented as one of the benefits of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

2.—"HONOR"—Greek, timeen. "A state of honor, dignity: a distinguished mark of favor." Such is the state to which the followers of Christ are to be exalted. "A Royal Priesthood;" to be "kings and priests unto God and the Lamb," to "reign on the earth, and over the nations." This is what Christ has promised those who obey him; and the Scriptures everywhere confirm the same thing. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne." Rev. iii. 21. Christ's own throne is "the throne of his father David," which Jehovah has sworn to give him, and which will be bestowed upon him when the judgment is executed, or in process of execution upon the "fourth" dynasty of rulers on earth, symbolized by a "dreadful and terrible beast." That beast is to be slain—the body of rulers overthrown and destroyed; then one is seen coming in the "clouds of heaven," who is "like the Son of Man;" and he "came to the Ancient of days, ... and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and tongues, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii. 13, 14. This dominion and kingdom is that in which Christ has promised his followers a share: and "judgment" is to be "given to the saints of the Most High," when the time has come "that the saints possess the kingdom;" verse 22: then "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, (or the greatness of the kings—Septuagint,) under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Verse 27.

Such is the royal honor presented to our

A PROMISE HARD TO KEEP.

The Editor of the Crisis, by visiting Rabbi Noot, during the late discussion, to consult him on Daniel xii. 2, got himself into a really embarrassing predicament. He asked the Rabbi for exegetical "bread," from which the notion of the revival of the wicked dead might derive sustenance, but the learned Israelite gave him instead a "stone" of the most indigestible kind. At that time, and even for some days afterwards, my brother seemed to think he had received veritable bread. Vain was the effort of the affirmative to undeceive him, and so the illusion clung to him long enough to find a record in the first of the two articles that have appeared in the Crisis in relation to the debate. There is reason, however, for believing that the negative got his eyes open before he had completed his second article. His zeal to connect the verb "awake" with the "shame and everlasting contempt" of the passage in Daniel, led him into a theological pitfall that will look deeper and deeper to him the more he explores it. And he will find—if he has not already found—that deliverance from his situation can only come from the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked. The alternative of either remaining in his present plight, or accepting the view just named, may be a disgreeable one, but there is no help for it. The case is very plain and simple, and too interesting to be kept from our readers. A statement of it will show, that a fact, which was a "fish" in the hands of the affirmative, became, in those of the negative, a troublesome "scorpion." Dismissing the figures, let us look at the facts.

In the Crisis account of his interview with Dr. Noot, Br. Grant—in reference to the belief of the PHARISEES—says:—

"They believed in the resurrection 'of the just and unjust,' but not of the notoriously wicked. The information gathered from the Jew helped us to understand Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15, better than ever before. This we will notice in due time."

It would appear, from the forgoing, that, prior to the debate, Br. G.'s understanding of Acts xxiv. 15 was not perfect. This is unquestionably true, and the admission of the fact is worth something. Now, then, what discoveries does his "better" acquaintance with the passage comprehend? An analysis of his statement furnishes the desired answer to this question. 1. According to Br. G., the Pharisees held to the resurrection of those termed the "UNJUST" in Acts xxiv. 15. 2. They believed that the "notoriously wicked" would not be raised. Here, then, Br. G. stands squarely committed, by the remorseless logic of his own assertions, to the position that there will never be a resurrection of the "notoriously wicked." But since—according to Br. G. and the Pharisees—the "UNJUST," named in the passage in Acts, are better persons than the "notoriously wicked," the resurrection of the former class must, by every dictate of reason, be held to be not a curse, but a blessing. But if it be a blessing, it should secure salvation—ETERNAL SALVATION; and that—according to the information derived by Br. G. from the Rabbi—is precisely what the Phaaisees believed it would secure. The conclusion, therefore, of the whole matter is this: Br. Grant's "better" understanding of Acts xxiv. 15, results exclusively from his having discovered that the "notoriously wicked," are not in the passage at all, and that the "UNJUST," whom it does mention, are a class that are to be SAVED. This is the platform on which my brother's article places him. If he does not occupy it in fact, let him tell his readers, if he can, in what way his conference with "the Jew" helped him to a "better" comprehension than he previously had of "Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15."

"A Promise Hard to Keep"—stands at the head of this article. Its import will now be explained. It will be seen that, in reference to his new light on "Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15," Br. Grant says—"THIS WE WILL NOTICE IN DUE TIME." Here is a promise to his readers, and it relates to what he designed to do in his article of the succeeding week, wherein he introduced the passage from Acts to show "that the wicked would as certainly arise as the just." But the promise was not kept. The "due time" arrived, and with it an editorial on "The Discussion in Boston," but with them the looked-for "notice" did not come. Nor has it come yet. My conviction is, that the promise is one that cannot be fulfilled, inasmuch as what Br. G. learned from the Rabbi is not in favor of the revival and subsequent destruction of any of the dead, but utterly against that view. His ommission to allude to the matter when the "due time" came, justifies the inference that he discovered how unavailable the faith of the Pharisees would be for the purposes of his argument. He is perfectly excusable for not doing an impossible thing; but he is fairly bound, it seems to me, to withdraw a pledge which he finds himself unable to keep. It may be a little humiliating to do so, but what of that? The truth of God is ten thousand times more important than the concealment of our blunders can possibly be. If we always evince a cheerful readiness to confess our mistakes, one good at least will result from our having made them. This willingness to retreat when we are wrong, gives weight to our opinions when we are right.

It will give me great pleasure, "in due time," to show how the faith of the Pharisees enforces the doctrine which the affirmative contended for in the debate. This will come up in connection with Acts xxiv. 15.

VEHAMASKILIM YABINU,

"AND THE WISE WILL UNDERSTAND."—Dan. xii. 10.

Thus it is translated in our English Bible, aud also in most other translations, the Hebrew not excepted. We shall endeavor to show that this translation is, to say the least, incorrect, and no other mistranslation of any other passage in Scripture has been so injurious to many good people, Jews and Christians, as that with which we headed this article. By virtue of that mistranslation, and, consequently, misunderstood declaration of the angel to Daniel, the Jews of old tried to make out the time of their final deliverance by the Messiah, and were, too often, misled by false pretenders of the Messiah, and thousands, nay, tens of thousands came to a miserable end. The disappointment of one generation was by no means sufficient to make the following one wiser, the sad experience of the people in one country was not able to teach the people of another country to be on their guard; they fell into the same fatal error and perished likewise. Each successive generation entertained the idea that the former misunderstood the prophecies of Daniel, and their calculations of the times and seasons mentioned in that highly figurative book were wrong, while they, the present generation, understood the book perfectly, and cannot be mistaken as concerning the exact time of the Advent of Messiah. In such days, then, any shrewd deceiver or fanatic could succeed in misguiding the unfortunate people, and their end was the same as that of their ancestors. The Rabbies, finally, put a stop to these unfortunate and destructive occurrences, by prohibiting the study of the book of Daniel, and threatened all who should dare to disregard their decree with excommunication.

Not less fatal, though perhaps, not so destructive, was that mistranslation and misinterpretation to many Christians in almost every century of the present era. In addition to the book of Daniel, Christians have that of John, called the "Revelation" which is even more figurative than the former. We shall not stop to speak of the many disappointments in past centuries, when, misguided, either by deceivers or fanatics, Christians expected the second advent of Jesus, the Messiah, but would only make mention of events which have taken place in our days and in this country. No man ever doubted the piety and sincerity of Mr. Miller, who calculated, out of those two books that Messiah must come again, the second time, in 1843; but, at the same time, every man knows that he and all who believed with him were sadly disappointed, and that many lost all they possessed, and many gave up all hope, not only in the speedy coming of Christ, but in the whole plan of redemption, and turned infidels. Many, however, believed that Mr. Miller was mistaken on certain points, which they now discovered, and set down the time to 1854 and made their preparation to welcome the king at his coming. These too were disappointed; and yet there are now learned and pious men who squander their time, their talents and their energy in studying chronology in connection with the books of Daniel and John, in order the find and appoint the times and seasons which the Father has kept for himself.

"Blessed is he who readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand." Thus the Divine introduces his prophecy. We do not think that the Prophet here indicates that any one who readeth and keeps—at heart—which he readeth should be able to find out the appointed time when these things, which he marks by "shortly" shall come to pass. Daniel, on the other hand, received the exact time when Messiah should come the first time, and when He should be cut off, but not for himself, that is, not for any sin of his own, but the time of the end, that is, the second advent of Messiah, in his kingdom to reign supremely over all the earth, was not revealed to him, though he was shown in a vision, how the Father, the Ancient of Days, will deliver the kingdom to his Son.

Moreover, there were shown unto John as well as unto Daniel, most stirring events which will precede the advent of the glorious king, and by which those that read and keep the words of prophecy should become aware of the approach of the greatest of all events, namely, the appearance of the King to occupy the throne of His father. This, and not more, is it what Gabriel said to Daniel, that the "Maskilim" should understand. "Maskilim" are those who consider the events passing around them, and apply them to that which they read in the books of prophecy, and only they will understand what they indicate.

No prophecy, wrapped in a figurative or highly poetical language, was ever understood until that prophecy became a historical fact; and even then, it was only understood by the "considerate ones" while the world at large did not. Isaiah prophecied the birth of Messiah, of his Divine titles and attributes, of his sufferings and humiliation; of his death and resurrection and of his final exaltation and glory; but who of the people understood these sublime predictions? none; and even when the child of Bethlehem was born, when he entered upon his great mission and received publicly the testimony of John the Baptist whom the people believed to be a prophet, and the testimony of the voice from heaven: "Thou art my beloved Son in thee I am well pleased,' people did not understand the prophecies of the princely Isaiah. John only, and a few mere "considerate ones" understood. Signs were hung around the birth of the Messiah which should have identified him as the child born and the son given; but their eyes were closed to these signs; they perceived them not. They crucified their king, and at last the Romans came and destroyed the city and sanctuary, and that indignation spoken of in Daniel commenced, and which will not end till the appointed end. Thus, events which shall come to pass before the second coming of Christ were revealed to Daniel and John, and through them to us, so that when these events will become historical facts we shall understand their meaning, lift up our heads and look for the speedy advent of our glorious King. To the world at large, however, these events will be like all other events in the world's drama, the world will, even then, not understand that the end of this dispensation is near, and to them therefore, Christ will appear, as a thief in the night," unawares, but not unto us, not the "Maskilim" the "considerate ones," who read the words of prophecy and keep it. The heart of the "considerate ones," is comforted with the assurance that there is a time appointed; a set time, when the Lord shall return to reign and all his saints with him.

Let us, therefore, not calculate the times and seasons, but watch the march of events in the world's history; when we discover that they are those shown by visions to the prophets of old, the men of God, let us rejoice; but, should these events not take place in our days, let us, notwithstanding be prepared and our lamps trimmed. For, what Gabriel said unto Daniel is also said for us and to us all: "But go thou thy way till the end be, for thou shalt rest and stand up in thy lot at the end of days."

The exact time of the end was not even revealed unto Daniel, the beloved; for when he cried out: "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" he received the following answer: "Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. Many shall be purified, and made white and tried; but the wicked—the world at large—shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand—the passing events—but the considerate ones shall understand."—Israelite Indeed.

ISRAEL AND THE JEWS.

THE CASE OF THE SO CALLED LOST HOUSE OF ISRAEL AS CONTRASTED WITH THAT OF THE JEWS.

That the land of Israel, was given to Israel and not merely to the Jews, would seem to require but liltle proof. It is true that the Jews, or inhabitants of Jerusalem, did say of old to the ten tribes, Ezek. xi., "Get you far from the Lord; unto us is this land given in possession." But did the LORD approve of this denial of their brethern? Did he allow the justice of their claim? Most decidedly not. Repeatedly does he impress upon the prophet, the truth that they were still his brethern, and they where "All the house of Israel," even they whose expatriation was thus rejoiced in by the Jews. For the Jews had their wish gratified, so far as that the house which is called "All Israel," was removed from beside them, and taken away by the Assyrians into the north country; where they have lost the very name of Israel, and whence they are supposed never to have returned to contest the right of the Jews to the whole possession of the land appointed to the twelve tribes of Israel. But what, at the same time saith the LORD to their being sent far off from him? He saith, "Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a Little Sanctuary in the countries unto which they shall come." So he was to be more to Israel in their outcast state, than he has promised to be to the Jews in their dispersion: for these were to seek him and not to find him, until the time of his return; whereas those shall be found of him, and he shall be to them as a Little Sanctuary, and that previous to their restoration, and when they are yet in the countries into which they should come. Thus would he be to them, before they were brought back into their own land which hath been so long lying desolate without them. But their restoration to the land shall also take place. Not only did the LORD say with regard to the Jews—"I will even gather you from the people, and assemble you out of the countries where ye have been csattered; and I will give you the land of Israel," but with regard to their outcast brethren of the house of Israel, he said: "And they shall come thither, and shall take away all the detestable things thereof, and all the abominations thereof from thence." Israel's heart has been divided, but Judah's requires to be renewed; "and I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you." Israel's heart shall cease from being hardened against his own flesh of the house of Judah: "And I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and I will give them an heart of flesh; that they may walk in my statutes, and keep my ordinances and do them: And they shall be my people, and I will be their God."—Time of the End.

MOROSENESS REBUKED.

The rebuke of moroseness contained in Matt. vi. 16—18, should be well pondered by every Christian. Surely he, of all men on earth, ought to be cheerful. How can he, who has God for his friend and the kingdom of God for his home, indulge in sullenness and gloom? Come what may, he knows that "it shall be well with the righteous." He may lose children, friends, health, reputation, property, still he knows that "all things work together for his good." Let him, then, show forth his cheerfulness and "contentment," as well as his "Godliness," that others may get "great gain" from his example. The moroseness and austerity of semi-professed Christians have done much injury to the cause of the Redeemer, and brought reproach upon His religion. The sour countenance of Pharisaic disciples has often made the young regard Christianity as the embodiment of all that is dismal and lugubrious; and thus a stone of stumbling has been thrown in the way of the youthful and light-hearted.

Historians tell us that the ribaldry, buffoonery and gross licentiousness during the reign of Charles II. of England, were brought about in good part by the cant, nasal tones, long prayers and sour visages of the Puritans. Those who could not appreciate the bright and noble qualities of the Puritans, could ridicule their dress and manner. Had the purest and best men that the world has ever produced been more cheerful, more joyous, more courteous, and more conciliating, England might have been spared the ignominy of the disgraceful reigns of Charles II. and James II.

The fact is, that the Puritans at the outset never could have gained a party sufficiently strong to overthrow the throne of Charles I., but for the popularity of their great leader, John Hampden. All know how much of his popularity was due to that "natural cheerfulness, vivacity, and flowing courtesy to all men," of which Clarendon speaks. The broad and genial humor of John Bunyan makes him more read than any other author. Our Saviour, though "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," yet mixed freely with the people in kind and cheerful conversation. He honored a marriage by his presence. He eat with publicans and sinners. He talked with a poor, ignorant woman by the well of Samaria. He wept with the bereaved sisters at the grave of their brother Lazarus. All this shows a disposition the farthest removed from the sullen and selfish gloom of morbid religion. Major Hill.

THE TRANSFIGURATION ON THE MOUNT.

This vision, which opened to the gaze of the three disciples the appearance of their master in his glorified state, was the fulfilment of a promise which he gave them but a few days before. Luke ix. 27, "But I tell you of a truth, there are some standing here who shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God," says our authorized version. Other learned men, however, translate it: "God's Royal Majesty." In the transfiguration, then, Jesus showed the three how he will appear when he comes the second time, and establishes the kingdom of God on the earth. If, as it is asserted, the kingdom of God, or the reign of Messiah, had been set up on the Mount of Transfiguration, it must be there now, because, when once established, this kingdom is to stand forever and ever. Is the kingdom of God on the Mount, or anywhere on the earth? If the kingdom of God is already set up on the earth, how is it that all peoples, nations and languages do not render obedience to its king, the Messiah? It is said that those among the nations who believe in Messiah, constitute his kingdom. To this we object, for two reasons: first, the true and faithful believers, the saints, are comparatively very few; while we are assured by the unerring word of truth, that all people will serve and obey Him to whom the everlasting government is given. Secondly, even these few saints, the best of them, render but a very imperfect obedience to their king, and need continually the mediation of the Great High Priest who now sits on the throne of his Father in heaven, or else he would not find even one co-ruler when he comes to reign over the earth.

"My kingdom is not of this age," says Jesus to Pilate; and what He says is true; and therefore he taught us to pray—Thy kingdom come: which, indeed, we still do pray; all Christians pray it every day. But what those who believe the kingdom of God to be already on the earth do mean by it, we cannot understand.

The same is the case with the passage in Luke xvii. 20, which is generally referred to by those who believe the kingdom of God is in the hearts of the faithful disciples. "The kingdom of God is within you," is the translation in the authorized version; while the literal translation reads thus: "For God's Royal Majesty is among you." It is evident, from the context, that Christ did not say, "the kingdom of God is within you;" for he speaks to unbelieving Pharasees, within whom the kingdom of God could not dwell, even if it were in the heart of believers—Israelite Indeed.

WEIGHING THE EVIDENCE.—A clerical correspondent of the Presbyterian relates an account of a recently deceased jurist, which is interesting. This man had been for many years a Judge of the Supreme Court of a southwestern State. His learning, sagacity, integrity, and morality gave him a very high position in the community. But, while an attentive hearer of the gospel, he was not a professor of religion. On one occasion the clergyman who had had some previous acquaintance with him, having concluded his call, was about to withdraw, when the Judge said to him, with emotion, "Sir, I have good news for you. Although I feel myself the unworthiest of them all, I am I trust, one of the children of God." As he spoke, his eyes filled with tears, and he proceeded to give me a narrative of his case. He had been for years undecided, if not skeptical in regard to the Bible. Feeling himself advancing in age, he determined to decide the case for himself once and forever. He gave one year to an investigation of scripture, and the evidence for and against it exactly as he would have done a complicated and important case laid before him as Judge of the Supreme Court. After a full, calm, impartial examination, he deliberately decided that the Bible was from God—was all it professed to be. He then felt the clear obligation to believe and to act upon its teachings. A little while he hesitated in regard to what was faith in Christ—puzzled by its very simplicrty. But the Holy Spirit completed his work by opening his eyes to see and acknowledge Christ as his Saviour; and after some months of serious consideration of that part of Christian duty also, he became a member of the Presbyterian Church in the place in which he lived. If all skeptics would only thus weigh the evidence, how surely would they attain the like precious faith of God's elect!—Christian Intel.

THE JEWS AND JERUSALEM.—The following from the Revival, shows that there is a great movement on foot in reference to the Jewish people and the holy city. A correspondent thus writes:—

"In January last there was a notice in the Times to the effect that the Emperor of the French desired a conference of the leaders of the Jewish nation to be held in Paris, and the Prefect of Paris had issued notices accordingly; and I have very recently learned that the conference will be in the summer, and probably about the month of June. The Rothschild family are taking a very active part in this movement; and the object of the meeting is, the taking into consideration the immediate preparation of Jerusalem. Deeming this to be a very remarkable sign of the times, I thought you might wish to make use of such information for the benefit of the Lord's people in general."

SALUTARY THOUGHT.—When I was a young man, there lived in our neighborhood a farmer who was usually reported to be a very liberal man, and uncommonly upright in his dealings. When he had any of the produce of his farm to dispose of, he made it an invariable rule to give good measure—rather more than could be required of him. One of his friends, observing him frequently doing so, questioned him as to why he did it—told him he gave too much, and said it would be to his disadvantage. Now mark the answer of this excellent man. "God almighty has permitted me but one journey through the world; and when I am gone, I cannot return to rectify mistakes." Think of this. But one journey through the world!

To dare to believe less, or to pretend to understand more, than God has expressly revealed, is equally profane presumption.—Whately.

GLORY, HONOR, IMMORTALITY.

"God will render to every man according to his deeds: To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor, and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. ii. 6, 7.

1. "GLORY."—Greek, doxan. The term glory, is one often used, and generally includes in the mind the ideas of excellence and happiness: or some thing splendid connected with much enjoyment. As the glory spoken of in the text is some thing to be attained in the future, and after effort on our part in the present time, it is worth while to endeavor to get as clear a conception of it as may be.

We regard it as that "change," of which the Scriptures speak, to be experienced by the saints at the second advent of Christ. Or, in other words, that change to be wrought at the resurrection from among the dead, viz.: the resurrection of the just. Paul informs us, 1 Cor. xv. 43: "They are sown in dishonor, they arise in glory."—Syriac.

The present state of man is one of dishonor, because one of corruption. Great pains are now taken to adorn our persons—to make ourselves look beautiful; i. e., glorious. But after all the labor and toil, corruption prevails—the most beautiful form and countenance is changed, its appearance becomes offensive, and we willingly lay it away out of our sight. "They are sown in dishonor." But the followers of Christ will be raised in glory.

How shall we obtain an idea of the glory to be attained? Paul informs us, Phil. iii 21, that "Our LIFE-GIVER, the Lord Jesus Christ," will come "from heaven;" and that then he shall change our vile body, (or, body of our abasement—Syriac) that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body," (or the body of his glory.—Syriac.) But how can we get an idea of that glory which Jesus possesses? Paul has, in this text, given us the pattern of the glory, and Peter shall give us the clue to its full discovery; 2 Peter i. 16–18. Peter says,—"We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty; for he received from God the Father, honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased: and this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount." Another eye-witness of the same manifestation, viz., John, says,—"We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father." John i. 14.

We will now turn to the manifestation of that glory, as recorded by Matthew, chap. xvii. 1: "Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John, his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them, (Syriac—was changed before them,) and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light." Here, in this vision, was the manifestation of "his glorious body," like unto which, Paul tells us, "our vile bodies shall" be "changed" when Christ "comes from heaven." Surely here is glory enough to satisfy our largest desires. The sight of it in vision, made Peter say, "Lord, it is good for us to be here." O, how satisfying the sight, and so much more so the realization when "vision" will be swallowed up in the reality. Such is the glory presented as one of the benefits of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

2.—"HONOR"—Greek, timeen. "A state of honor, dignity: a distinguished mark of favor." Such is the state to which the followers of Christ are to be exalted. "A Royal Priesthood;" to be "kings and priests unto God and the Lamb," to "reign on the earth, and over the nations." This is what Christ has promised those who obey him; and the Scriptures everywhere confirm the same thing. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne." Rev. iii. 21. Christ's own throne is "the throne of his father David," which Jehovah has sworn to give him, and which will be bestowed upon him when the judgment is executed, or in process of execution upon the "fourth" dynasty of rulers on earth, symbolized by a "dreadful and terrible beast." That beast is to be slain—the body of rulers overthrown and destroyed; then one is seen coming in the "clouds of heaven," who is "like the Son of Man;" and he "came to the Ancient of days, . . . and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and tongues, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii. 13, 14. This dominion and kingdom is that in which Christ has promised his followers a share: and "judgment" is to be "given to the saints of the Most High," when the time has come "that the saints possess the kingdom;" verse 22: then "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, (or the greatness of the kings—Septuagint,) under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Verse 27.

Such is the royal honor presented to our faith, as one of the grand motives to a right course of action in our present state of trial. Men are amazingly influenced by what they call "a sense of honor;" and to occupy some important post of trust where their honor can be conspicuous, is the ambition of many minds. No sacrifice, no suffering, no effort is spared, if they have evidence of the possibility of attaining the desired eminence. What an honor, in their estimation, to be President of the United States, though the term of office is a few short years, and though they may die even before that short period terminates; while the honor proffered the followers of Christ, is an honor never pass to away, nor to be changed into other hands, or to cease by death, as we shall shortly see. Let us suppose that all the honor ever possessed by kings, emperors, governors, and presidents, could be concentrated on one man, and that his life could be prolonged to a period equal to the combined years that have been occupied by the entire race of Adam; even then in splendor and duration it would fall infinitely short of that one saint who shall become a king in the Empire of Jesus Christ! Let then the men of earth, or worldly men, seek their dying honors, which so soon fade away; the Christian has a "far more exceeding," even "an eternal weight of honor," reserved in store, soon to be conferred upon him, if found possessing the required characteristics. Here then is motive sufficient to stimulate the most desponding child of God. Take courage, brother: you are shortly to wear a kingly crown, and wear it for ever and ever. Lift up thy head, then, and faint not at any trials or sufferings you may be called to endure now.

3. "Immortality."—Greek, aphtharsian. "Incorruptibility:" a state opposed to our present state, which is corruptible, mortal, dying. This incorruptible state, proffered in our text, is essential to confirm us in the glory and honor previously noticed. Without this, that glory might fade away—that honor have an end. With this, they are both eternal.

The apostle here clearly shows that men are not possessed of immortality by creation, or birth; and he shows also that it is a favor to be conferred on those who pursue a defined course. He had stated in the previous chapter, that men "professing themselves wise, became fools, and changed the glory of an uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man," &c. Little did he then know of the folly which was to be developed in after times, by an attempt to make it appear that man is incorruptible, like God. Such "changing the truth of God into a lie," by which "the creature" is "worshipped and served more than the Creator," remained to be developed as the Man of Sin should begin to be manifested. Now, men affirm that they are "immortal"—incorruptible like God! True, they admit their bodies will die; but the essential man, they affirm, is "immortal, and can never die;" thus making "void the word of God through their tradition."

Man is not inherently immortal, or incorruptible, in whole or in part. Not one solitary text in the Bible affirms any such thing, but the reverse. Let that fact satisfy the believer in the Scriptures. Immortality is a gift, dependent on the will of the giver—God, and on the action of him who shall partake of it. Paul informs us when it will be conferred, and how; viz., "At the last trump," and by "the resurrection," for, saith he, "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible"—aphtharsian; the same word employed in our text. "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." 1 Cor. xv. 52–54. And this victory, which "God giveth," is "through our Lord Jesus Christ." Here is the true source of immortality, and the time when it will be attained. Let all remember this and lay aside that pride which possesses men's hearts from a fancied notion of immortality.

A Psalm for the Times.

We reproduce the eighty-third psalm, as appropriate not only to the defeated despots of the South, but of "all the nations that forget God," who will speedily be destroyed, and that without remedy. J. T. C.

"Keep not thou silence, O God: hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God. For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult: and they that hate thee have lifted up the head. They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thy hidden ones. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance. For they have consulted together with one consent: they are confederate against thee: the tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites; of Moab, and the Hagarenes; Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre; Assur also is joined with them: they have holpen the children of Lot. Do unto them as unto the Midianites; as to Sisera, as to Jabin at the brook of Kison; who perished at Endor: they became as dung for the earth. Make their nobles like Oreb and like Zeeb; yea, all their princes as Zebah and as Zalmunna: who said, let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession. O my God, make them like the chaff, as the stubble before the wind. As the fire burneth a wood, and as the flame setteth the mountains on fire, so persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm. Fill their faces with shame; that they may consider thy name, O Yahveh. Let them be confounded and suddenly perish for ever; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish: that men may know that thou, whose name alone is Yahveh, art the Most High over all the earth."

"There is not a man that gets through life so easily and so happily as a truth-loving, truth-thinking, and truth-speaking Christian."

Eternal Life.

"God will render to every man according to his deeds: To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor, and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. ii. 6, 7.

"Eternal life," zoeen aionion; "life eternal." This is the climax of the whole, and securing the whole. What corruptible, dying man, most of all needs, is life—an unending life. That is here promised to such as accept the conditions of the offered benefit.

We understand life here, in its most obvious sense, of conscious being—or that state of being appropriate to a sentient creature—a being that has the faculty of perception. To give to the term life a figurative sense without a shadow of reason, except that which originates in the traditions of men, who affirm that all men, irrespective of moral character, are in possession of existence that shall never end, we regard as a corruption of the word of God—a making void the testimony of the faithful and true Witness, who saith, "I am come that they might have life;" John x. 10; and who furthermore declares, "I am the way, the truth, and the life;" John xiv. 6; all of which is confirmed by John, who saith, "He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son: and this is the record that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son;" not in ourselves, as the theory of man's natural and essential immortality affirms it to be. "He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v. 11, 12.

To suppose that the inspired authors of the Bible almost uniformly speak in figurative language, when presenting the great crowning benefit of the work and mediation of the Son of God, is a position of fearful presumption, and an unfounded assumption. If the Holy Spirit, who inspired holy men to speak, had intended happiness, as the natural immortal soul theorists maintain, as the crowning blessing, it would have been equally easy to have used the terms makarioi, makarismos, as Paul does, Rom. iv. 6, 7, 8, 9; where these words are translated "blessed," and "blessedness," and have the proper signification of happy and happiness. But zoee is the emphatic term selected by the Holy Spirit as expressive of the glorious reward God has promised to those who obey him. This fact is sufficient to condemn forever, the perversion resorted to in keeping up the theory that man is an immortal being. Man is a dying, corruptible creature; God offers him eternal zoee, life; not merely makarismos—happiness; though having eternal life, he will be eternally happy—that follows as a matter of course.

Let learned and unlearned perverters of the testimony of the Spirit of God, cease making "God a liar," by saying he does not mean zoee, but makarismos, when he uniformly employs the former term in presenting the great climax of proffered benefits, for the encouragement of dying men, and to stimulate them to suffer, if need be, even unto death now, that they may attain unto zoee aionion—'life eternal.' Let the simplicity in which the Gospel approaches us, with its offered benefits, stand in all its purity and plainness, and darken no longer the counsel of God by perverting his words and making them void by traditions. Life—eternal life—to live forever—not die any more, is the grand theme with which the Gospel salutes our ears. Joyful sound to dying men. Let them hear it.

Having presented, in this and a previous article, the glorious cluster of benefits presented by the text, we proceed to notice, The means by which we may make the benefits our own.

This we shall do only so far as suggested by the text. That teaches us they are to be sought for; and informs us how to seek for them.

1. We must "seek for" them. Men do not seek for that which they have already in possession. Immortality, equally with the glory and honor, is in the future, and is to be attained only by those who seek for it. The idea of the original is—to acquire by labor, or work. It is not an idle wish, that will give us possession of those glorious, benefits, but earnest application; which leads us to notice,

2. How we are to seek for them. (1.) By "well-doing." It is not all doing that will give us a title; it is a specific kind of effort: it is working "the work of God;" or that which he has assigned to us, and not the work which our fancy or imagination has pictured out. The first step in the work is, "to believe on him whom God hath sent," viz., Jesus: John vi. 29. Believing on him he becomes the source of that energy by which we labor; he becomes the pattern after which we are to labor, and by which our work is to be tested. This makes faith not that unmeaning and indefinite matter which seems to characterize much of the theology of the religionists of this age. Their faith is, in fact, a do-nothing faith: a faith which gives them license to live as they list, or according to their worldly desires. It includes little of daily self-denial and study, to possess the mind of Christ—walking as he also walked—who spent his life in doing good; and for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross—or death by crucifixion—despising the shame. A religion whose greatest study is to be respectable, and to make an appearance that shall divest it of reproach, is not the religion of Jesus the Messiah. His heart was set on doing good to men: not as the cant is—"to their souls;" but to men as men. Their present want and sufferings moved his compassionate heart, and invariably called forth his exertions for their relief. His life was spent in doing good. Let us, in like manner, labor to benefit men, by instructing them, and ministering to their necessities, both of body and mind. Only in this way can we be engaged in "well-doing" or doing the work God demands of us, and to which the proffered benefits are promised.

(2.) There must be a "continuance in well doing." It is not doing well now and then, or under some exciting sermon or missionary speech, when talent is enlisted to force out, as it were, action! No: a dead body may show signs of life under the action of a galvanic battery; but the life-principle must have a permanent existence in the man who works the work that God requires and will accept; and such a principle continues its life-motions in well-doing.

(3.) But there must be a "patient continuance in well-doing" to secure the proffered benefits. A disposition of mind that does not faint at discouragements, nor cease efforts because left to struggle alone. The idea conveyed by the original, is that of "remaining or staying behind when others have departed." It imports that there are discouragements—that most have passed on in their pursuits of profit, pleasure, or sensual gratification; and no longer heed the calls of injured or suffering humanity; then he who is seeking for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life, remains behind to do good; even tho' left of all, and though tempted with the strong current that has passed him, to join in their pursuits. Yea, though he may be ridiculed as being over-scrupulous, and too nice in his discriminations, he heeds the voice of God which falls on his ear above the foaming waves that rush by him, and hearing that voice remains behind the multitude to do the work of God—that he may be Christ like; and so attain the proffered glory. Worldly-minded professed christians, and sensualists may count him a fool, but he has learned, "if any man will be wise" he is to "become a fool that he may be wise." "Patience" characterises his course, and he has the approbation of God, which outweighs all the censures of men. Shortly will he be exalted to this promised inheritance he has so earnestly and perseveringly sought for.

We see that there is an ample motive set before us to induce any thoughtful and reflective mind to lead a Christ-like life. If this motive fails we can conceive no other which could be effectual. The exhaustless storehouse of God is opened before our minds, and we are permitted to gaze on glory, honor, immortality, and endless life, to arouse us to patient continuance in well-doing. "Glory" that is unending—"honor" that is "unfading"—incorruptibility, "immortality" never to be succeeded by corruption—a life to the utmost bound of which thought can never fly, because it is absolutely boundless! O, what a prize is here! Stop, poor, dying, care-worn, and disappointed man: stop, and contemplate this boon, which High Heaven offers for your acceptance! What are all the sensual enjoyments after which you now pant? What are all the honors and treasures of earth, which now so command your energies, compared with the glory honor, immortality, eternal life, we have endeavored to set before you on God's authority: Stop, poor disappointed worldling, stop, and think on these things.

Christian, does thy zeal and activity correspond with the amazing mercy and glorious prize set before thee? O, how much reason have we to humble ourselves, that such amazing benefits no more command our thoughts, our time, our talents, and our energies in doing the work of God; and now, especially, when the prize is manifestly so near. A few days or months, at most, and Christ will come "from heaven" to crown his followers with all these glorious benefits; and life's toils, trials, sufferings, and woes, will all be passed; and glory, honor, immortality, eternal life, be entered upon by you! O, how comforting, how invigorating the thought while we are yet struggling in the mighty conflict. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly," and may we "be found of thee in peace, without spot and blameless." Amen.

The Prophets' Inquiring.

"Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."—1 Pet. i. 10, 11.

"Of which salvation"—deliverance—the perfect redemption of the whole man at the coming of Christ in his glory—"the prophets have inquired and searched diligently"—they had some light on the subject, though it was but the dim dawning of the morning; but enough to make them most anxious to learn more; and hence applied their minds by fasting, study and prayer—for all these are implied in the expression—while they "prophesied"—foretold—"of the grace"—benefit, reward—"unto you," Most anxiously did they search for fuller discoveries of the glorious inheritance, such as are now made manifest by the resurrection and glorification of Jesus Christ. This they did, "searching"—inquiring, investigating—"what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ [some read—"of God:" others omit both, and read simply—"the Spirit] which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."

The patriarchs and prophets all looked forward to the coming of a promised seed. Without going further back we may begin with Abraham. He had promise of a peculiar seed, now known as Christ. The sufferings of that seed were prefigured to him by his own sufferings in "a horror of great darkness," and the affliction of his posterity in Egypt; Gen. 15: and in his call to offer up Isaac. In each of these cases there was a glory promised him to follow; viz., the deliverance, multiplying, and greatness to which his posterity should be advanced after their sufferings and afflictions. In all these things he was taught concerning the coming Christ, his sufferings and glory. He greatly desired—was transported with desire, to see Christ's day, so that he saw it, as we have suggested, and was glad, or rejoiced. See John viii. 56.

Passing over Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and Job, all of whom speak clearly in some form, of Shiloh, we come to David. He sees the sufferings, death and burial of Messiah: and he sees equally clear his resurrection, ascension into heaven, and the glory of his reign upon David's throne, when his enemies would be made his footstool. Isaiah saw clearly also the sufferings, death, and burial of Christ, and the glory to follow, as is distinctly seen in many chapters of his prophecy, of which we cannot speak particularly. Jeremiah is of like character; though, he, perhaps, dwells mostly on the glory to follow—or the reign of Christ. Ezekiel is also full of the same testimony. Daniel comes not behind any that had gone before. He testifies both of the sufferings and of the glory of Messiah the Prince with a clearness not to be mistaken.

The lesser prophets are not in the dark on these points. "Many prophets and righteous men"—said the Saviour to his disciples—"have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them." But they searched and inquired diligently about them, notwithstanding they were subject to the trial of their faith in not seeing and hearing all they desired. They died in hope of being partakers in "the glory that should follow"—or come after—"the sufferings of Christ." Not the hope of going to heaven at death; for, that would have been a glory before the sufferings of Christ: and "David is not ascended into the heavens"—mark that: Acts ii. 37. The hope and the faith to which those prophets and righteous men attained was, that, before the revealed glory, others would have clearer manifestations of these matters than they ever enjoyed; and that ultimately the sleeping saints would "awake from the dust of the earth," and Messiah, having received the throne of his father David, would reign over all the earth, his dominion being universal over all kindreds, tongues, and nations. Prior to such reign they foresaw a work of the Spirit, such as had never before been known; but in which they were to have no part.

The Absent Editor.

Our readers are prepared for the Editor's "absence" this week, according to announcement. And yet he is here, "present in spirit," though "absent in body." He is on the outside of our paper, calling us to the consideration of the "glory" and "honor" laid up for the faithful ones. He is on the inside, telling of that which stereotypes forever the glory and honor, even "immortality." And he leads off in the editorial columns with "eternal life, the climax of the whole." No unbiased spiritual mind can read these two articles—or one in two—without conviction of the truth. And O, how refreshing, elevating, inspiring, the calm yet resistless statement of "the means by which we may make the benefits our own"! And what a fitting conclusion of the whole commences with "O what a prize is here!" A prize indeed; how little do we appreciate its value! J. T. C.

Christian Politics.

Our active relation to human government is not only established by the Scriptures, but by the obvious laws of responsibility. The field of human duty is always measured by our opportunities.

"Who does the best his circumstance allows,
Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more."

And he who fails to make a proper use of the talents committed to his keeping is condemned by the same principle of duty defined by circumstance. Those who have small advantages are accounted worthy if they improve what they have, while the waster of exalted privileges is liable to a censure proportionate to the waste. The world of responsibility has but one law for all its inhabitants—Do what you can. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much."

In the light of these principles, what is our duty to the government under which we live? If the government were a despotic one little would be required of us—subjection, obedience, loyalty—a passive duty; but as it is a liberal one, we have an active relation to sustain. The more worthy the government, the more extensive our vantage ground—the greater our obligations. Our government is democratic: the people rule. Every man is interested in the general welfare, is responsible as one of the legislators. If the powers that be are ordained of God, then is our republican government ordained of God; and if our republican government is ordained of God, then its administrators are responsible to Him; and as the people are the government, and are the administrators thereof by means of agents appointed by them, therefore every citizen of the United States is under obligation to perform his whole duty in the premises. If his fellow-citizens call him to office, he is bound to perform his duty as unto God; if he is not called to office then he has a duty, a necessary duty, a solemn duty—the careful exercise of his suffrage. "Where no counsel is, the people fall: but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety." Christian politics is ordained of God.

In the performance of our political obligations, we are bound to support all that is good, and to oppose all that is evil; and the faithful opposition to evil is the most effective way of supporting the good. In politics, as in the church, we must set our faces as a flint against iniquity. "They that forsake the law praise the wicked; but such as keep the law contend with them." "He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemeth the just, even they both are abomination to Yahveh."

The first excellence of our government is its basis—freedom. "All men are equal" is the key-note of the Declaration of '76. To uphold and perpetuate this freedom was the intent of the men who framed the Constitution of the United States. The demon of slavery, with subtle ingenuity, managed to nullify these great principles for three-score years, and good men have wept before God at the sight. At length the appointed limit was was reached and Israel's God awoke to vengeance and reform. The red arm of judgment has been bared, the golden calf before which a nation bowed has been ground to powder, and its bitter ashes drunk to the dregs. "For there was not a house where there was not one dead." And now righteous counsels prevail, and the great corner-stone of the government is re-consecrated. Again we are free. It is the work of Christian politicians to protect and foster this freedom. Is the work not honorable, yea, God-like?

The Master says, "Occupy till I come." Will he not be well pleased to find us engaged in the practical exhibition of love to our neighbor? The Apostle Paul declares that if any fail to use his substance in aid of his needy relatives "he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." By parity of reasoning, he that refuses to do his part in upholding free institutions for himself, for his relations, for his fellow-men, is in the same condemnation. The duties are ours, woe to us if we turn our backs upon them! The enemies of God and religious liberty are numerous enough. It will be base recreancy if we refuse to neutralize their efforts. It is clearly evident that the atheists of the world are about to make a grand rally against Christ. But God will lift up a standard against them. "The Lamb shall overcome them; for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful." Rev. xvii. 14. Let us see to it that we are "faithful" in the use of our political opportunities for the right. The sceptre of our nationality is the ballot; how can we be "faithful" to our trust and not use it?

One great cause of political wickedness in the United States is the neglect of these sacred duties by Christians. We believe that there will be a reform in this particular. The wickedness of the ungodly has culminated in rebellion and assassination. The Christians of the nation have suffered too much in the great struggle against it not to see their future path. Hereafter, the thoughtful, prayerful, faithful child of God will throw all the influence he can command in the political, as in the moral scale, and God will smile upon his conduct. May our Lord at his coming find us thus engaged! J. T. C

"What has become of Booth?"

This is not our question. So thoroughly do we detest the memory of that miscreant that we would be glad never to mention his name again. The question occurred in the Sunday notices of our metropolitan papers, the 14th inst. It read thus: "What has become of Booth in the immortal world?" A Universalist minister discoursed on it. Like many other theological questions, it assumes the desired answer. If Booth is in the immortal world, it is useless to ask what has become of him. Immortality is the attribute of the Divine Nature only. "Who only hath immortality." 1 Tim. vi. 16. Immortality also involves spirituality, glory, power, eternal felicity. Rom. ii. 7. 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54, 43, 44. So that the question, scripturally stated, is "What has become of the spiritual, glorious, powerful, immortal, divine Booth?" The statement is almost blasphemous; what shall be said of the belief which necessitates it?

The proper question is, "Is Booth in the immortal world?" If so, how did he get there? He was not immortal here, or he could not have died. Reason and Nature unite in denying that he was naturally immortal; how then did he get into the immortal world? Will some one tell us? We know that it is supposed that the Bible teaches the immortality of the soul, but we have never seen the least evidence thereof. The Bible plainly limits immortality to the Divine Nature, and it is only by being "made partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pet. 1.) that we can get immortality. "They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead.... cannot die any more .... and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. On the other hand, the Bible unequivocally points out the doom of the ungodly. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. Popular theology antagonizes this. Instead of making "eternal life" a "gift of God," and that through Christ, this Universalist minister, supported not only by his own class, but by the banded orthodoxy of the day, publicly declares that one of the most God-defying scoundrels that ever lived, has through the innate prerogative of his own nature, escaped "the wages of sin" and is in the immortal world. Well may orthodox Prof. Mattison dispute with his Universalist opponent as to the condition of a man to whom they unite in giving the inheritance of the righteous.

"Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son, hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. He that testifieth these things saith, Surely, I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." J. T. C.

Popular Christianity vs. God's Word.

P. C. "Booth is in the immortal world."

God's word. "No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him." "The soul that sinneth it shall die." "All the wicked will God destroy." "These as natural brute beasts shall utterly perish in their own corruption."

The Emperor's Book.

"In Louis Napoleon's "Life of Julius Cæsar" the world have another phenomenon to study, in the more than romantic, the wholly unprecedented career of Louis Napoleon. It is a stroke of letters, no less audacious that his memorable coup d' etat, in politics, of the 2nd December 1851; whether destined to like success, it is not for us to predict. To promote his own interests, to perpetuate his dynasty, he lays imperial contribution upon the greatest names and events of antiquity, seizing and using them as his own, with a truly magnificent assurance, to fix himself immovably, it may be, in that brilliant position to which he has climbed, as his uncle's nephew, as the successor of Napoleon, as the Emperor of France. He writes an elaborate history of Rome—an elaborate biography of Cæsar—to justify Napoleon and Napoleon's empire, and himself and the re-establishment of that empire; in short, to demonstrate that Napoleon is the Julius Cæsar and himself the Augustus of modern times."

The foregoing, from the Examiner & Chronicle, is a fair statement of Louis Napoleon's object in writing the life of Julius Cæsar. This is a fresh item of circumstantial evidence in favor of the identification of the Napoleon Dynasty with the eighth-seventh head of the beast in Rev. xvii. As if to call the world's attention to this fulfilment of the prophecy, God has put it into the Emperor's heart to write this work. The "scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns" will soon be matured. The beast is Daniel's fourth kingdom (Dan. ii. 40–43) the Roman power. Its first five heads were Kings, Consuls, Decemvirs, Dictators, Tribunes: these all existed before the Apocalypse was written. "The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth [Rome]. And there are seven kings [or forms of government answering to to the seven heads]: five are fallen [just mentioned], and one is, [the Roman Emperorship], and the other is not yet come" [the Napoleon Dynasty].

The Roman Emperorship, or sixth head, continued in its western branch till 1806. In that year "a number of German Princes transferred their allegiance from Francis, Emperor of Germany, to Napoleon Bonaparte, Emperor of France, under whose protection they united themselves into the Confederation of the Rhine. This, in conjunction with his defeat at Austerlitz, induced the German emperor to adopt the sole title of 'Emperor of Austria,' and to renounce the title of 'Emperor of Germany and of the Holy Roman Empire." Sir. A. Alison, in his history of Europe, states that in 1806 the Emperor of Germany thus ceased to be the representative of the Empire of the Cæsars. Historians generally take the same view." Baxter's Louis Napoleon.

"Bonaparte was the actual Sovereign of Rome, and virtually the supreme head of most of the European monarchs when the sixth head fell.... He had been crowned Emperor of France by the Pope, in Paris, on Dec. 2, 1804; and was again crowned King of Italy and Rome, with the iron crown of Charlemagne, at Milan, on May 26, 1805, at which time the Roman States were formally annexed to France, and Rome was made the second city in his dominions, the title of the King of Rome being given to his heir-apparent. His dynasty was an entirely new head of the beast, being altogether different from any of the six preceding heads, in respect of its official title, for though in reality he occupied the position of Emperor of the Roman Empire, yet he did not, like the former German Emperors, adopt that title, but was crowned only as Emperor of France and King of Italy. If, for example, the King of Spain, instead of Bonaparte, had been supreme over Rome and a great part of the Roman Empire when the sixth head fell, then the Kingship of Spain would have become the seventh head." Baxter's Louis Napoleon.

The prophecy says of the seventh head,—"When he cometh, he must continue a short space." The Napoleon dynasty lasted but nine years from 1806, and came to an end at Waterloo, in 1815. It did not fall like the preceding six heads, or, as it were, die a natural death, but it was slain by the sword at Waterloo. This agrees with Rev. xiii. 3, where the same beast is brought to view. "And I saw one of his heads, as it were wounded to death." Rev. xiii. and xvii. agree in predicting the revivification of the slain head. "I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beast." "The beast that thou sawest was [1806 to 1815], faith, as one of the grand motives to a right course of action in our present state of trial. Men are amazingly influenced by what they call "a sense of honor;" and to occupy some important post of trust where their honor can be conspicuous, is the ambition of many minds. No sacrifice, no suffering, no effort is spared, if they have evidence of the possibility of attaining the desired eminence. What an honor, in their estimation, to be President of the United States, though the term of office is a few short years, and though they may die even before that short period terminates; while the honor proffered the followers of Christ, is an honor never pass to away, nor to be changed into other hands, or to cease by death, as we shall shortly see. Let us suppose that all the honor ever possessed by kings, emperors, governors, and presidents, could be concentrated on one man, and that his life could be prolonged to a period equal to the combined years that have been occupied by the entire race of Adam; even then in splendor and duration it would fall infinitely short of that one saint who shall become a king in the Empire of Jesus Christ! Let then the men of earth, or worldly men, seek their dying honors, which so soon fade away; the Christian has a "far more exceeding," even "an eternal weight of honor," reserved in store, soon to be conferred upon him, if found possessing the required characteristics. Here then is motive sufficient to stimulate the most desponding child of God. Take courage, brother: you are shortly to wear a kingly crown, and wear it for ever and ever. Lift up thy head, then, and faint not at any trials or sufferings you may be called to endure now.

3. "IMMORTALITY."—Greek, aphtharsian. "Incorruptibility:" a state opposed to our present state, which is corruptible, mortal, dying. This incorruptible state, proffered in our text, is essential to confirm us in the glory and honor previously noticed. Without this, that glory might fade away—that honor have an end. With this, they are both eternal.

The apostle here clearly shows that men are not possessed of immortality by creation, or birth; and he shows also that it is a favor to be conferred on those who pursue a defined course. He had stated in the previous chapter, that men "professing themselves wise, became fools, and changed the glory of an uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man," &c. Little did he then know of the folly which was to be developed in after times, by an attempt to make it appear that man is incorruptible, like God. Such "changing the truth of God into a lie," by which "the creature" is "worshipped and served more than the Creator," remained to be developed as the Man of Sin should begin to be manifested. Now, men affirm that they are "immortal"—incorruptible like God! True, they admit their bodies will die; but the essential man, they affirm, is "immortal, and can never die;" thus making "void the word of God through their tradition."

Man is not inherently immortal, or incorruptible, in whole or in part. Not one solitary text in the Bible affirms any such thing, but the reverse. Let that fact satisfy the believer in the Scriptures. Immortality is a gift, dependent on the will of the giver—God, and on the action of him who shall partake of it. Paul informs us when it will be conferred, and how; viz., "At the last trump," and by "the resurrection," for, saith he, "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible"—aphtharsian; the same word employed in our text. "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." 1 Cor. xv. 52–54. And this victory, which "God giveth," is "through our Lord Jesus Christ." Here is the true source of immortality, and the time when it will be attained. Let all remember this and lay aside that pride which possesses men's hearts from a fancied notion of immortality.

A Psalm for the Times.

We reproduce the eighty-third psalm, as appropriate not only to the defeated despots of the South, but of "all the nations that forget God," who will speedily be destroyed, and that without remedy. J. T. C.

"Keep not thou silence, O God: hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God. For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult: and they that hate thee have lifted up the head. They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thy hidden ones. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance. For they have consulted together with one consent: they are confederate against thee: the tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites; of Moab, and the Hagarenes; Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre; Assur also is joined with them: they have holpen the children of Lot. Do unto them as unto the Midianites; as to Sisera, as to Jabin at the brook of Kison; who perished at Endor: they became as dung for the earth. Make their nobles like Oreb and like Zeeb; yea, all their princes as Zebah and as Zalmunna: who said, let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession. O my God, make them like the chaff, as the stubble before the wind. As the fire burneth a wood, and as the flame setteth the mountains on fire, so persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm. Fill their faces with shame; that they may consider thy name, O YAHVEH. Let them be confounded and suddenly perish for ever; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish: that men may know that thou, whose name alone is YAHVEH, art the Most High over all the earth."

"THERE is not a man that gets through life so easily and so happily, as a truth-loving, truth-thinking, and truth-speaking Christian."

Eternal Life.

"God will render to every man according to his deeds: To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor, and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. ii. 6, 7.

"ETERNAL LIFE," zoeen aionion; "life eternal." This is the climax of the whole, and securing the whole. What corruptible, dying man, most of all needs, is life—an unending life. That is here promised to such as accept the conditions of the offered benefit.

We understand life here, in its most obvious sense, of conscious being—or that state of being appropriate to a sentient creature—a being that has the faculty of perception. To give to the term life a figurative sense without a shadow of reason, except that which originates in the traditions of men, who affirm that all men, irrespective of moral character, are in possession of existence that shall never end, we regard as a corruption of the word of God—a making void the testimony of the faithful and true Witness, who saith, "I am come that they might have life;" John x. 10; and who furthermore declares, "I am the way, the truth, and the life;" John xiv. 6; all of which is confirmed by John, who saith, "He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son: and this is the record that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son;" not in ourselves, as the theory of man's natural and essential immortality affirms it to be. "He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v. 11, 12.

To suppose that the inspired authors of the Bible almost uniformly speak in figurative language, when presenting the great crowning benefit of the work and mediation of the Son of God, is a position of fearful presumption, and an unfounded assumption. If the Holy Spirit, who inspired holy men to speak, had intended happiness, as the natural immortal soul theorists maintain, as the crowning blessing, it would have been equally easy to have used the terms makarioi, makarismos, as Paul does, Rom. iv. 6, 7, 8, 9; where these words are translated "blessed," and "blessedness," and have the proper signification of happy and happiness. But zoee is the emphatic term selected by the Holy Spirit as expressive of the glorious reward God has promised to those who obey him. This fact is sufficient to condemn forever, the perversion resorted to in keeping up the theory that man is an immortal being. Man is a dying, corruptible creature; God offers him eternal zoee, life; not merely makarismos—happiness; though having eternal life, he will be eternally happy—that follows as a matter of course.

Let learned and unlearned perverters of the testimony of the Spirit of God, cease making "God a liar," by saying he does not mean zoee, but makarismos, when he uniformly employs the former term in presenting the great climax of proffered benefits, for the encouragement of dying men, and to stimulate them to suffer, if need be, even unto death now, that they may attain unto zoee aionion—'life eternal.' Let the simplicity in which the Gospel approaches us, with its offered benefits, stand in all its purity and plainness, and darken no longer the counsel of God by perverting his words and making them void by traditions. Life—eternal life—to live forever—not die any more, is the grand theme with which the Gospel salutes our ears. Joyful sound to dying men. Let them hear it.

Having presented, in this and a previous article, the glorious cluster of benefits presented by the text, we proceed to notice, The means by which we may make the benefits our own.

This we shall do only so far as suggested by the text. That teaches us they are to be sought for; and informs us how to seek for them.

1. We must "seek for" them. Men do not seek for that which they have already in possession. Immortality, equally with the glory and honor, is in the future, and is to be attained only by those who seek for it. The idea of the original is—to acquire by labor, or work. It is not an idle wish, that will give us possession of those glorious benefits, but earnest application; which leads us to notice,

2. How we are to seek for them. (1.) By "well-doing." It is not all doing that will give us a title; it is a specific kind of effort: it is working "the work of God;" or that which he has assigned to us, and not the work which our fancy or imagination has pictured out. The first step in the work is, "to believe on him whom God hath sent," viz., Jesus: John vi. 29. Believing on him he becomes the source of that energy by which we labor; he becomes the pattern after which we are to labor, and by which our work is to be tested. This makes faith not that unmeaning and indefinite matter which seems to characterize much of the theology of the religionists of this age. Their faith is, in fact, a do-nothing faith: a faith which gives them license to live as they list, or according to their worldly desires. It includes little of daily self-denial and study, to possess the mind of Christ—walking as he also walked—who spent his life in doing good; and for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross—or death by crucifixion—despising the shame. A religion whose greatest study is to be respectable, and to make an appearance that shall divest it of reproach, is not the religion of Jesus the Messiah. His heart was set on doing good to men: not as the cant is—"to their souls;" but to men as men. Their present want and sufferings moved his compassionate heart, and invariably called forth his exertions for their relief. His life was spent in doing good. Let us, in like manner, labor to benefit men, by instructing them, and ministering to their necessities, both of body and mind. Only in this way can we be engaged in "well-doing" or doing the work God demands of us, and to which the proffered benefits are promised.

(2.) There must be a "continuance in well doing." It is not doing well now and then, or under some exciting sermon or missionary speech, when talent is enlisted to force out, as it were, action! No: a dead body may show signs of life under the action of a galvanic battery; but the life-principle must have a permanent existence in the man who works the work that God requires and will accept; and such a principle continues its life-motions in well-doing.

(3.) But there must be a "patient continuance in well-doing" to secure the proffered benefits. A disposition of mind that does not faint at discouragements, nor cease efforts because left to struggle alone. The idea conveyed by the original, is that of "remaining or staying behind when others have departed." It imports that there are discouragements—that most have passed on in their pursuits of profit, pleasure, or sensual gratification; and no longer heed the calls of injured or suffering humanity; then he who is seeking for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life, remains behind to do good; even tho' left of all, and though tempted with the strong current that has passed him, to join in their pursuits. Yea, though he may be ridiculed as being over-scrupulous, and too nice in his discriminations, he heeds the voice of God which falls on his ear above the foaming waves that rush by him, and hearing that voice remains behind the multitude to do the work of God—that he may be Christ like; and so attain the proffered glory. Worldly-minded professed christians, and sensualists may count him a fool, but he has learned, "if any man will be wise" he is to "become a fool that he may be wise." "Patience" characterises his course, and he has the approbation of God, which outweighs all the censures of men. Shortly will he be exalted to this promised inheritance he has so earnestly and perseveringly sought for.

We see that there is an ample motive set before us to induce any thoughtful and reflective mind to lead a Christ-like life. If this motive fails we can conceive no other which could be effectual. The exhaustless storehouse of God is opened before our minds, and we are permitted to gaze on glory, honor, immortality, and endless life, to arouse us to patient continuance in well-doing. "Glory" that is unending—"honor" that is "unfading"—incorruptibility, "immortality" never to be succeeded by corruption—a life to the utmost bound of which thought can never fly, because it is absolutely boundless! O, what a prize is here! Stop, poor, dying, care-worn, and disappointed man: stop, and contemplate this boon, which High Heaven offers for your acceptance! What are all the sensual enjoyments after which you now pant? What are all the honors and treasures of earth, which now so command your energies, compared with the glory honor, immortality, eternal life, we have endeavored to set before you on God's authority: Stop, poor disappointed worldling, stop, and think on these things.

Christian, does thy zeal and activity correspond with the amazing mercy and glorious prize set before thee? O, how much reason have we to humble ourselves, that such amazing benefits no more command our thoughts, our time, our talents, and our energies in doing the work of God; and now, especially, when the prize is manifestly so near. A few days or months, at most, and Christ will come "from heaven" to crown his followers with all these glorious benefits; and life's toils, trials, sufferings, and woes, will all be passed; and glory, honor, immortality, eternal life, be entered upon by you! O, how comforting, how invigorating the thought while we are yet struggling in the mighty conflict. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly," and may we "be found of thee in peace, without spot and blameless." Amen.

The Prophets' Inquiring.

"Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."—1 Pet. i. 10, 11.

"Of which salvation"—deliverance—the perfect redemption of the whole man at the coming of Christ in his glory—"the prophets have inquired and searched diligently"—they had some light on the subject, though it was but the dim dawning of the morning; but enough to make them most anxious to learn more; and hence applied their minds by fasting, study and prayer—for all these are implied in the expression—while they "prophesied"—foretold—"of the grace"—benefit, reward—"unto you." Most anxiously did they search for fuller discoveries of the glorious inheritance, such as are now made manifest by the resurrection and glorification of Jesus Christ. This they did, "searching"—inquiring, investigating—"what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ [some read—"of God:" others omit both, and read simply—"the Spirit] which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."

The patriarchs and prophets all looked forward to the coming of a promised seed. Without going further back we may begin with Abraham. He had promise of a peculiar seed, now known as Christ. The sufferings of that seed were prefigured to him by his own sufferings in "a horror of great darkness," and the affliction of his posterity in Egypt; Gen. 15: and in his call to offer up Isaac. In each of these cases there was a glory promised him to follow; viz., the deliverance, multiplying, and greatness to which his posterity should be advanced after their sufferings and afflictions. In all these things he was taught concerning the coming Christ, his sufferings and glory. He greatly desired—was transported with desire, to see Christ's day, so that he saw it, as we have suggested, and was glad, or rejoiced. See John viii. 56.

Passing over Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and Job, all of whom speak clearly in some form, of Shiloh, we come to David. He sees the sufferings, death and burial of Messiah: and he sees equally clear his resurrection, ascension into heaven, and the glory of his reign upon David's throne, when his enemies would be made his footstool. Isaiah saw clearly also the sufferings, death, and burial of Christ, and the glory to follow, as is distinctly seen in many chapters of his prophecy, of which we cannot speak particularly. Jeremiah is of like character; though, he, perhaps, dwells mostly on the glory to follow—or the reign of Christ. Ezekiel is also full of the same testimony. Daniel comes not behind any that had gone before. He testifies both of the sufferings and of the glory of Messiah the Prince with a clearness not to be mistaken.

The lesser prophets are not in the dark on these points. "Many prophets and righteous men"—said the Saviour to his disciples—"have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them." But they searched and inquired diligently about them, notwithstanding they were subject to the trial of their faith in not seeing and hearing all they desired. They died in hope of being partakers in "the glory that should follow"—or come after—"the sufferings of Christ." Not the hope of going to heaven at death; for, that would have been a glory before the sufferings of Christ: and "David is not ascended into the heavens"—mark that: Acts ii. 37. The hope and the faith to which those prophets and righteous men attained was, that, before the revealed glory, others would have clearer manifestations of these matters than they ever enjoyed; and that ultimately the sleeping saints would "awake from the dust of the earth," and Messiah, having received the throne of his father David, would reign over all the earth, his dominion being universal over all kindreds, tongues, and nations. Prior to such reign they foresaw a work of the Spirit, such as had never before been known; but in which they were to have no part.

The Absent Editor.

Our readers are prepared for the Editor's "absence" this week, according to announcement. And yet he is here, "present in spirit," though "absent in body." He is on the outside of our paper, calling us to the consideration of the "glory" and "honor" laid up for the faithful ones. He is on the inside, telling of that which stereotypes forever the glory and honor, even "immortality." And he leads off in the editorial columns with "eternal life, the climax of the whole." No unbiased spiritual mind can read these two articles—or one in two—without conviction of the truth. And O, how refreshing, elevating, inspiring, the calm yet resistless statement of "the means by which we may make the benefits our own"! And what a fitting conclusion of the whole commences with "O what a prize is here!" A prize indeed; how little do we appreciate its value! J. T. C.

Christian Politics.

Our active relation to human government is not only established by the Scriptures, but by the obvious laws of responsibility. The field of human duty is always measured by our opportunities.

"Who does the best his circumstance allows,
Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more."

And he who fails to make a proper use of the talents committed to his keeping is condemned by the same principle of duty defined by circumstance. Those who have small advantages are accounted worthy if they improve what they have, while the waster of exalted privileges is liable to a censure proportionate to the waste. The world of responsibility has but one law for all its inhabitants—Do what you can. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much."

In the light of these principles, what is our duty to the government under which we live? If the government were a despotic one little would be required of us—subjection, obedience, loyalty—a passive duty; but as it is a liberal one, we have an active relation to sustain. The more worthy the government, the more extensive our vantage ground—the greater our obligations. Our government is democratic: the people rule. Every man is interested in the general welfare, is responsible as one of the legislators. If the powers that be are ordained of God, then is our republican government ordained of God; and if our republican government is ordained of God, then its administrators are responsible to Him; and as the people are the government, and are the administrators thereof by means of agents appointed by them, therefore every citizen of the United States is under obligation to perform his whole duty in the premises. If his fellow-citizens call him to office, he is bound to perform his duty as unto God; if he is not called to office then he has a duty, a necessary duty, a solemn duty—the careful exercise of his suffrage. "Where no counsel is, the people fall: but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety." Christian politics is ordained of God.

In the performance of our political obligations, we are bound to support all that is good, and to oppose all that is evil; and the faithful opposition to evil is the most effective way of supporting the good. In politics, as in the church, we must set our faces as a flint against iniquity. "They that forsake the law praise the wicked; but such as keep the law contend with them." "He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemeth the just, even they both are abomination to YAHVEH."

The first excellence of our government is its basis—freedom. "All men are equal" is the key-note of the Declaration of '76. To uphold and perpetuate this freedom was the intent of the men who framed the Constitution of the United States. The demon of slavery, with subtle ingenuity, managed to nullify these great principles for three-score years, and good men have wept before God at the sight. At length the appointed limit was was reached and Israel's God awoke to vengeance and reform. The red arm of judgment has been bared, the golden calf before which a nation bowed has been ground to powder, and its bitter ashes drunk to the dregs. "For there was not a house where there was not one dead." And now righteous counsels prevail, and the great corner-stone of the government is re-consecrated. Again we are free. It is the work of Christian politicians to protect and foster this freedom. Is the work not honorable, yea, God-like?

The Master says, "Occupy till I come." Will he not be well pleased to find us engaged in the practical exhibition of love to our neighbor? The Apostle Paul declares that if any fail to use his substance in aid of his needy relatives "he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." By parity of reasoning, he that refuses to do his part in upholding free institutions for himself, for his relations, for his fellow-men, is in the same condemnation. The duties are ours, woe to us if we turn our backs upon them! The enemies of God and religious liberty are numerous enough. It will be base recreancy if we refuse to neutralize their efforts. It is clearly evident that the atheists of the world are about to make a grand rally against Christ. But God will lift up a standard against them. "The Lamb shall overcome them; for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful." Rev. xvii. 14. Let us see to it that we are "faithful" in the use of our political opportunities for the right. The sceptre of our nationality is the ballot; how can we be "faithful" to our trust and not use it?

One great cause of political wickedness in the United States is the neglect of these sacred duties by Christians. We believe that there will be a reform in this particular. The wickedness of the ungodly has culminated in rebellion and assassination. The Christians of the nation have suffered too much in the great struggle against it not to see their future path. Hereafter, the thoughtful, prayerful, faithful child of God will throw all the influence he can command in the political, as in the moral scale, and God will smile upon his conduct. May our Lord at his coming find us thus engaged! J. T. C.

"What has become of Booth?"

This is not our question. So thoroughly do we detest the memory of that misereant that we would be glad never to mention his name again. The question occurred in the Sunday notices of our metropolitan papers, the 14th inst. It read thus: "What has become of Booth in the immortal world?" A Universalist minister discoursed on it. Like many other theological questions, it assumes the desired answer. If Booth is in the immortal world, it is useless to ask what has become of him. Immortality is the attribute of the Divine Nature only. "Who only hath immortality." 1 Tim. vi. 16. Immortality also involves spirituality, glory, power, eternal felicity. Rom. ii. 7. 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54, 43, 44. So that the question, scripturally stated, is "What has become of the spiritual, glorious, powerful, immortal, divine Booth?" The statement is almost blasphemous; what shall be said of the belief which necessitates it?

The proper question is, "Is Booth in the immortal world?" If so, how did he get there? He was not immortal here, or he could not have died. Reason and Nature unite in denying that he was naturally immortal; how then did he get into the immortal world? Will some one tell us? We know that it is supposed that the Bible teaches the immortality of the soul, but we have never seen the least evidence thereof. The Bible plainly limits immortality to the Divine Nature, and it is only by being "made partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pet. 1.) that we can get immortality. "They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead.... cannot die any more .... and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. On the other hand, the Bible unequivocally points out the doom of the ungodly. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. Popular theology antagonizes this. Instead of making "eternal life" a "gift of God," and that through Christ, this Universalist minister, supported not only by his own class, but by the banded orthodoxy of the day, publicly declares that one of the most God-defying scoundrels that ever lived, has through the innate prerogative of his own nature, escaped "the wages of sin" and is in the immortal world. Well may orthodox Prof. Mattison dispute with his Universalist opponent as to the condition of a man to whom they unite in giving the inheritance of the righteous.

"Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son, hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. He that testifieth these things saith, Surely, I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." J. T. C.

Popular Christianity vs. God's Word.

P. C. "Booth is in the immortal world."

GOD'S WORD. "No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him." "The soul that sinneth it shall die." "All the wicked will God destroy." "These as natural brute beasts shall utterly perish in their own corruption."

The Emperor's Book.

"In Louis Napoleon's "Life of Julius Cæsar" the world have another phenomenon to study, in the more than romantic, the wholly unprecedented career of Louis Napoleon. It is a stroke of letters, no less audacious that his memorable coup d' etat, in politics, of the 2nd December 1851; whether destined to like success, it is not for us to predict. To promote his own interests, to perpetuate his dynasty, he lays imperial contribution upon the greatest names and events of antiquity, seizing and using them as his own, with a truly magnificent assurance, to fix himself immovably, it may be, in that brilliant position to which he has climbed, as his uncle's nephew, as the successor of Napoleon, as the Emperor of France. He writes an elaborate history of Rome—an elaborate biography of Cæsar—to justify Napoleon and Napoleon's empire, and himself and the re-establishment of that empire, in short, to demonstrate that Napoleon is the Julius Cæsar and himself the Augustus of modern times."

The foregoing, from the Examiner & Chronicle, is a fair statement of Louis Napoleon's object in writing the life of Julius Cæsar. This is a fresh item of circumstantial evidence in favor of the identification of the Napoleon Dynasty with the eighth-seventh head of the beast in Rev. xvii. As if to call the world's attention to this fulfilment of the prophecy, God has put it into the Emperor's heart to write this work. The "scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns" will soon be matured. The beast is Daniel's fourth kingdom (Dan ii. 40–43) the Roman power. Its first five heads were Kings, Consuls, Decemvirs, Dictators, Tribunes: these all existed before the Apocalypse was written. "The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth [Rome]. And there are seven kings [or forms of government answering to to the seven heads]: five are fallen [just mentioned], and one is, [the Roman Emperorship], and the other is not yet come" [the Napoleon Dynasty].

The Roman Emperorship, or sixth head, continued in its western branch till 1806. In that year "a number of German Princes transferred their allegiance from Francis, Emperor of Germany, to Napoleon Bonaparte, Emperor of France, under whose protection they united themselves into the Confederation of the Rhine. This, in conjunction with his defeat at Austerlitz, induced the German emperor to adopt the sole title of 'Emperor of Austria,' and to renounce the title of 'Emperor of Germany and of the Holy Roman Empire." Sir. A. Alison, in his history of Europe, states that in 1806 the Emperor of Germany thus ceased to be the representative of the Empire of the Cæsars. Historians generally take the same view." Baxter's Louis Napoleon

"Bonaparte was the actual Sovereign of Rome, and virtually the supreme head of most of the European monarchs when the sixth head fell.... He had been crowned Emperor of France by the Pope, in Paris, on Dec. 2, 1804; and was again crowned King of Italy and Rome, with the iron crown of Charlemagne, at Milan, on May 26, 1805, at which time the Roman States were formally annexed to France, and Rome was made the second city in his dominions, the title of the King of Rome being given to his heir-apparent. His dynasty was an entirely new head of the beast, being altogether different from any of the six preceding heads, in respect of its official title, for though in reality he occupied the position of Emperor of the Roman Empire, yet he did not, like the former German Emperors, adopt that title, but was crowned only as Emperor of France and King of Italy. If, for example, the King of Spain, instead of Bonaparte, had been supreme over Rome and a great part of the Roman Empire when the sixth head fell, then the Kingship of Spain would have become the seventh head." Baxter's Louis Napoleon.

The prophecy says of the seventh head,—"When he cometh, he must continue a short space." The Napoleon dynasty lasted but nine years from 1806, and came to an end at Waterloo, in 1815. It did not fall like the preceding six heads, or, as it were, die a natural death, but it was slain by the sword at Waterloo. This agrees with Rev. xiii. 3, where the same beast is brought to view. "And I saw one of his heads, as it were wounded to death." Rev. xiii. and xvii. agree in predicting the revivification of the slain head. "I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beast." "The beast that thou sawest was [1806 to 1815], faith, as one of the grand motives to a right course of action in our present state of trial. Men are amazingly influenced by what they call "a sense of honor;" and to occupy some important post of trust where their honor can be conspicuous, is the ambition of many minds. No sacrifice, no suffering, no effort is spared, if they have evidence of the possibility of attaining the desired eminence. What an honor, in their estimation, to be President of the United States, though the term of office is a few short years, and though they may die even before that short period terminates; while the honor proffered the followers of Christ, is an honor never pass to away, nor to be changed into other hands, or to cease by death, as we shall shortly see. Let us suppose that all the honor ever possessed by kings, emperors, governors, and presidents, could be concentrated on one man, and that his life could be prolonged to a period equal to the combined years that have been occupied by the entire race of Adam; even then in splendor and duration it would fall infinitely short of that one saint who shall become a king in the Empire of Jesus Christ! Let then the men of earth, or worldly men, seek their dying honors, which so soon fade away; the Christian has a "far more exceeding," even "an eternal weight of honor," reserved in store, soon to be conferred upon him, if found possessing the required characteristics. Here then is motive sufficient to stimulate the most desponding child of God. Take courage, brother: you are shortly to wear a kingly crown, and wear it for ever and ever. Lift up thy head, then, and faint not at any trials or sufferings you may be called to endure now.

3. "IMMORTALITY."—Greek, aphtharsian. "Incorruptibility:" a state opposed to our present state, which is corruptible, mortal, dying. This incorruptible state, proffered in our text, is essential to confirm us in the glory and honor previously noticed. Without this, that glory might fade away—that honor have an end. With this, they are both eternal.

The apostle here clearly shows that men are not possessed of immortality by creation, or birth; and he shows also that it is a favor to be conferred on those who pursue a defined course. He had stated in the previous chapter, that men "professing themselves wise, became fools, and changed the glory of an uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man," &c. Little did he then know of the folly which was to be developed in after times, by an attempt to make it appear that man is incorruptible, like God. Such "changing the truth of God into a lie," by which "the creature" is "worshipped and served more than the Creator," remained to be developed as the Man of Sin should begin to be manifested. Now, men affirm that they are "immortal"—incorruptible like God! True, they admit their bodies will die; but the essential man, they affirm, is "immortal, and can never die;" thus making "void the word of God through their tradition."

Man is not inherently immortal, or incorruptible, in whole or in part. Not one solitary text in the Bible affirms any such thing, but the reverse. Let that fact satisfy the believer in the Scriptures. Immortality is a gift, dependent on the will of the giver—God, and on the action of him who shall partake of it. Paul informs us when it will be conferred, and how; viz., "At the last trump," and by "the resurrection," for, saith he, "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible"—aphtharsian; the same word employed in our text. "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." 1 Cor. xv. 52–54. And this victory, which "God giveth," is "through our Lord Jesus Christ." Here is the true source of immortality, and the time when it will be attained. Let all remember this and lay aside that pride which possesses men's hearts from a fancied notion of immortality.

A Psalm for the Times.

We reproduce the eighty-third psalm, as appropriate not only to the defeated despots of the South, but of "all the nations that forget God," who will speedily be destroyed, and that without remedy. J. T. C.

"Keep not thou silence, O God: hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God. For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult: and they that hate thee have lifted up the head. They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thy hidden ones. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance. For they have consulted together with one consent: they are confederate against thee: the tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites; of Moab, and the Hagarenes; Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre; Assur also is joined with them: they have holpen the children of Lot. Do unto them as unto the Midianites; as to Sisera, as to Jabin, at the brook of Kison; who perished at Endor: they became as dung for the earth. Make their nobles like Oreb and like Zeeb; yea, all their princes as Zebah and as Zalmunna: who said, let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession. O my God, make them like the chaff, as the stubble before the wind. As the fire burneth a wood, and as the flame setteth the mountains on fire, so persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm. Fill their faces with shame; that they may consider thy name, O YAHVEH. Let them be confounded and suddenly perish for ever; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish: that men may know that thou, whose name alone is YAHVEH, art the Most High over all the earth."

"THERE is not a man that gets through life so easily and so happily, as a truth-loving, truth-thinking, and truth-speaking Christian."

Eternal Life.

"God will render to every man according to his deeds: To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor, and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. ii. 6, 7.

"ETERNAL LIFE," zoeen aionion: "life eternal." This is the climax of the whole, and securing the whole. What corruptible, dying man, most of all needs, is life—an unending life. That is here promised to such as accept the conditions of the offered benefit.

We understand life here, in its most obvious sense, of conscious being—or that state of being appropriate to a sentient creature—a being that has the faculty of perception. To give to the term life a figurative sense without a shadow of reason, except that which originates in the traditions of men, who affirm that all men, irrespective of moral character, are in possession of existence that shall never end, we regard as a corruption of the word of God—a making void the testimony of the faithful and true Witness, who saith, "I am come that they might have life;" John x. 10; and who furthermore declares, "I am the way, the truth, and the life;" John xiv. 6; all of which is confirmed by John, who saith, "He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son: and this is the record that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son;" not in ourselves, as the theory of man's natural and essential immortality affirms it to be. "He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v. 11, 12.

To suppose that the inspired authors of the Bible almost uniformly speak in figurative language, when presenting the great crowning benefit of the work and mediation of the Son of God, is a position of fearful presumption, and an unfounded assumption. If the Holy Spirit, who inspired holy men to speak, had intended happiness, as the natural immortal soul theorists maintain, as the crowning blessing, it would have been equally easy to have used the terms makarioi, makarismos, as Paul does, Rom. iv. 6, 7, 8, 9; where these words are translated "blessed," and "blessedness," and have the proper signification of happy and happiness. But zoee is the emphatic term selected by the Holy Spirit as expressive of the glorious reward God has promised to those who obey him. This fact is sufficient to condemn forever, the perversion resorted to in keeping up the theory that man is an immortal being. Man is a dying, corruptible creature; God offers him eternal zoee, life; not merely makarismos—happiness; though having eternal life, he will be eternally happy—that follows as a matter of course.

Let learned and unlearned perverters of the testimony of the Spirit of God, cease making "God a liar," by saying he does not mean zoee, but makarismos, when he uniformly employs the former term in presenting the great climax of proffered benefits, for the encouragement of dying men, and to stimulate them to suffer, if need be, even unto death now, that they may attain unto zoee aionion—'life eternal.' Let the simplicity in which the Gospel approaches us, with its offered benefits, stand in all its purity and plainness, and darken no longer the counsel of God by perverting his words and making them void by traditions. Life—eternal life—to live forever—not die any more, is the grand theme with which the Gospel salutes our ears. Joyful sound to dying men. Let them hear it.

Having presented, in this and a previous article, the glorious cluster of benefits presented by the text, we proceed to notice, The means by which we may make the benefits our own.

This we shall do only so far as suggested by the text. That teaches us they are to be sought for; and informs us how to seek for them.

1. We must "seek for" them. Men do not seek for that which they have already in possession. Immortality, equally with the glory and honor, is in the future, and is to be attained only by those who seek for it. The idea of the original is—to acquire by labor, or work. It is not an idle wish, that will give us possession of those glorious, benefits, but earnest application; which leads us to notice,

2. How we are to seek for them. (1.) By "well-doing." It is not all doing that will give us a title; it is a specific kind of effort: it is working "the work of God;" or that which he has assigned to us, and not the work which our fancy or imagination has pictured out. The first step in the work is, "to believe on him whom God hath sent," viz., Jesus: John vi. 29. Believing on him he becomes the source of that energy by which we labor; he becomes the pattern after which we are to labor, and by which our work is to be tested. This makes faith not that unmeaning and indefinite matter which seems to characterize much of the theology of the religionists of this age. Their faith is, in fact, a do-nothing faith: a faith which gives them license to live as they list, or according to their worldly desires. It includes little of daily self-denial and study, to possess the mind of Christ—walking as he also walked—who spent his life in doing good; and for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross—or death by crucifixion—despising the shame. A religion whose greatest study is to be respectable, and to make an appearance that shall divest it of reproach, is not the religion of Jesus the Messiah. His heart was set on doing good to men: not as the cant is—"to their souls;" but to men as men. Their present want and sufferings moved his compassionate heart, and invariably called forth his exertions for their relief. His life was spent in doing good. Let us, in like manner, labor to benefit men, by instructing them, and ministering to their necessities, both of body and mind. Only in this way can we be engaged in "well-doing" or doing the work God demands of us, and to which the proffered benefits are promised.

(2.) There must be a "continuance in well doing." It is not doing well now and then, or under some exciting sermon or missionary speech, when talent is enlisted to force out, as it were, action! No; a dead body may show signs of life under the action of a galvanic battery; but the life-principle must have a permanent existence in the man who works the work that God requires and will accept; and such a principle continues its life-motions in well-doing.

(3.) But there must be a "patient continuance in well-doing" to secure the proffered benefits. A disposition of mind that does not faint at discouragements, nor cease efforts because left to struggle alone. The idea conveyed by the original, is that of "remaining or staying behind when others have departed." It imports that there are discouragements—that most have passed on in their pursuits of profit, pleasure, or sensual gratification; and no longer heed the calls of injured or suffering humanity; then he who is seeking for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life, remains behind to do good; even tho' left of all, and though tempted with the strong current that has passed him, to join in their pursuits. Yea, though he may be ridiculed as being over-scrupulous, and too nice in his discriminations, he heeds the voice of God which falls on his ear above the foaming waves that rush by him, and hearing that voice remains behind the multitude to do the work of God—that he may be Christ like; and so attain the proffered glory. Worldly-minded professed christians, and sensualists may count him a fool, but he has learned, "if any man will be wise" he is to "become a fool that he may be wise." "Patience" characterises his course, and he has the approbation of God, which outweighs all the censures of men. Shortly will he be exalted to this promised inheritance he has so earnestly and perseveringly sought for.

We see that there is an ample motive set before us to induce any thoughtful and reflective mind to lead a Christ-like life. If this motive fails we can conceive no other which could be effectual. The exhaustless storehouse of God is opened before our minds, and we are permitted to gaze on glory, honor, immortality, and endless life, to arouse us to patient continuance in well-doing. "Glory" that is unending—"honor" that is "unfading"—incorruptibility, "immortality" never to be succeeded by corruption—a life to the utmost bound of which thought can never fly, because it is absolutely boundless! O, what a prize is here! Stop, poor, dying, care-worn, and disappointed man: stop, and contemplate this boon, which High Heaven offers for your acceptance! What are all the sensual enjoyments after which you now pant? What are all the honors and treasures of earth, which now so command your energies, compared with the glory honor, immortality, eternal life, we have endeavored to set before you on God's authority: Stop, poor disappointed worldling, stop, and think on these things.

Christian, does thy zeal and activity correspond with the amazing mercy and glorious prize set before thee? O, how much reason have we to humble ourselves, that such amazing benefits no more command our thoughts, our time, our talents, and our energies in doing the work of God; and now, especially, when the prize is manifestly so near. A few days or months, at most, and Christ will come "from heaven" to crown his followers with all these glorious benefits; and life's toils, trials, sufferings, and woes, will all be passed; and glory, honor, immortality, eternal life, be entered upon by you! O, how comforting, how invigorating the thought while we are yet struggling in the mighty conflict. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly," and may we "be found of thee in peace, without spot and blameless." Amen.

The Prophets' Inquiring.

"Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."—1 Pet. i. 10, 11.

"Of which salvation"—deliverance—the perfect redemption of the whole man at the coming of Christ in his glory—"the prophets have inquired and searched diligently"—they had some light on the subject, though it was but the dim dawning of the morning; but enough to make them most anxious to learn more; and hence applied their minds by fasting, study and prayer—for all these are implied in the expression—while they "prophesied"—foretold—"of the grace"—benefit, reward—"unto you." Most anxiously did they search for fuller discoveries of the glorious inheritance, such as are now made manifest by the resurrection and glorification of Jesus Christ. This they did, "searching"—inquiring, investigating—"what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ [some read—"of God:" others omit both, and read simply—"the Spirit] which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."

The patriarchs and prophets all looked forward to the coming of a promised seed. Without going further back we may begin with Abraham. He had promise of a peculiar seed, now known as Christ. The sufferings of that seed were prefigured to him by his own sufferings in "a horror of great darkness," and the affliction of his posterity in Egypt; Gen. 15: and in his call to offer up Isaac. In each of these cases there was a glory promised him to follow; viz., the deliverance, multiplying, and greatness to which his posterity should be advanced after their sufferings and afflictions. In all these things he was taught concerning the coming Christ, his sufferings and glory. He greatly desired—was transported with desire, to see Christ's day, so that he saw it, as we have suggested, and was glad, or rejoiced. See John viii. 56.

Passing over Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and Job, all of whom speak clearly in some form, of Shiloh, we come to David. He sees the sufferings, death and burial of Messiah: and he sees equally clear his resurrection, ascension into heaven, and the glory of his reign upon David's throne, when his enemies would be made his footstool. Isaiah saw clearly also the sufferings, death, and burial of Christ, and the glory to follow, as is distinctly seen in many chapters of his prophecy, of which we cannot speak particularly. Jeremiah is of like character; though, he, perhaps, dwells mostly on the glory to follow—or the reign of Christ. Ezekiel is also full of the same testimony. Daniel comes not behind any that had gone before. He testifies both of the sufferings and of the glory of Messiah the Prince with a clearness not to be mistaken.

The lesser prophets are not in the dark on these points. "Many prophets and righteous men"—said the Saviour to his disciples—"have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them." But they searched and inquired diligently about them, notwithstanding they were subject to the trial of their faith in not seeing and hearing all they desired. They died in hope of being partakers in "the glory that should follow"—or come after—"the sufferings of Christ." Not the hope of going to heaven at death; for, that would have been a glory before the sufferings of Christ: and "David is not ascended into the heavens"—mark that: Acts ii. 37. The hope and the faith to which those prophets and righteous men attained was, that, before the revealed glory, others would have clearer manifestations of these matters than they ever enjoyed; and that ultimately the sleeping saints would "awake from the dust of the earth," and Messiah, having received the throne of his father David, would reign over all the earth, his dominion being universal over all kindreds, tongues, and nations. Prior to such reign they foresaw a work of the Spirit, such as had never before been known; but in which they were to have no part.

The Absent Editor.

Our readers are prepared for the Editor's "absence" this week, according to announcement. And yet he is here, "present in spirit," though "absent in body." He is on the outside of our paper, calling us to the consideration of the "glory" and "honor" laid up for the faithful ones. He is on the inside, telling of that which stereotypes forever the glory and honor, even "immortality." And he leads off in the editorial columns with "eternal life, the climax of the whole." No unbiased spiritual mind can read these two articles—or one in two—without conviction of the truth. And O, how refreshing, elevating, inspiring, the calm yet resistless statement of "the means by which we may make the benefits our own"! And what a fitting conclusion of the whole commences with "O what a prize is here!" A prize indeed; how little do we appreciate its value! J. T. C.

Christian Politics.

Our active relation to human government is not only established by the Scriptures, but by the obvious laws of responsibility. The field of human duty is always measured by our opportunities.

"Who does the best his circumstance allows,
Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more."

And he who fails to make a proper use of the talents committed to his keeping is condemned by the same principle of duty defined by circumstance. Those who have small advantages are accounted worthy if they improve what they have, while the waster of exalted privileges is liable to a censure proportionate to the waste. The world of responsibility has but one law for all its inhabitants—Do what you can. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much."

In the light of these principles, what is our duty to the government under which we live? If the government were a despotic one little would be required of us—subjection, obedience, loyalty—a passive duty; but as it is a liberal one, we have an active relation to sustain. The more worthy the government, the more extensive our vantage ground—the greater our obligations. Our government is democratic: the people rule. Every man is interested in the general welfare, is responsible as one of the legislators. If the powers that be are ordained of God, then is our republican government ordained of God; and if our republican government is ordained of God, then its administrators are responsible to Him; and as the people are the government, and are the administrators thereof by means of agents appointed by them, therefore every citizen of the United States is under obligation to perform his whole duty in the premises. If his fellow-citizens call him to office, he is bound to perform his duty as unto God; if he is not called to office then he has a duty, a necessary duty, a solemn duty—the careful exercise of his suffrage. "Where no counsel is, the people fall: but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety." Christian politics is ordained of God.

In the performance of our political obligations, we are bound to support all that is good, and to oppose all that is evil; and the faithful opposition to evil is the most effective way of supporting the good. In politics, as in the church, we must set our faces as a flint against iniquity. "They that forsake the law praise the wicked; but such as keep the law contend with them." "He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemeth the just, even they both are abomination to YAHVEH."

The first excellence of our government is its basis—freedom. "All men are equal" is the key-note of the Declaration of '76. To uphold and perpetuate this freedom was the intent of the men who framed the Constitution of the United States. The demon of slavery, with subtle ingenuity, managed to nullify these great principles for three-score years, and good men have wept before God at the sight. At length the appointed limit was was reached and Israel's God awoke to vengeance and reform. The red arm of judgment has been bared, the golden calf before which a nation bowed has been ground to powder, and its bitter ashes drunk to the dregs. "For there was not a house where there was not one dead." And now righteous counsels prevail, and the great corner-stone of the government is re-consecrated. Again we are free. It is the work of Christian politicians to protect and foster this freedom. Is the work not honorable, yea, God-like?

The Master says, "Occupy till I come." Will he not be well pleased to find us engaged in the practical exhibition of love to our neighbor? The Apostle Paul declares that if any fail to use his substance in aid of his needy relatives "he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." By parity of reasoning, he that refuses to do his part in upholding free institutions for himself, for his relations, for his fellow-men, is in the same condemnation. The duties are ours, woe to us if we turn our backs upon them! The enemies of God and religious liberty are numerous enough. It will be base recreancy if we refuse to neutralize their efforts. It is clearly evident that the atheists of the world are about to make a grand rally against Christ. But God will lift up a standard against them. "The Lamb shall overcome them; for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful." Rev. xvii. 14. Let us see to it that we are "faithful" in the use of our political opportunities for the right. The sceptre of our nationality is the ballot; how can we be "faithful" to our trust and not use it?

One great cause of political wickedness in the United States is the neglect of these sacred duties by Christians. We believe that there will be a reform in this particular. The wickedness of the ungodly has culminated in rebellion and assassination. The Christians of the nation have suffered too much in the great struggle against it not to see their future path. Hereafter, the thoughtful, prayerful, faithful child of God will throw all the influence he can command in the political, as in the moral scale, and God will smile upon his conduct. May our Lord at his coming find us thus engaged! J. T. C.

"What has become of Booth?"

This is not our question. So thoroughly do we detest the memory of that miscreant that we would be glad never to mention his name again. The question occurred in the Sunday notices of our metropolitan papers, the 14th inst. It read thus: "What has become of Booth in the immortal world?" A Universalist minister discoursed on it. Like many other theological questions, it assumes the desired answer. If Booth is in the immortal world, it is useless to ask what has become of him. Immortality is the attribute of the Divine Nature only. "Who only hath immortality." 1 Tim. vi. 16. Immortality also involves spirituality, glory, power, eternal felicity. Rom. ii. 7. 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54, 43, 44. So that the question, scripturally stated, is "What has become of the spiritual, glorious, powerful, immortal, divine Booth?" The statement is almost blasphemous; what shall be said of the belief which necessitates it?

The proper question is, "Is Booth in the immortal world?" If so, how did he get there? He was not immortal here, or he could not have died. Reason and Nature unite in denying that he was naturally immortal; how then did he get into the immortal world? Will some one tell us? We know that it is supposed that the Bible teaches the immortality of the soul, but we have never seen the least evidence thereof. The Bible plainly limits immortality to the Divine Nature, and it is only by being "made partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pet. 1.) that we can get immortality. "They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead . . . . cannot die any more . . . . and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. On the other hand, the Bible unequivocally points out the doom of the ungodly. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. Popular theology antagonizes this. Instead of making "eternal life" a "gift of God," and that through Christ, this Universalist minister, supported not only by his own class, but by the banded orthodoxy of the day, publicly declares that one of the most God-defying scoundrels that ever lived, has through the innate prerogative of his own nature, escaped "the wages of sin" and is in the immortal world. Well may orthodox Prof. Mattison dispute with his Universalist opponent as to the condition of a man to whom they unite in giving the inheritance of the righteous.

"Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son, hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day He that testifieth these things saith, Surely, I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." J. T. C.

Popular Christianity vs. God's Word.

P. C. "Booth is in the immortal world."

GOD'S WORD. "No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him." "The soul that sinneth it shall die." "All the wicked will God destroy." "These as natural brute beasts shall utterly perish in their own corruption."

The Emperor's Book.

"In Louis Napoleon's "Life of Julius Cæsar" the world have another phenomenon to study, in the more than romantic, the wholly unprecedented career of Louis Napoleon. It is a stroke of letters, no less audacious that his memorable coup d' etat in politics, of the 2nd December 1851; whether destined to like success, it is not for us to predict To promote his own interests, to perpetuate his dynasty, he lays imperial contribution upon the greatest names and events of antiquity, seizing and using them as his own, with a truly magnificent assurance, to fix himself immovably, it may be, in that brilliant position to which he has climbed, as his uncle's nephew, as the successor of Napoleon, as the Emperor of France. He writes an elaborate history of Rome—an elaborate biography of Cæsar—to justify Napoleon and Napoleon's empire, and himself and the re-establishment of that empire in short, to demonstrate that Napoleon is the Julius Cæsar and himself the Augustus of modern times

The foregoing, from the Examiner & Chronicle, is a fair statement of Louis Napoleon's object in writing the life of Julius Cæsar This is a fresh item of circumstantial evidence in favor of the identification of the Napoleon Dynasty with the eighth-seventh head of the beast in Rev. xvii. As if to call the world's attention to this fulfilment of the prophecy, God has put it into the Emperor's heart to write this work. The "scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns" will soon be matured. The beast is Daniel's fourth kingdom (Dan ii. 40–43) the Roman power Its first five heads were Kings, Consuls, Decemvirs, Dictators, Tribunes: these all existed before the Apocalypse was written. "The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth [Rome]. And there are seven kings [or forms of government answering to the seven heads]: five are fallen [just mentioned], and one is, [the Roman Emperorship], and the other is not yet come" [the Napoleon Dynasty].

The Roman Emperorship, or sixth head continued in its western branch till 1806 In that year "a number of German Princes transferred their allegiance from Francis, Emperor of Germany, to Napoleon Bonaparte, Emperor of France, under whose protection they united themselves into the Confederation of the Rhine. This, in conjunction with his defeat at Austerlitz, induced the German emperor to adopt the sole title of 'Emperor of Austria,' and to renounce the title of 'Emperor of Germany and of the Holy Roman Empire." Sir. A. Alison, in his history of Europe, states that in 1806 the Emperor of Germany thus ceased to be the representative of the Empire of the Cæsars. Historians generally take the same view." Baxter's Louis Napoleon

"Bonaparte was the actual Sovereign of Rome, and virtually the supreme head of most of the European monarchs when the sixth head fell. . . . He had been crowned Emperor of France by the Pope, in Paris, on Dec. 2, 1804; and was again crowned King of Italy and Rome, with the iron crown of Charlemagne, at Milan, on May 26, 1805, at which time the Roman States were formally annexed to France, and Rome was made the second city in his dominions, the title of the King of Rome being given to his heir-apparent. His dynasty was an entirely new head of the beast, being altogether different from any of the six preceding heads, in respect of its official title, for though in reality he occupied the position of Emperor of the Roman Empire, yet he did not, like the former German Emperors, adopt that title, but was crowned only as Emperor of France and King of Italy. If, for example, the King of Spain, instead of Bonaparte, had been supreme over Rome and a great part of the Roman Empire when the sixth head fell, then the Kingship of Spain would have become the seventh head." Baxter's Louis Napoleon.

The prophecy says of the seventh head,—"When he cometh, he must continue a short space." The Napoleon dynasty lasted but nine years from 1806, and came to an end at Waterloo, in 1815. It did not fall like the preceding six heads, or, as it were, die a natural death, but it was slain by the sword at Waterloo. This agrees with Rev. xiii. 3, where the same beast is brought to view. "And I saw one of his heads, as it were wounded to death." Rev. xiii. and xvii. agree in predicting the revivification of the slain head. "I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beast." "The beast that thou sawest was [1806 to 1815], and is not [1815 to–]; and shall ascend out of the abyss, [abyssos—here the sea as in the sea as in Sept. of Gen. vii. 11] and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder.... when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is;" when Napoleon III. acquires all his uncle's power, and another confederation of European governments "give their power and strength unto the beast."

"Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast, for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred threescore and six." The Emperor Napoleon is the only man living whose position is described by the Apocalypse. Is he not the "man" who is to be numbered? He writes a book to call the world's attention to him as the successor and representative of the Cæsars. Why not consider his number? If he is the predicted one his name will amount to 666. The Emperor's name amounts to the fatal number in five different ways. The Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages used letters instead of Arabic figures as we do. We will take the name Louis Napoleon Bonaparte. The first is of Latin origin, hence it becomes Ludovicus. Two of these letters—o, s,—are ciphers; the rest in their order are numbered thus: 50, 5, 500, 5, 1, 100, 5—666. The second name is of Greek origin: translated into the dative case—To Napoleon, as it would stand in a dedicative inscription—it becomes Napoleonti—50, 1, 80, 70, 30, 5, 70, 50, 300, 10 666. The first two names may be thus written in Greek—Lois Napoleon—30, 70, 10, 200, 50, 1, 80, 70, 30, 5, 70, 50—666.

The facts concerning the third name are singular indeed. "Louis Napoleon has come forth out of Greece, because he derives his origin and is lineally descended from a Grecian family of high rank. One of his ancestors, David II., Emperor of Trebisonde, was rightful heir to the throne of Constantinople; but was put to death by Mahomed II.; his only surviving son, George Nicephor Comnene, fled to Mania in Peloponesus in 1476, and was made Protogeras over the community that was settled there. This official dignity was held by ten members of the Comnene family in succession, until 1675, when Constantine Comnene, the tenth protogeras, was induced from fear of being subjugated by the Turks, to emigrate from Mania to Italy with 3000 of his fellow-countrymen. Arriving in Genoa on Jan. 1, 1676, he attained from the Genoese Senate a grant of some tracts of land in Corsica, which were thenceforth colonized by him and his descendants. One of his sons, Calomeros Comnene, subsequently settled in Florence in Tuscany, and as the Greek word Calomeros (kalos meros) signifies in Italian buona parte [good part] the therefore adopted the name of Buonaparte." From thence the Napoleons. L. N. Kalonmeros figures thus: 30, 50, 20, 1, 30, 70, 50, 40, 5, 100, 70, 200—666. And the three names may be rendered into Hebrew to make the number. Thus in three languages, and in five ways, the name agrees with the number. Truly we live in a time of unparalleled interest. Let us be watchful, not rash; solemn, not fanatical; patient, not restless. Let us work while the days lasts, and wait with eager eyes for the King of glory! J. T. C.

"An Eternity of Torment."

We clip the following from the N. Y. Times of May 14, concerning Jeff. Davis.

By day and night, in heat and cold, in storm and calm, the avenging sword has been on his path. He can have known no hour of rest, no moment unbroken by alarm. He must have met the contempt and scorn, if not the direct betrayal, of his own people, for, with all their sins, the masses of the South have a high admiration for personal courage. With our troopers closing around him, the sea coast a hundred miles away, with every black face his sworn enemy, and scarcely a white one to be trusted, his past six weeks must have been an eternity of torment.

We are glad to see men waking up to a common sense view of the highly-wrought figures of the Apocalypse. "An eternity of torment" may be suffered in "six weeks" according to figurative language. As the hour draws near, yea, has already commenced, when the despots of earth—temporal and spiritual, go into torment, it is a relief to know that bad as they are there will be an end to their misery. While it lasts it may be incessant, its smoke may go up continually, but the individual victims must give way to the law of mortality, and perish. J. T. C.

Notes of Missionary Labor.

BY THOMAS W. SMITH.

I left home about noon on Friday 5th inst. Reached South Fork a little before sunset. Found that the notice of meeting for that night was not generally known; in consequence thereof but about 30 persons were at the meeting. Spoke on subject of the "Kingdom of God: its heirs and subjects." On Saturday evening spoke on same subject, reviewing the position of our opponents. On Saturday, at 11, preached on the "way of life," to show that life is obtainable only through Christ, and by virtue of a union with him. After meeting distributed Herald and tracts. Many were anxious to have them. I think several will subscribe for the Herald.

After meeting several of the neighbors called to see me, and enquire futher of these strange things. Among the party was a Mormon Elder, who said that he did not believe in inherent immortality or eternal misery, and held to the kingdom as I taught it, and also of the return of the Jews. However he thought the spirit maintained a consciousness, but did not receive the reward till Christ comes. I think he will soon embrace the whole truth. In the afternoon spoke on Rich Man and Lazarus; after which the Elder made some remarks, in a kind, christian spirit; to which I replied. Went home with one of the neighbors, and talked on the non-resurrection. Returned home the next day. The people were very desirous of more meetings, and were deeply interested in the truths presented. I think I shall return from Point Pleasant, next Sunday, and speak for them Sunday night. I have not been in a new field, for a long time, that I feel such an in as there. The prospects are very encouraging for good. Remember us in your prayers, and that much good may be done in the name of the Lord. I expect to go to Point Pleasant on the coming Saturday and Sunday.

From W. Patterson.

Geo. Storrs—My dear Brother:—I cannot express how much I am indebted to you, as a means under God in instructing me, and making me see the beauty and harmony of the glorious truths revealed in the word of God. In my youthful days I felt anxious to know and understand the teachings of the Bible. Some of its utterances seemed unreasonable, and some of them contradictory. When I listened to its expounders,—of whom I was taught to believe they were divinely appointed and commissioned, so that their utterances were to be relied on,—my difficulties increased. Sometimes the passage they were expounding did not mean what it said, but it meant a great many other things; how then could I learn the mysteries of the Bible? They would state doctrines that seemed inconsistent with one another, and admit their incongruity, but they were always ready with a trowel of untempered mortar to daub them together, saying, "What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder;" "What we know not now, we shall know hereafter." But when we learn that the Bible is a revelation from God in plain language, for the use and benefit of plain men, that it says what it means, and means what it says; and not a book of mysteries, and hidden meanings, for the privileged few, to be dealt out to the many according to their conceits, their conflicting creeds, and discordant opinions; how glorious it appears in the simplicity of language, the harmoniousness of its utterances, its adapation to the wants of man, and the glorious unfolding of the goodwill and love of God.

Your six sermons were the first to break the crust of prejudice engendered by early education in my mind. I was led to see if this "immortal soul" had no foundation in truth, that other doctrines must fall, as they were reared and built upon that foundation. Now I rejoice to know that Jesus Christ is "the way, the truth, and the Life" the only true hope of man. I rejoice to know that those who shall "be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead," shall be "raised in glory and honor," no more subject to death. Those who have despised the offered life in Christ "shall remain in the congregation of the dead."

Now Dear Brother, while I accord to you my obligations for your labors in the cause of truth, yet there is one question that I cannot yet see with you, and that is baptism. It seems to me as if you esteem water baptism as a carnal ordinance, especially as you esteem the baptism of the spirit the "essential baptism." Now I trust in your good nature to bear with me, while I make the supposition that Jesus Christ designed water baptism to be observed by his followers. If such be the case I see no passage to conflict with it. I admit "if we have not the Spirit of Christ we are none of his" even if we were immersed every day of our life. If the Spirit of Christ is not in us, I know of no principle that will ever quicken onr mortal bodies, and raise us to life in the glorious age to come. Paul to the Ephesians talks of the "one baptism:" if he has reference here to water baptism, I see nothing to conflict with the believer having the Spirit the gift of Jesus. Paul is exhorting the Ephesians to unity, to walk together in love, and to walk worthy of their profession, although they may differ in their gifts, they are only different members in one body, with one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all." Now it seems to me if Paul had meant the Spirit baptism here, he would not have alluded to the "one Spirit" in the preceding verse.

But it may be asked what good can water baptism do if it is not the essential baptism? Let us look at another ordinance in the Church, one you approve of observing, viz; The Lord's supper. The bread an emblem of Christ's broken body; the wine an emblem of his blood shed for the remission of sins. Now we read such a passage as this: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood ye have no life in you"; by which we understand that as the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin, it is through his blood alone we can have remission, and it is in Christ Jesus only we can have life; so that now we must live by faith on the Son of God. But why not object to the bread and wine, and say they can do us no good, as we do not believe in transubstantiation, it is not the essential body and blood of Christ. But is it the will of Jesus that we should show forth his love, in giving his body to be bruised, that it might become the "bread of life" to perishing mortals, and in shedding his life blood to be a fountain in which we can wash and be clean, by eating and drinking the bread and wine, emblems of his broken body and shed blood, until he come again? And may it not be his will, after we have been instructed, and feel the Lord hath been gracious to us, to make a profession of religion, in that significant highly emblematical ordinance of baptism, by that act professing our faith in the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. Jesus Christ set us an example that we should follow his steps. He went down into the water. He is the head; should the body not follow? The Apostles seem to have urged it as a duty. And if it is the will of Jesus that it should be an ordinance continued in the Church, those words so expressive may be full of meaning: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Yours in love and for the truth.

Delhi Del. Co, N. Y.

Remarks by J. T. C.—There are two baptisms spoken of in the gospel histories, one of water, the other of the Spirit. Our brother is correct in supposing that we "esteem water baptism as a carnal ordinance, and the baptism of the Spirit the essential baptism." The first cannot, in the nature of the case, be anything but "a carnal ordinance." In this we agree with the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, who says that "the first tabernacle was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers baptisms [baptismois] CARNAL ORDINANCES [literally, ordinances of the flesh], imposed until the time of amendment." Heb. ix. 9, 10.

Carnal ordinances being typical, passed away with the typical dispensation. They were excellent in their place, but they are sure to do more or less harm out of their place. They were "imposed until the time of amendment." As water baptism was one of these imposed ordinances, it passed away with the others at the time of amendment. A minister of the law was chosen to set forth this fact. John the Baptist, impersonating the Old Covenant, used the carnal ordinance of water-baptism—not as a symbol of death, burial, and resurrection, but —as a symbol of the great purifying and regenerating agency, the clear revelation of which was reserved for the Interpreter. John particularly contrasted his typical baptism with the real one. "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance, but he that cometh after me is greater than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit and fire." Again he said,—"Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away (or beareth) the sin of the world. This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man who is preferred before me for he was before me. And I knew him not; but that HE should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water.... He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he who baptizeth with the Holy Spirit." It is plain to us that the mission of John the Baptist ended at that moment when he "saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God." He passed away, and took with him the old dispensation, its forms, its ordinances. His work was merely carnal, therefore typical. The fact that water baptism was practiced thereafter no more proves its rights as a continued practice than the practice of circumcision by the Apostles proves its rights. God never enacted a law to do away with the latter any more than the former; he left it to the spiritual perceptions of his people. Paul was greatly opposed by the Petrine element of the Christian church for denying the essentiality of circumcision. If alive to day, he would say with regard to water baptism "Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel."

Our brother says of the "one baptism" in Eph. iv. 5: It seems to me if Paul had meant the Spirit baptism, he would not have alluded to the "one Spirit in the preceding verse." The apparent force of this remark disappears before examination. Paul's great theme is the Spirit. He would have the Ephesians "to keep the oneness of the Spirit in the bond of peace." The one Spirit would not exist in all without this bond, this encircling and uniting power of peace. To strengthen this idea of unity he points to the church as one body, permeated by one Spirit, having one common hope, one common Lord, one common faith, one common baptism, one God, one Father, this Heavenly Father being above all, through all, in all. It appears to us that the beauty of this would be marred by introducing a fleshly ordinance, no matter how much required as a duty. His theme is spiritual, the unity is spiritual, the body is spiritual, the bond is spiritual, the hope is spiritual, the Lord is spiritual, the faith is spiritual, the God-Father is spiritual. How did this unity begin? How was the one body created? Was it not by the Spirit? How was the one Lord recognized? "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Spirit." 1 Cor. xii. 3. How did the one faith begin? "No man can come to me except the Father who hath sent me draw him." John vi. 44. Is not this the work of the Spirit? How did the one God become the Father of all, through all, and in all? Was it not by the Spirit? Shall all these glorious "ones," the grand constellation of spiritual ideas, be mentioned, and the great cause of all be left unrecognized? What is needed to complete the hallowed circle? THE BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT—The "one" electric flash that created the flame of heavenly oneness. Shall we extinguish it with water?

Our brother's remarks about the Lord's Supper, as being affected by the argument, are pertinent, and deserve consideration. We prefer the following translation of the words of Jesus, quoted in conclusion: "Except a man be begotten of water even the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God."

From J. Lewis.

Otto, Ill., April 11, 1865.

Dear Brethren of the Herald of Life.—We deem it proper to make a statement touching the truth in the matter as to whether we need a Tent here in this large field of labor. We doubt not if Br. Storrs or any of the Preachers from the East had traveled and preached as many years, and through as many counties, and had as many disappointments from the strong opposition that exist from different sectarian Priests, you would not think for a moment that we did not need a Tent. Take for an example: Last Friday and Saturday evenings, and Sunday at 11 o'clock and evening, we had appointments which we traveled some ten or twelve miles to fulfil: had a full house on Friday; reminded the congregation of the meetings Saturday evening and Sunday at 11 o'clock. A "Class Leader" replied, there was to be preaching by Br. H. Saturday evening. We remarked, there were several of the members present when our appointment was given out, who also said, there was no appointment to clash with mine; but as we wish no contention we will preach Sunday at 11. Another speaks up, saying, Br. So-and-so preaches at that hour. We then said, we would preach at candle-light Another one said, Br. Such-an-one had sent an appointment for Sunday evening. This was all got up to hinder my preaching there: but it is only one out of many such. The truth is, we need a Tent, and think our friends will consider it in this light and lend a helping hand We feel confident great and lasting good would result from it; for in many places we have to preach in private houses, and other places can get no place. It is true Grove-meetings prove beneficial; but not half the number will come, and especially the women for fear of rain. All here think we must have a Tent: let all then help and it will come. Then we will have a house of our own, so that when any come here to preach they will not be shut out and deprived of a place in which to proclaim the truth.

In conclusion, I would say to such as owe me for money lent them to pay for the paper, and otherwise, they will confer a confer a favor on me by sending me the amount to Otto, Fulton Co., Ill.

Polly G. Pitts, Fredericksburg, Iowa, writes:—We have removed to this place, and expect to make it our home while we stay in this vale of tears, and we want our paper sent here. We shall ever try to do for the Herald what we can; we shall send some money soon; and we shall ever pray that God may prosper you and the church of the living God, which Christ has purchased with his own blood. May God grant that we may be joined to that body, who is the pillar and ground of the truth; whose head is immortal, whose foundation is the eternal and immutable word of the Lord. Oh, how comforting is the living hope that we shall see each other in the kingdom of God, and be like our divine Master. Yours in the hope of life when the Life giver comes.

Appointment in Illinois.

There will be a Grove-meeting in Fulton Co., near the house of Charles Brown, (generally called, Duram Brown) to commence June 16, and hold over the following Sunday. We hope to see our brethren and sisters from a distance, as well as those nigh at hand. The distance from the rail-roads and the Illinois river is scant seven miles; to wit, seven to Lewistown; seven to Havanna, seven west of Havanna, and seven south of Lewistown. Nine east of Astora. We invite all, without distinction; preachers, lay-members, and the community at large.

In behalf of the Brethren.

Chief Justice Chase in Charleston.

The political Sodom of America has lately witnessed strange scenes. It has seen Garrison, Beecher, and George Thompson,—than whom three men more thoroughly hated by the ruffian slave-drivers of the South could not be found,—walking its streets in peace. The very thought of such a thing five years ago would have stirred the city to its last particle of dust, and almost imparted a galvanic rattle to the bones of Calhoun. But the crowning marvel was reserved unto May 12th, when Salmon P. Chase, the revered champion of human rights, entered Zion's church, and addressed the multitude of loyal colored people. Yes, the Chief Justice of the United States, the successor of him who wickedly judged the negro as without any rights which the white man was bound to respect, went personally to the down-trodden scattered and peeled children of Africa and recanted the detestable proposition of Roger B. Taney by declaring the right of the negro to an equal status with the white. We give a few of his admirable remarks:

"And now has the colored man borne his proper share in this struggle? If anybody has made sacrifices, he has made them. If anybody has suffered extreme ill, he has suffered it. And the victory being won, and freedom and Union now secure, who has a better right than he to partake of the fruits of both? I think the peculiar and incontestible—and it is as a simple matter of justice and right that I have advocated it. I believe that the safety of the nation as well as of individuals, consists in doing justice. I believe in that scripture which says "he that walketh uprightly walketh surely." That man and that nation which links himself or itself with justice and truth and relies on the providence of Almighty God is sure to issue safely and triumphantly; it may be that great struggles have to be gone through, great sacrifices made, great trials endured, great martyrdoms suffered; this war has seen its multitudes of martyrs, the last and noblest of them struck down by the hand of an assassin a few days ago. Great martyrdoms may yet be endured; but through them all the right cause will come out in the end triumphant and sure, for a just God is on the throne and he wills it..... I think it is best for all men—white men and black men, and brown men, if you will make that distinction—that every man who is honest and every man who is of due age shall have the right of suffrage. Because, having it, it seems to me, he will more respect himself, do more work, do more productive labor, do more to increase the wealth of the community, be more respected by his fellowmen—and a society composed of such men is always great. Hence, I am in favor of all having the ballot; but if Government should think differently and circumstances delay its action, be calm, laborious, patient, faithful, I advise you. I think it also your duty. Ordinarily, the simple performance of duty is so blessed of God that men are better off in all respects in this world by it. But if these results do not attend the performance of duty; if a man carries in his heart the consciousness that he does what is right in the sight of God, or what he believes to be right, rendering to each his due, withholding his due from none, contributing as much as he can to the general happiness and general improvement, diffusing as much enjoyment as he can in the little sphere of which he is the center—then with that consciousness he may go through life as "happy as a king," though he may never be a king, and he may end it in felicity and go where there is an end to those controversies, because there is one God and one Father to whom, all His children are equal."

APPOINTMENTS.

S. W. Bishop will preach in

New Haven, Conn., Sunday, May 28.
Boston, Kast Hall, Sunday, June 4.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance Bible vs. Tradition, bound, to $1: in paper cover to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for post age, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the Herald of Life, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

Article I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

Note.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—Ed. of Her.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, it he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wher ever it leads—can come to any other conclusion tha the one arrived at in these combined works. amine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known talented clergyman, was selected by certain ters and others, in New England, to write a Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with nt egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Bible Examiner Tracts.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs.—Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs.—Price 5 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE WAR POWER.

[CONCLUDED FROM NO. 30.]

If any any one allege, in opposition to the existence and exercise of the "war power," that we are "to love" our "enemies," "to do good to them that hate us and despitefully use us and persecute us," the proper and only necessary answer has already been given, namely: that these precepts are intended only for the individual, and for the regulation of private and personal conduct and relations. If any one, however, insists that they are of national application, we aver that even on this false view of them they are not of the contended-for force. For a parent must love his child. No wickedness or insubordination of the child must be allowed to lessen or do away with that love. Yet the child must not, therefore, be suffered to be without restraint. Chastisement may become not merely a proof of love, but the absolute necessary result thereof. And so, if it be so that a government is to love its enemies, it may be absolutely nessary to use this strong arm in chastisement of the wicked and rebellious, in asserting its right and authority, and for the preventing of other nationalities from having the temptation to violate the benevolent and merciful principles of Christianity by trampling upon and robbing and harassing the unresisting and weak, and by acts of violence and rapine, and finally of successful invasion and conquest, absorbing the entire government and nation.

There is sometimes also quoted in opposition to our view the language of St. James: "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence of your lusts which war among your members?" Clearly, however, this refers not to governments, but may be referred to quarrelling and dissensions too often existent among Christian people, the members of the same "household of faith," and also, perhaps, to that inward conflict of which Christian men are cognizant in their own personal experience. Certain it is that the context and the entire connection forbid the supposition of an intention on the part of the apostle to utter any precept, or give an opinion in any way directed to the powers and operations of civil governments.

But it is said that the voice of prophecy declares that wars shall cease; that Christianity, the peaceable kingdom of "the Branch," shall at last so prevail that "the nations shall learn war no more;" that the "lion" of strife and violence shall ultimately "lie down with the lamb" of peace, and love; that they "shall not hurt nor destroy in all the "Holy Mountain" of the Lord. So let it be. To the prayer that this good time may soon come, "let all the people say Amen." O blessed day, speed thy coming! But, alas! that day is not yet. Bear witness, Sumter and Manassas, Antietam and Vicksburg, Richmond and Atlanta; ye burning cities and territories devastated, bereft wives and children orphaned; ye slaughtered tens of thousands, and ye heroic myriads in camp or field, with strong arm and valiant hearts waiting for the fray, with the crushing tramp of destiny driving rebellious hosts, and sweeping down upon the fair fields of the haughty Southron! Bear witness, O nation—in thy leniency despised, in thy forbearance accounted weak, in thy reluctancy deemed timid; insulted, robbed, hated—as, with thy gathering and marching hosts, thou proclaimest liberty to the bound and oppressed, peace and protection to the obedient and law-abiding, death to armed traitors! The ages are passing, and the day will come; but these respond that it is not yet.

And clearly the period of its coming is dependent upon the passing away of the causes which are provocative of wars, and which seem to make them necessary. When these have ceased, then and not till then can it rationally be expected that wars will cease. When the principles of the Gospel of Christ shall be accepted by every individual, and shall become the universally-obeyed rule of action, then violations of rights will no longer occur, and there will no longer exist the manifestations of inordinate and grasping evil ambition. But there is in all this no valid objection against war now, while confessedly disobedience to the principles of the Gospel is so widely prevalent, and mad ambition "like an untamed tiger wildly rages." It forms no objection to the present use of remedial agents, while human beings are liable to the attacks of disease, to say that there cometh a time when one shall not say to another, "I am sick." And so a time will come when righteousness will be everywhere prevalent; but this by no means precludes the present necessity of resisting "the devil," and of "fighting the good fight," but rather implies it, since it is thus that this prevalancy is to be secured. And so the fact that hereafter the lion and the lamb shall be on terms of intimacy does not necessitate the inference that it is now wrong for the lamb to be afraid of the lion, and to avoid him by every means in his power, but the intimacy shall hereafter take place by reason of a change wrought in the disposition of the lion. And so in the gook time predicted, wars shall have ceased, not because they are in themselves necessarily sinful, in the present condition of the nations, but because of the change which has taken place in and among men. The application of force, moreover, may be one of the great instrumentalities which Providence may employ for the removal of the causes of war, since by its waste and loss, its miseries and privations, its uncertainties and disappointments, men may be brought to reflection and repentance, and may be speedily convinced of the impolicy and folly, as well as the unrighteousness of all disobedience to the laws of God, and the beneficent and just principles of the Gospel of Christ. The more violently the storm rages, the sooner it is spent; the more swiftly the clouds are driven, in all the more brief time are they dissipated, and all the more quickly does the bright and peaceful sunshine irradiate earth....

The ground upon which this power rests is to be found in the simple proposition that governments are representative of a twofold authority. They are in their appropriate functions, and for the accomplishment of their true objects, representative on the one hand of "God as supreme." In this respect their position is somewhat analogous to that of a parent, who in a certain sense and to a limited extent is also representative of God, and may, therefore, with respect to his child, exercise an authority and perform acts, the right to do which is not in another, except as that other may have from him a delegated authority. Hence also governments are vested with the rights to do acts and exercise authority not proper to the individual man.

This fact, that "governments are representative of God," is, perhaps, too much overlooked. It is, indeed, by certain of "Humanitarians" and "Liberals," almost wholly kept out of sight; and the ignoring of it has doubtless been the occasion of much error and misconception in the views of men with respect to the rights and powers of the civil state. Christianity certainly teaches this doctrine. Thus its authoritative "word" declares that, "There is no power (exousia) but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. It (namely, exousia, the power) is the minister of God." (Rom. xiii. 1–4.) As "the minister (diakonos) of God," as "ordained of God," it (namely, the power, that is, the governmental authority) is representative of God, and in him and his law must be found the exemplar and the directory for the exercise of its functions as a ruling and governing authority, since he is the supreme ruler and lawgiver.

It is not of course intended by these passages or these statements to intimate that every civil government must have its organization specifically dictated as was that of Israel, and that every ruler must be personally designated by God as were Saul and David; for such demand and interpretation would have denied the legitimacy of every government on earth at the time when Paul wrote, and to illegitimate governments he could hardly have counseled submission. It is intended simply that every government having an actual and legitimate existence, has from God, under certain limitations and restrictions, delegated authority to do such acts as may be necessary to the maintenance of its powers and the performance of its appropriate functions as a government; he being, indeed, the chief and primary source whence emanate its rights....

This twofold representative character is, as we conceive, necessary to the legitimacy as well as the stability of every government, and this representative character absolutely requires that it should possess the war-making power. Without it, a government could have no power to make its authority respected and feared, and no means for the enforcing of its laws and the punishing of offenders, the disobedient, and the rebellious, and it could in no complete sense be a representative of God. Without power to do for its people what each individual in the absence of all government has a right to do for himself, namely, protect its subjects, individually and collectively, and secure to them their persons and possessions, and the enjoyment of their rights, privileges, and immunities, it could in no proper sort be the representative of the people; and yet we know that the performance of these functions is largely dependent upon the certainty which men have that the government "beareth not the sword in vain;" that underlying whatsoever of moral influence it may have, there is the power and right, as well as the will, to use the sword in sustaining its authority and vindicating its laws, and securing the integrity of its domain. Indeed, without this power in the present state of moral and intellectual culture of the human race, no government could long exist.

We say not what may be the case hereafter under a different and higher culture or status, and it matters not for our present purpose; for as we have seen, what may may be hereafter under a wholly different moral and mental status cannot be used as an argument against what may be needful in the present existent circumstaces, no more than the state of heavenly rest and peace, yet future to the believer, can be an argument to prove that he need not now in his militant pilgrimage "watch, fight, and pray." Let a nation lay aside this right; let it be understood that in no case, under no possible provocation, would it appeal to the military arm and venture the wager of either offensive or defensive battle, and its nationality must speedily disappear. It could not long be safe as against its own people or subjects. It might, perhaps, answer where every subject was a member of some religious organization, whose authority he recognized under the influence of religious and moral principle, and whose authority was identical or closely connected with the civil state, as in the partial instance of Pennsylvania; but if any one chose to throw from him the authority and sanctions of religion, and betake himself to violence under the strong temptations which non-resistance would offer, it does not appear how such a case could well be met. Hence a change in the character of its citizens did at length necessitate a change in the "peace platform" of Pennsylvania. Such a government would, indeed, be at the mercy of a bold, reckless, and lawless few. Any small and otherwise contemptible number could perpetually, and with comparative impunity, without damage to themselves, disturb, embroil, rob, and pillage an entire nation. Resistance to authority must in the nature of things become common. Government officers would become objects of mockery and contempt. It would be in such a country as in Canaan when there was "no king in Israel." Predatory, roving bands, anarchy, dismay, and confusion, must speedily bear destructive sway. Nor could it be safe against foreign nations.

It is possible that a nation of savages—where the desire for conquest and rule, ambition, is not so much the impelling or motive power as is that of revenge for injury and the desire for plunder—might abstain from warfare with a people situated as were the colonists under Penn, where they received pay for everything which they transferred to the colonists, and were not resisted in any demands which they made upon them; and such a people might, perhaps, for a time have exercised over them a civil government, at least while protected, by the military power of the nation of which they formed a part, from the aggression of nations existent and acting under the influence of our civilization; but the maintaining of this subordinate nationality must be attributed rather to their identification with a supreme government which had given incontestible proofs of its willingness to fight, and emphatic demonstrations of its power to defend its subjects from all outside or foreign aggressors. So long as there is ambition among men, so long as the the "lust of power" exists, so long as selfishness and passion may subordinate right and moral principle, in brief, so long as sin rules and reigns, so long will nations require this "war power," and find occasions for its rightful exercise.

Thus, then, a government recognizing Christianity as the religion of the land, and "Holy Scripture" as the real and ultimate rule of its proceedings, may rightfully wage a warfare for just cause. True, reason as well as Christianity demand that nations as well as individuals should "live peaceably with all men, as much as lieth in them," "if it be possible," since peace is the normal and proper condition of man, and wars should be a means to that end; but reason surely does not require that to secure peace and avoid war, every principle of right and justice shall be held in abeyance, or be abandoned, or be trampled under foot of the wicked and lawless; and that every species of indignity should be endured.

Christianity, by her own express hypothesis "if it be possible," more than intimates her conviction that after all our effort, peace with "all men" cannot be maintained, and by her own express limitation, "as much as lieth in you" may be supposed to suggest the employment of whatsoever means may lie within reach, not for purposes of vengeance—that she expressly forbids—but to secure peace and quietness, attaining thereto by moral dissuasives and influence such as it possesses, if thus it may be attained; but if not, by the use of such other means as may "lie in them," as may belong unto them. And it "lieth not" in any nation to be an unresisting and unassisting spectator of the invasion of the rights and the compulsory subjugation of those who rely upon it for protection and have committed themselves and their interests to its care. Compulsory process and military force, "as much as lieth in her," all she may possess, may be the only means whereby a stable peace can be obtained.

Thus when causeless, unjust, persistent, and otherwise invincible rebellion shall occur; a rebellion in the interest of barbarism, servitude, degradation, and sin, for the support and maintenance of the mother of harlots and abominations; shall it be admitted that Christianity, the religion of a true civilization, the assertor of human equality, the elevator, the antagonist of sin, the unyielding foe to whatsoever is abominable or maketh a lie, gives no power for its suppression, no authority to "crush it out," withholds its consent to the use of means which God and man place at its disposal applicable for this purpose, and trammels or renders futile thus the effort to defeat the nefarious designs of wicked or mistaken men? And shall we suppose that when nothing else will answer, where rebel hands have already begun the combat and struck the blow; where the power at the disposal of the government is in all human judgment sufficient, and the resources ample for the emergency and to compel the restoration of the peace which rebellion has disturbed, that Christian principle will not allow this power and these resources to be employed? This would be for God in his providence to put into our hands means to no purpose. This would be emphatically "to bear the sword in vain." We may not teach thus.

The necessities of our national existence to-day forbid such teaching. Patriotism demands that the sanctions of our holy religion shall be given to its combat for humanity, freedom, unity, and stable peace; and the strong and vigorous arms of its soldiery must not be chilled with doubts as to the religiousness of their vocation. Let us gratefully record, that the multitudes of heroic slain, whose blood flowed so freely on every battle-field of our present struggle, by their gallant uprising and their noble daring in grasping the weapons of the carnal warfare at their country's call, were not obeying commands which the nation might not rightfully issue by authority of the religion of our hope and joy. To these heroic dead—PEACE! If in the good "fight of faith," they have acquitted themselves with as much of manliness, if in other respects they have "warred as good a warfare," then for the wearing and wielding of the carnal weapon in this contest and their standing up for the mastery on these fields reddening with the blood of humanity's martyr's, under the call of their sorrowing country, the voice of "the man of sorrows" will utter no word of condemnation.

RECOVERY FROM THE EFFECTS OF WAR

Mill, in his Political Economy, speaks of the rapidity with which people recover from war, and explains the reason as follows:

"This perpetual consumption and reproduction of capital affords the explanation of what has so often excited wonder, the great rapidity with which countries recover from a state of devastation; the disappearance, in a short time, of all traces of the mischiefs done by earthquakes, floods, hurricanes, and the ravages of war. An enemy lays waste a country by fire and sword, and destroys or carries away nearly all the moveable wealth existing in it; all the inhabitants are ruined, and yet, in a few years after, everything is much as it was before. This vis medicatrix naturæ has been a subject of astonishment, or has been cited to exemplify the wonderful strength of the principle of saving, which can repair such enormous losses in such a brief interval. There is nothing at all wonderful in the matter. What the enemy have destroyed would have been destroyed in a little while by the inhabitants themselves; the wealth which they so rapidly reproduce would have needed to be reproduced, and would have been reproduced in any case, and, probably, in as short a time.

"Nothing is changed, except that, during the reproduction, they have not now the advantage of consuming what had been produced previously. The possibility of a rapid repair of their disasters mainly depends on whether the country has been depopulated. If its effective population have not been extirpated at the time, and are not starved afterwards, then, with the same skill and knowledge which they had before, with their land and its permanent improvements undestroyed, and the more durable buildings probably unimpared, or only partially injured, they have nearly all the requisites for their former amount of production. If there is as much of food left to them, or of valuables to buy food, as enables them by any amount of privation to remain alive and in a working condition, they will, in a short time, have raised as great a produce, and acquired collectively as great wealth and as great a capital as before, by the mere continuance of that ordinary amount of exertion which they are accustomed to employ in their occupations. Nor does this evince any strength in the principles of saving, in the popular sense of the term, since what takes place is not intentional abstinence, but involuntary privation."

LITTLE BALLARD'S PRAYER AND RESIGNATION.

A little boy by the name of Ballard lived in Trenton N. J. During the military excitement of 1861 he became intensely anxious to possess a drum. He did not want a toy, but a large one, similar to those used in the regular service. He had no money, and his father, if willing, had not the means to apply to such a purpose. What should he do? His eldest sister, Hattie, to whom he is accustomed to reveal all his plans and troubles, was applied to. He earnestly requested her to suggest something by which he could obtain his heart's desire. She thought a little and then said: Mr. W., in S. street, is a gentleman of wealth, and much interested in military matters; perhaps if you were to go to him and state your case, he might be induced to give you a drum.

The suggestion pleased him, and he immediately asked his sister to comb his hair and arrange his clothing, and he would set out upon his mission at once. While the preparations were going on, Ballard seemed to be engaged in deep thought. Suddenly, and with great earnestness, he said: "Hattie," will it be begging?" "It will be very much like it," she replied. "Well, then, said Ballard, "I won't go." So Hattie's project fell to the ground at once.

After a little thought Ballard exclaimed: "O Hattie, I'll tell you what I'll do. Mr. B., who is a member of our church, has all kinds of drums to sell; I'll go and tell him, if he will let me have one on trust, as soon as I get big enough to work I will earn the money and pay him for it.' This plan seemed plausible, and he became intensely interested, and anxious to carry it out at once. His sister finally told him she feared Mr. B. would be unwilling to wait so long for his money, and she thought he had better give that idea up, too. Again he was troubled, and said: "What shall I do? How shall I get a drum?"

After some time he asked with much earnestness, "O Hattie, shall I pray for one?" His sister replied "Do just as you think best. If you would like to pray about it I see no objections to your doing so." At last he jumped up and said: "Yes, I will go and pray about it, and if the Lord wants me to have one he can make somebody think about it, and they will send it to me; and if I do not get one in answer to my prayer, then it will not be right for me to fret or worry any more about it."

After speaking thus, he went to his room and remained about fifteen minutes. He came back and seemed perfectly satisfied. He said he had told the Lord all about it. "Yes, Hattie, I told the Lord how high and how large round I want it; what colors I would like to have; and I told him the name of a little boy down town who has one just what I want, and now," said he, "I am going to give it all up to the Lord."

He continued to pray thus three times a day for three weeks. He then came to his sister and said very seriously, "Hattie, I guess I wont pray any more about the drum." "Why not?" she asked. "Well" said he, "I don't think the Lord wants me to have one; I have been praying three weeks, and he don't send me any, and I don't think I'll pray any-more about it, for it seems so much like worrying mother for something she don't want me to have." He then gave up the matter entirely.

The fact of Ballard's having prayed for a drum reached the ears of a friend weeks after he had ceased his importunities, and he was moved at once to do something for the little fellow. He bought a drum marked it, and gave orders where to forward. When it was taken to Ballard's home on "New Year's day," he was out with his sister. His mother received it, and set it carefully away under the counter of the little trimming store kept by his sisters. When he came home his sister, Hattie, who knew all about it, told him to fold up his things and lay them nicely away under the counter. In doing this he touched the sticks, which were lying on the top of the drum, and as they fell to the floor arrested his attention.

"What is this?" he exclaimed, in great surprise; and then discovering the object for which he had so long prayed, sat down by its side so completely overcome with emotion that for some five minutes he could not speak a word. Then, with the drum in his hands, he sprang out into the middle of the floor, his eyes swimming in tears and under the influence of great excitement, he could only exclaim, "O, mother, mother!" After he had calmed down a little he said, "Well, it is just like him!"

"Just like who?" said Hattie.

"Just like the Lord," said Ballard. Then turning it all round, and looking it over and over, he said with a seriousness and solemnity that affected his sisters to tears, "It looks just like God."

After awhile he said, "Hatttie, who gave it to me?"

"Why," replied Hattie, "I thought you said it was just like God; didn't you mean that God gave it to you?"

"Yes," he replied, "but then God wouldn't come and give it to me himself; I mean, whose heart did he put it in, to give it to me?"

"Who do you suppose sent it?" said Hattie.

"Why, it seems just like Brother—," said Ballard.

"You are right," said she, "he proposed it, and one or two others helped the purchase."

"Well," said Ballard, very seriously, "it is just like Him." Then placing his two front fingers about two inches apart, he said, 'It is about this much higher and larger round than I prayed for, but it is just like what I wanted, though I was afraid to pray for one quite so large as this.'

WHAT MONEY CANNOT BUY.

Ellen's home in the city is one of luxury and beauty. There is everything to charm the eye and please the taste. Costly furniture, rare ornaments, valuable books, and fine paintings, bespeak the wealth of the owner. There also are happiness and peace, and the bright faces of children, without which no home seems complete.

Ellen has a bright, handsome face, but not a happy one, Rarely, if ever, does a smile light up its beauty, or any soft emotion give it that charm which makes even a homely face attractive. She soon wearies of every pleasure, and forgets to be grateful to those who have sacrificed their own comfort, perhaps, for her gratification. She would like to be in a continual state of excitement, and "What shall I do now?" is the frequent cry, demanding a change of programme. In the winter she wishes it was summer, and in the summer she longs to be back in the city. So you see it would be impossible to satisfy her; and I don't suppose it ever enters her head that she interferes with any one's comfort.

The same restless disposition shows itself in whatever she undertakes. Everything new has a speciel charm, and mats, breakfast shawls, and sofa cushions in endless variety are commenced. If you could open her bureau drawer you would form some idea of the fickleness of her fancy, and her disregard of order. "I hadn't patience to finish it," is the only excuse for such a waste of material.

If she was allowed to do just exactly as she liked, I have no doubt she would be extremely good-natured; and everybody else might be miserable, if they chose; it wouldn't surely be her fault.

You have seen the waves come in on a rocky shore; one, your eye rests on, comes rolling so gracefully along, when right in front of it rises a monstrous rock, against which it dashes, and seems to say: "Now, what did you get in my way for, when I was going along so nicely?"

Last summer Ellen's parents rented a cottage near the Sound, where the waters made continual music, and boating, fishing, and bathing added to the attractions of the place. Ellen enjoyed these aquatic sports until the novelty had worn off; then they were dull and stupid enough.

One day she wished to go on the Sound. The water was rough, and the boat in need of repair, so her mother would not give her consent.

I never saw Ellen cry; she was of too hard a nature for that, but of all disagreeable fits any mortal ever had, Ellen's "sulks" were the worst. The "blues" are bad enough but "ugly sulks" is, in my opinion, a far more dangerous disease. You might talk, and coax, and reason, with about as much effect on Ellen, as if you attempted to move the statue of Washington with a hand-spike.

"Such a horrid hole as this is!" said Ellen. "I wish I'd never come here. Nothing in the world to do! Always some opposition to all my plans!"

"But you know it is for your good, my child. Your mother surely knows what is best."

"It's just to be cross; she can't bear to see me happy. I shall just write to grandma," she said spitefully. "She wants me to pay her a visit, and she's always putting herself out to please me."

"Well, there it is, Ellen. Somebody has got to put herself out, and why shouldn't it be you as well as your grandmother, who is old and feeble?"

While Ellen was doing her best to be as provoking as possible, her mother would be troubling herself for fear she had been too severe. Her love for the child, and desire to give her pleasure, often caused her to be indulgent to her various whims and caprices. Her peculiar disposition needed peculiar management, and it was frequently the cause of serious discussion whether the right course was being pursued or not.

You will think, as you read this, that there was no excuse for Ellen's conduct. A beautiful home, indulgent parents, loving brothers and sisters—what more could she want in order to be cheerful and happy?

Try to cultivate what she did not yet possess—a cheerful and contented disposition—for all the money in the world cannot buy it, and without it you are poor indeed.—Selected.

PRAYER HEARD.

There is the hearing of prayer, often spoken of in Scripture; and many vex themselves about it, alleging that they know nothing of it experimentally. I grant there is a favorable hearing of prayer; but we must remember it is twofold. Either—1. It is such as a man is simply to believe by way of argument on Scriptural grounds; if I have fled unto Christ, and do approach to God in him, pray according to his will, not regarding iniquity in my heart, exercising faith about the thing I pray for absolutely or conditionally, according to the nature of the thing and promises concerning it: I am obliged to believe that God heareth my prayer, and will give what is good, according to these Scriptures: "Whatsoever ye ask in my name, I will do it."—"This is our confidence, that whatsoever we ask according to his will, he heareth us."—"Believe that ye receive, and ye shall have what ye desire."—"If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear:" then if I regard not iniquity, I may believe that he doth hear me. Or—2. A man doth sensibly perceive that God doth hear his prayer: it is made out to his heart, without any syllogistical deduction. Such a hearing of prayer got Hannah: "Her countenance was no more sad." Surely the Lord did breathe upon her faith, and made her believe that she was heard: she could not make it out by any argument; for she had not grounds upon which to build the premises of the argument, according to Scripture, in that particular: God did stamp it some way upon her heart sensibly, and so made her believe it. This is but rarely granted, especially in cases clearly deducible in Scripture; therefore people are much to be satisfied in exercising their faith about the other, and ought to leave it to God to give of this latter what he pleaseth. A man's gracious state should not be brought into debate upon the amount of such hearing of prayer.—Wm. Guthrie.

THE latest news from Caprera states that General Garibaldi has perfectly recovered from his wound, and walks freely without limping, though he still uses a cane. The general is surrounded by the members of his family.

The Herald of Life

AND OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

TERMS:—Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar FOR SIX MONTHS; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York city, 48 cents additional. Persons sending five new subscribers, with advance pay, will be entitled to a sixth copy for their services.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, any where out of the United States. Anywhere in the United States, the subscriber may just as well pay the postage at his own Post Office, as to send the amount to us, and subject us to the trouble of doing it here. It is far less trouble to the subscriber than to us, and we must absolutely decline doing it for any within the States. Let this be remembered.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed—

"GEO. STORRS,
BOX 4658,
NEW YORK."

Where a letter contains business matter and matter for the paper, or for private use, let it be so written that we can separate the two without infringing on either. This is essential to the business of the Office, and let none neglect it.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written with care, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also, in ordering papers sent, the name of the Post Office, County, and State must be given, and written plainly; and if change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE WAR POWER.

If any any one allege, in opposition to the existence and exercise of the "war power," that we are "to love" our "enemies," "to do good to them that hate us and despitefully use us and persecute us," the proper and only necessary answer has already been given, namely: that these precepts are intended only for the individual, and for the regulation of private and personal conduct and relations. If any one, however, insists that they are of national application, we aver that even on this false view of them they are not of the contended-for force. For a parent must love his child. No wickedness or insubordination of the child must be allowed to lessen or do away with that love. Yet the child must not, therefore, be suffered to be without restraint. Chastisement may become not merely a proof of love, but the absolute necessary result thereof. And so, if it be so that a government is to love its enemies, it may be absolutely nessary to use this strong arm in chastisement of the wicked and rebellious, in asserting its right and authority, and for the preventing of other nationalities from having the temptation to violate the benevolent and merciful principles of Christianity by trampling upon and robbing and harassing the unresisting and weak, and by acts of violence and rapine, and finally of successful invasion and conquest, absorbing the entire government and nation.

There is sometimes also quoted in opposition to our view the language of St. James: "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence of your lusts which war among your members?" Clearly, however, this refers not to governments, but may be referred to quarrelling and dissensions too often existent among Christian people, the members of the same "household of faith," and also, perhaps, to that inward conflict of which Christian men are cognizant in their own personal experience. Certain it is that the context and the entire connection forbid the supposition of an intention on the part of the apostle to utter any precept, or give an opinion in any way directed to the powers and operations of civil governments.

But it is said that the voice of prophecy declares that wars shall cease; that Christianity, the peaceable kingdom of "the Branch," shall at last so prevail that "the nations shall learn war no more;" that the "lion" of strife and violence shall ultimately "lie down with the lamb" of peace, and love; that they "shall not hurt nor destroy in all the "Holy Mountain" of the Lord. So let it be. To the prayer that this good time may soon come, "let all the people say Amen." O blessed day, speed thy coming! But, alas! that day is not yet. Bear witness, Sumter and Manassas, Antietam and Vicksburg, Richmond and Atlanta; ye burning cities and territories devastated, bereft wives and children orphaned; ye slaughtered tens of thousands, and ye heroic myriads in camp or field, with strong arm and valiant hearts waiting for the fray, with the crushing tramp of destiny driving rebellious hosts, and sweeping down upon the fair fields of the haughty Southron! Bear witness, O nation—in thy leniency despised, in thy forbearance accounted weak, in thy reluctancy deemed timid; insulted, robbed, hated—as, with thy gathering and marching hosts, thou proclaimest liberty to the bound and oppressed, peace and protection to the obedient and law-abiding, death to armed traitors! The ages are passing, and the day will come; but these respond that it is not yet.

And clearly the period of its coming is dependent upon the passing away of the causes which are provocative of wars, and which seem to make them necessary. When these have ceased, then and not till then can it rationally be expected that wars will cease. When the principles of the Gospel of Christ shall be accepted by every individual, and shall become the universally-obeyed rule of action, then violations of rights will no longer occur, and there will no longer exist the manifestations of inordinate and grasping evil ambition. But there is in all this no valid objection against war now, while confessedly disobedience to the principles of the Gospel is so widely prevalent, and mad ambition "like an untamed tiger wildly rages." It forms no objection to the present use of remedial agents, while human beings are liable to the attacks of disease, to say that there cometh a time when one shall not say to another, "I am sick." And so a time will come when righteousness will be everywhere prevalent; but this by no means precludes the present necessity of resisting "the devil," and of "fighting the good fight," but rather implies it, since it is thus that this prevalancy is to be secured. And so the fact that hereafter the lion and the lamb shall be on terms of intimacy does not necessitate the inference that it is now wrong for the lamb to be afraid of the lion, and to avoid him by every means in his power, but the intimacy shall hereafter take place by reason of a change wrought in the disposition of the lion. And so in the gook time predicted wars shall have ceased, not because they are in themselves necessarily sinful, in the present condition of the nations, but because of the change which has taken place in and among men. The application of force, moreover, may be one of the great instrumentalities which Providence may employ for the removal of the causes of war, since by its waste and loss, its miseries and privations, its uncertainties and disappointments, men may be brought to reflection and repentance, and may be speedily convinced of the impolicy and folly, as well as the unrighteousness of all disobedience to the laws of God, and the beneficent and just principles of the Gospel of Christ. The more violently the storm rages, the sooner it is spent; the more swiftly the clouds are driven, in all the more brief time are they dissipated, and all the more quickly does the bright and peaceful sunshine irradiate earth. . . .

The ground upon which this power rests is to be found in the simple proposition that governments are representative of a twofold authority. They are in their appropriate functions, and for the accomplishment of their true objects, representative on the one hand of "God as supreme." In this respect their position is somewhat analogous to that of a parent, who in a certain sense and to a limited extent is also representative of God, and may, therefore, with respect to his child, exercise an authority and perform acts, the right to do which is not in another, except as that other may have from him a delegated authority. Hence also governments are vested with the rights to do acts and exercise authority not proper to the individual man.

This fact, that "governments are representative of God," is, perhaps, too much overlooked. It is, indeed, by certain of "Humanitarians" and "Liberals," almost wholly kept out of sight; and the ignoring of it has doubtless been the occasion of much error and misconception in the views of men with respect to the rights and powers of the civil state. Christianity certainly teaches this doctrine. Thus its authoritative "word" declares that, "There is no power (exousia) but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. It (namely, exousia, the power) is the minister of God." (Rom. xiii. 1–4.) As "the minister (diakonos) of God," as "ordained of God," it (namely, the power, that is, the governmental authority) is representative of God, and in him and his law must be found the exemplar and the directory for the exercise of its functions as a ruling and governing authority, since he is the supreme ruler and lawgiver.

It is not of course intended by these passages or these statements to intimate that every civil government must have its organization specifically dictated as was that of Israel, and that every ruler must be personally designated by God as were Saul and David; for such demand and interpretation would have denied the legitimacy of every government on earth at the time when Paul wrote, and to illegitimate governments he could hardly have counseled submission. It is intended simply that every government having an actual and legitimate existence, has from God, under certain limitations and restrictions, delegated authority to do such acts as may be necessary to the maintenance of its powers and the performance of its appropriate functions as a government; he being, indeed, the chief and primary source whence emanate its rights. . . .

This twofold representative character is, as we conceive, necessary to the legitimacy as well as the stability of every government, and this representative character absolutely requires that it should possess the war-making power. Without it, a government could have no power to make its authority respected and feared, and no means for the enforcing of its laws and the punishing of offenders, the disobedient, and the rebellious, and it could in no complete sense be a representative of God. Without power to do for its people what each individual in the absence of all government has a right to do for himself, namely, protect its subjects, individually and collectively, and secure to them their persons and possessions, and the enjoyment of their rights, privileges, and immunities, it could in no proper sort be the representative of the people; and yet we know that the performance of these functions is largely dependent upon the certainty which men have that the government "beareth not the sword in vain;" that underlying whatsoever of moral influence it may have, there is the power and right, as well as the will, to use the sword in sustaining its authority and vindicating its laws, and securing the integrity of its domain. Indeed, without this power in the present state of moral and intellectual culture of the human race, no government could long exist.

We say not what may be the case hereafter under a different and higher culture or status, and it matters not for our present purpose; for as we have seen, what may may be hereafter under a wholly different moral and mental status cannot be used as an argument against what may be needful in the present existent circumstaces, no more than the state of heavenly rest and peace, yet future to the believer, can be an argument to prove that he need not now in his militant pilgrimage "watch, fight, and pray." Let a nation lay aside this right; let it be understood that in no case, under no possible provocation, would it appeal to the military arm and venture the wager of either offensive or defensive battle, and its nationality must speedily disappear. It could not long be safe as against its own people or subjects. It might, perhaps, answer where every subject was a member of some religious organization, whose authority he recognized under the influence of religious and moral principle, and whose authority was identical or closely connected with the civil state, as in the partial instance of Pennsylvania; but if any one chose to throw from him the authority and sanctions of religion, and betake himself to violence under the strong temptations which non-resistance would offer, it does not appear how such a case could well be met. Hence a change in the character of its citizens did at length necessitate a change in the "peace platform" of Pennsylvania. Such a government would, indeed, be at the mercy of a bold, reckless, and lawless few. Any small and otherwise contemptible number could perpetually, and with comparative impunity, without damage to themselves, disturb, embroil, rob, and pillage an entire nation. Resistance to authority must in the nature of things become common. Government officers would become objects of mockery and contempt. It would be in such a country as in Canaan when there was "no king in Israel." Predatory, roving bands, anarchy, dismay, and confusion, must speedily bear destructive sway. Nor could it be safe against foreign nations.

It is possible that a nation of savages—where the desire for conquest and rule, ambition, is not so much the impelling or motive power as is that of revenge for injury and the desire for plunder—might abstain from warfare with a people situated as were the colonists under Penn, where they received pay for everything which they transferred to the colonists, and were not resisted in any demands which they made upon them; and such a people might, perhaps, for a time have exercised over them a civil government, at least while protected, by the military power of the nation of which they formed a part, from the aggression of nations existent and acting under the influence of our civilization; but the maintaining of this subordinate nationality must be attributed rather to their identification with a supreme government which had given incontestible proofs of its willingness to fight, and emphatic demonstrations of its power to defend its subjects from all outside or foreign aggressors. So long as there is ambition among men, so long as the the "lust of power" exists, so long as selfishness and passion may subordinate right and moral principle, in brief, so long as sin rules and reigns, so long will nations require this "war power," and find occasions for its rightful exercise.

Thus, then, a government recognizing Christianity as the religion of the land, and "Holy Scripture" as the real and ultimate rule of its proceedings, may rightfully wage a warfare for just cause. True, reason as well as Christianity demand that nations as well as individuals should "live peaceably with all men, as much as lieth in them," "if it be possible," since peace is the normal and proper condition of man, and wars should be a means to that end; but reason surely does not require that to secure peace and avoid war, every principle of right and justice shall be held in abeyance, or be abandoned, or be trampled under foot of the wicked and lawless; and that every species of indignity should be endured.

Christianity, by her own express hypothesis "if it be possible," more than intimates her conviction that after all our effort, peace with "all men" cannot be maintained, and by her own express limitation, "as much as lieth in you" may be supposed to suggest the employment of whatsoever means may lie within reach, not for purposes of vengeance—that she expressly forbids—but to secure peace and quietness, attaining thereto by moral dissuasives and influence such as it possesses, if thus it may be attained; but if not, by the use of such other means as may "lie in them," as may belong unto them. And it "lieth not" in any nation to be an unresisting and unassisting spectator of the invasion of the rights and the compulsory subjugation of those who rely upon it for protection and have committed themselves and their interests to its care. Compulsory process and military force, "as much as lieth in her," all she may possess, may be the only means whereby a stable peace can be obtained.

Thus when causeless, unjust, persistent, and otherwise invincible rebellion shall occur; a rebellion in the interest of barbarism, servitude, degradation, and sin, for the support and maintenance of the mother of harlots and abominations; shall it be admitted that Christianity, the religion of a true civilization, the assertor of human equality, the elevator, the antagonist of sin, the unyielding foe to whatsoever is abominable or maketh a lie, gives no power for its suppression, no authority to "crush it out," withholds its consent to the use of means which God and man place at its disposal applicable for this purpose, and trammels or renders futile thus the effort to defeat the nefarious designs of wicked or mistaken men? And shall we suppose that when nothing else will answer, where rebel hands have already begun the combat and struck the blow; where the power at the disposal of the government is in all human judgment sufficient, and the resources ample for the emergency and to compel the restoration of the peace which rebellion has disturbed, that Christian principle will not allow this power and these resources to be employed? This would be for God in his providence to put into our hands means to no purpose. This would be emphatically "to bear the sword in vain." We may not teach thus.

The necessities of our national existence to-day forbid such teaching. Patriotism demands that the sanctions of our holy religion shall be given to its combat for humanity, freedom, unity, and stable peace; and the strong and vigorous arms of its soldiery must not be chilled with doubts as to the religiousness of their vocation. Let us gratefully record, that the multitudes of heroic slain, whose blood flowed so freely on every battle-field of our present struggle, by their gallant uprising and their noble daring in grasping the weapons of the carnal warfare at their country's call, were not obeying commands which the nation might not rightfully issue by authority of the religion of our hope and joy. To these heroic dead—PEACE! If in the good "fight of faith," they have acquitted themselves with as much of manliness, if in other respects they have "warred as good a warfare," then for the wearing and wielding of the carnal weapon in this contest and their standing up for the mastery on these fields reddening with the blood of humanity's martyr's, under the call of their sorrowing country, the voice of "the man of sorrows" will utter no word of condemnation.

RECOVERY FROM THE EFFECTS OF WAR

Mill, in his Political Economy, speaks of the rapidity with which people recover from war, and explains the reason as follows:

"This perpetual consumption and reproduction of capital affords the explanation of what has so often excited wonder, the great rapidity with which countries recover from a state of devastation; the disappearance, in a short time, of all traces of the mischiefs done by earthquakes, floods, hurricanes, and the ravages of war. An enemy lays waste a country by fire and sword, and destroys or carries away nearly all the moveable wealth existing in it; all the inhabitants are ruined, and yet, in a few years after, everything is much as it was before. This vis medicatrix naturæ has been a subject of astonishment, or has been cited to exemplify the wonderful strength of the principle of saving, which can repair such enormous losses in such a brief interval. There is nothing at all wonderful in the matter. What the enemy have destroyed would have been destroyed in a little while by the inhabitants themselves; the wealth which they so rapidly reproduce would have needed to be reproduced, and would have been reproduced in any case, and, probably, in as short a time.

"Nothing is changed, except that, during the reproduction, they have not now the advantage of consuming what had been produced previously. The possibility of a rapid repair of their disasters mainly depends on whether the country has been depopulated. If its effective population have not been extirpated at the time, and are not starved afterwards, then, with the same skill and knowledge which they had before, with their land and its permanent improvements undestroyed, and the more durable buildings probably unimpared, or only partially injured, they have nearly all the requisites for their former amount of production. If there is as much of food left to them, or of valuables to buy food, as enables them by any amount of privation to remain alive and in a working condition, they will, in a short time, have raised as great a produce, and acquired collectively as great wealth and as great a capital as before, by the mere continuance of that ordinary amount of exertion which they are accustomed to employ in their occupations. Nor does this evince any strength in the principles of saving, in the popular sense of the term, since what takes place is not intentional abstinence, but involuntary privation."

LITTLE BALLARD'S PRAYER AND RESIGNATION.

A little boy by the name of Ballard lived in Trenton N. J. During the military excitement of 1861 he became intensely anxious to possess a drum. He did not want a toy, but a large one, similar to those used in the regular service. He had no money, and his father, if willing, had not the means to apply to such a purpose. What should he do? His eldest sister, Hattie, to whom he is accustomed to reveal all his plans and troubles, was applied to. He earnestly requested her to suggest something by which he could obtain his heart's desire. She thought a little and then said: Mr. W., in S. street, is a gentleman of wealth, and much interested in military matters; perhaps if you were to go to him and state your case, he might be induced to give you a drum.

The suggestion pleased him, and he immediately asked his sister to comb his hair and arrange his clothing, and he would set out upon his mission at once. While the preparations were going on, Ballard seemed to be engaged in deep thought. Suddenly, and with great earnestness, he said: "Hattie," will it be begging?" "It will be very much like it," she replied. "Well, then, said Ballard, "I won't go." So Hattie's project fell to the ground at once.

After a little thought Ballard exclaimed: "O Hattie, I'll tell you what I'll do. Mr. B., who is a member of our church, has all kinds of drums to sell; I'll go and tell him, if he will let me have one on trust, as soon as I get big enough to work I will earn the money and pay him for it.' This plan seemed plausible, and he became intensely interested, and anxious to carry it out at once. His sister finally told him she feared Mr. B. would be unwilling to wait so long for his money, and she thought he had better give that idea up, too. Again he was troubled, and said: "What shall I do? How shall I get a drum?"

After some time he asked with much earnestness, "O Hattie, shall I pray for one?" His sister replied "Do just as you think best. If you would like to pray about it I see no objections to your doing so." At last he jumped up and said: "Yes, I will go and pray about it, and if the Lord wants me to have one he can make somebody think about it, and they will send it to me; and if I do not get one in answer to my prayer, then it will not be right for me to fret or worry any more about it."

After speaking thus, he went to his room and remained about fifteen minutes. He came back and seemed perfectly satisfied. He said he had told the Lord all about it. "Yes, Hattie, I told the Lord how high and how large round I want it; what colors I would like to have; and I told him the name of a little boy down town who has one just what I want, and now," said he, "I am going to give it all up to the Lord."

He continued to pray thus three times a day for three weeks. He then came to his sister and said very seriously, "Hattie, I guess I wont pray any more about the drum." "Why not?" she asked. "Well" said he, "I don't think the Lord wants me to have one; I have been praying three weeks, and he don't send me any, and I don't think I'll pray anymore about it, for it seems so much like worrying mother for something she don't want me to have." He then gave up the matter entirely.

The fact of Ballard's having prayed for a drum reached the ears of a friend weeks after he had ceased his importunities, and he was moved at once to do something for the little fellow. He bought a drum marked it, and gave orders where to forward. When it was taken to Ballard's home on "New Year's day," he was out with his sister. His mother received it, and set it carefully away under the counter of the little trimming store kept by his sisters. When he came home his sister, Hattie, who knew all about it, told him to fold up his things and lay them nicely away under the counter. In doing this he touched the sticks, which were lying on the top of the drum, and as they fell to the floor arrested his attention.

"What is this?" he exclaimed, in great surprise; and then discovering the object for which he had so long prayed, sat down by its side so completely overcome with emotion that for some five minutes he could not speak a word. Then, with the drum in his hands, he sprang out into the middle of the floor, his eyes swimming in tears and under the influence of great excitement, he could only exclaim, "O, mother, mother!" After he had calmed down a little he said, "Well, it is just like him!"

"Just like who?" said Hattie.

"Just like the Lord," said Ballard. Then turning it all round, and looking it over and over, he said with a seriousness and solemnity that affected his sisters to tears, "It looks just like God."

After awhile he said, "Hatttie, who gave it to me?"

"Why," replied Hattie, "I thought you said it was just like God; didn't you mean that God gave it to you?"

"Yes," he replied, "but then God wouldn't come and give it to me himself; I mean, whose heart did he put it in, to give it to me?"

"Who do you suppose sent it?" said Hattie.

"Why, it seems just like Brother—," said Ballard.

"You are right," said she, "he proposed it, and one or two others helped the purchase."

"Well," said Ballard, very seriously, "it is just like Him." Then placing his two front fingers about two inches apart, he said, 'It is about this much higher and larger round than I prayed for, but it is just like what I wanted, though I was afraid to pray for one quite so large as this.'

WHAT MONEY CANNOT BUY.

Ellen's home in the city is one of luxury and beauty. There is everything to charm the eye and please the taste. Costly furniture, rare ornaments, valuable books, and fine paintings, bespeak the wealth of the owner. There also are happiness and peace, and the bright faces of children, without which no home seems complete.

Ellen has a bright, handsome face, but not a happy one. Rarely, if ever, does a smile light up its beauty, or any soft emotion give it that charm which makes even a homely face attractive. She soon wearies of every pleasure, and forgets to be grateful to those who have sacrificed their own comfort, perhaps, for her gratification. She would like to be in a continual state of excitement, and "What shall I do now?" is the frequent cry, demanding a change of programme. In the winter she wishes it was summer, and in the summer she longs to be back in the city. So you see it would be impossible to satisfy her; and I don't suppose it ever enters her head that she interferes with any one's comfort.

The same restless disposition shows itself in whatever she undertakes. Everything new has a speciel charm, and mats, breakfast shawls, and sofa cushions in endless variety are commenced. If you could open her bureau drawer you would form some idea of the fickleness of her fancy, and her disregard of order. "I hadn't patience to finish it," is the only excuse for such a waste of material.

If she was allowed to do just exactly as she liked, I have no doubt she would be extremely good-natured; and everybody else might be miserable, if they chose; it wouldn't surely be her fault.

You have seen the waves come in on a rocky shore; one, your eye rests on, comes rolling so gracefully along, when right in front of it rises a monstrous rock, against which it dashes, and seems to say: "Now, what did you get in my way for, when I was going along so nicely?"

Last summer Ellen's parents rented a cottage near the Sound, where the waters made continual music, and boating, fishing, and bathing added to the attractions of the place. Ellen enjoyed these aquatic sports until the novelty had worn off; then they were dull and stupid enough.

One day she wished to go on the Sound. The water was rough, and the boat in need of repair, so her mother would not give her consent.

I never saw Ellen cry; she was of too hard a nature for that, but of all disagreeable fits any mortal ever had, Ellen's "sulks" were the worst. The "blues" are bad enough but "ugly sulks" is, in my opinion, a far more dangerous disease. You might talk, and coax, and reason, with about as much effect on Ellen, as if you attempted to move the statue of Washington with a handspike.

"Such a horrid hole as this is!" said Ellen "I wish I'd never come here. Nothing in the world to do! Always some opposition to all my plans!"

"But you know it is for your good, my child. Your mother surely knows what is best."

"It's just to be cross; she can't bear to see me happy. I shall just write to grandma," she said spitefully. "She wants me to pay her a visit, and she's always putting herself out to please me."

"Well, there it is, Ellen. Somebody has got to put herself out, and why shouldn't it be you as well as your grandmother, who is old and feeble?"

While Ellen was doing her best to be as provoking as possible, her mother would be troubling herself for fear she had been too severe. Her love for the child, and desire to give her pleasure, often caused her to be indulgent to her various whims and caprices. Her peculiar disposition needed peculiar management, and it was frequently the cause of serious discussion whether the right course was being pursued or not.

You will think, as you read this, that there was no excuse for Ellen's conduct. A beautiful home, indulgent parents, loving brothers and sisters—what more could she want in order to be cheerful and happy?

Try to cultivate what she did not yet possess—a cheerful and contented disposition—for all the money in the world cannot buy it, and without it you are poor indeed.—Selected.

PRAYER HEARD.

There is the hearing of prayer, often spoken of in Scripture; and many vex themselves about it, alleging that they know nothing of it experimentally. I grant there is a favorable hearing of prayer; but we must remember it is twofold. Either—1. It is such as a man is simply to believe by way of argument on Scriptural grounds; if I have fled unto Christ, and do approach to God in him, pray according to his will, not regarding iniquity in my heart, exercising faith about the thing I pray for absolutely or conditionally, according to the nature of the thing and promises concerning it: I am obliged to believe that God heareth my prayer, and will give what is good, according to these Scriptures: "Whatsoever ye ask in my name, I will do it."—"This is our confidence, that whatsoever we ask according to his will, he heareth us."—"Believe that ye receive, and ye shall have what ye desire."—"If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear:" then if I regard not iniquity, I may believe that he doth hear me. Or—2. A man doth sensibly perceive that God doth hear his prayer: it is made out to his heart, without any syllogistical deduction. Such a hearing of prayer got Hannah: "Her countenance was no more sad." Surely the Lord did breathe upon her faith, and made her believe that she was heard: she could not make it out by any argument; for she had not grounds upon which to build the premises of the argument, according to Scripture, in that particular: God did stamp it some way upon her heart sensibly, and so made her believe it. This is but rarely granted, especially in cases clearly deducible in Scripture; therefore people are much to be satisfied in exercising their faith about the other, and ought to leave it to God to give of this latter what he pleaseth. A man's gracious state should not be brought into debate upon the amount of such hearing of prayer.—Wm Guthrie.

THE POET "YOUNG" ON IMMORTALITY.

Who has not heard of Young's "Night Thoughts"?—"one of the few poems on which the broad stamp of popularity has been prominently impressed;" the noblest uninspired production of poetic genius: not that Young is the greatest poet, but that he chose the sublimest theme, pursued it with unwearied diligence, invested it with an interest unattained for any cognate production, treated it with a masterly skill of which it is sufficient to say that it was worthy of the occasion, and wove himself an unfading crown in the black darkness of midnight. The poem is filled with the all-absorbing, inexhaustible subject of man's destiny, interspersed with forcible exhortations which are calculated to make the liveliest impressions on the reflecting and startle the thoughtless to concern, and with philosophical statements of general truth not surpassed elsewhere. Through the century of its existence it has been the delight and satisfaction of the young, and the old, and has inspired many an ardent soul with new zeal for the Lord.

Yet notwithstanding all that may be said in its praise, the poem contains falsehood "heaps on heaps," all occasioned by one pernicious idea; which after worming its deceitful way through the rich soil of poesy for five nights, lifts its triumphant head in the prose preface to the Sixth Night; and although it "brings with it airs from heaven" and comes as "an angel of light," a skilful eye detects the lineaments of "that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan."

"Few ages have been deeper in dispute about religion than this. The dispute about religion, and the practice of it, seldom go together. The shorter, therefore, the dispute, the better. I think it may be reduced to this single question. Is man immortal, or is he not? If he is not, all our disputes are mere amusements, or trials of skill. In this case, truth, reason, religion, which give our discourses such pomp and solemnity, are (as will be shown) mere empty sounds, without any meaning in them. But if man is immortal, it will behove him to be very serious about eternal consequences; or, in other words, to be truly religious. And this great fundamental truth, unestablished or unawakened in the minds of men, is, I conceive, the real source and support of all our infidelity; how remote soever the particular objections advanced may seem to be from it."

What a sad commentary on the ignorance of man! The "great fundamental truth" of the poet is in fact the GREAT FUNDAMENTAL LIE of all time. Our Saviour said of a certain one,—"He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, for he is a liar, and the father of it." "Ye shall not surely die" was the original falsehood which stamped its utterer as a murderer from the beginning, for his lie produced the banishment of our primal parent from the tree of life—"and he died." The delusive echoes of that first lie have reverberated through all time, deceiving the children of the original victim—the duped offspring of a duped progenitor—to the present day.

We have a glimpse of the conflict between the truth and the lie in the book of Ecclesiastes. The Preacher very plainly recognizes the prevailing opinion, for he challenges the proof. "Who knoweth whether the spirit of a man goeth upward, and the spirit of a beast downward to the earth?" Eccl. iii. 21. Men in that day were victims of the same old serpent. He had changed his tactics somewhat. To Adam he had said, "Ye shall not surely die." But the event exposed the lie. The adversary saw that he could not continue his original assertion in the face of the manifested death. With ready evasion he said: "It is true that man must die, but it is not death in completion that comes on him; he has within an undying entity—an immortal entity—an immortal soul: the body dies, but all that is really valuable lives on, and in a higher sphere, in a clime native to the soul." The bait was swallowed, and the children dangle on the same hook that caught the father. Instead of heeding the voice of Nature and of God, they hail death as their Saviour. They say with Young:

"Death is the crown of life:
Were death denied, poor man would live in vain;
Were death denied, to live would not be life;
Were death denied, even fools would wish to die.
Death wounds to cure: we fall; we rise; we reign!
Spring from our fetters; fasten in the skies;
Where blooming Eden withers in our sight:
Death gives us more than was in Eden lost.
This king of terrors is the prince of peace.
When shall I die to vanity, pain, death?
When shall I die?—When shall I live for ever?

Was ever infatuation more complete?

The Preacher, as we remarked, sees the great error of mankind. He sees also how deeply rooted it is—beyond the stoutest effort of any teacher to disturb. He despairs of human assistance, and looks to God. "I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts: for that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one spirit [one life-principle—ruah]: so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast: for all are a breath. All go unto one place: all are of the dust, and all return to dust." Eccl. iii. 18–20. Here is the exact truth concerning man's nature, a truth that needs to be revealed from God to man, from "the Father of lights" to the children of darkness.

The Preacher was a prophet, for "when the fulness of time came, God sent forth his Son," "a light to the nations." The principal sect of the Jews fostered the old lie of natural immortality. The Pharisees arose after the return from Babylon, and incorporated the old serpent in their creed. What Moses and the prophets never taught they obtained from Pagan Asia. To this, paganized Christianity bears witness. "She had been the instrument selected to teach the Hebrews the doctrine of the immortality of the soul; for, whatever may be said of the early notions on this subject, it is unquestionable, that in Babylon the Jews first attained the clearness and certainty in regard to it which we find in the teaching of the Pharisees. "The Education of the World." Essays & Reviews. Dr. Temple does not say who "selected the instrument to teach" the said doctrine. He would have us believe that it was a part of God's system of education. If so, then the serpent is one of God's teachers, for the original statement was "Ye shall not surely die." But we thank Dr. Temple for his statement of the origin of the doctrine we oppose. We are glad that the wise men of the Church of England at last renounce "the law, the prophets, and the psalms," as authority for it, and that old Babylon is credited her own commodity. O that the Protestantism of the nineteenth century would pile all the trash on to modern Babylon, that it might be burned up in the fire that consumes the mother-harlot.

Among the other causes of opposition to our Lord's teachings on the part of the Pharisees, his denial of natural immortality must have been a main one. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi. Here was a wholesale destruction of the serpent, eggs and all: man is entirely mortal, and unless he partakes of the offered aid he ends with this life. Eternal life is not an attribute of the soul, neither is it entered at death; but it comes through the Son of man by a resurrection at the last day. The Preacher's words were justified indeed. God did "manifest the estate of the sons of men that they might see" their true condition. Surely "that was the true light" which shone in the person of the rejected Nazarene. To the proud Pharisees he said. "I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. Why do ye not understand my speech? because ye cannot hear my word. Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it. And because I tell you the truth, ye believe me not." John viii.

Thus the conflict between the truth and the lie, begun in the garden of Eden between God and the Devil, has been continued down to this very day. Prophets, priests, and kings, inspired by God, have reiterated the truth, and poor, deluded, unenlightened man, inspired by the adversary, has held on to the lie. But He who came to illustrate the truth in his own person, "who died and rose that he might be Lord of dead and living," will come again, first to "bind" the "old serpent," and afterwards to cast him "into the lake of fire." "He shall bruise thy head."

Reverting to the poet's prose, we agree that all controversy on religion is "reduced to this single question, Is man immortal or is he not?" In our criticisms of Young we must not forget to give him the full benefit of a plea in his favor. He did not dream that the Bible teaches the complete mortality of man, and that immortality is a gift through Christ; hence he made no distinction between the children of men. He argued in favor of the immortality of the soul principally in view of its future felicity. It was the immortality of good men that brought out all his energies. To deny their future immortality was monstrous: so far he was right. His error consisted in making all men immortal. He did not see salvation for any one unless all possessed inherent incorruptibility: hence his question. But in our day we are compelled to negative the question which he affirmed. We have to alter his remarks as follows: "Is man immortal, or is he not? If he is, all our disputes are mere amusements, or trials of skill. All that can be desired by man is his natural right. Immortality being the prerogative of the divine nature, if man is immortal he is a partaker of the divine and forever free from any future evil. But if man is not immortal, it will behoove him to be very serious about the future, or, in other words, to be truly religious. And this great fundamental truth of man's mortality, and God's gift of immortality through Christ alone, unestablished in the minds of men, is the real source and support of all the infidelity of the nineteenth century; how remote soever the particular objections advanced may seem to be from it." Men reject Christ at the present day because they see no need of him. Are they not immortal? what more do they need, the Bible itself being the judge? When the apostle Paul—1 Cor. xv.—reaches the height of his great argument, what does he say? "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." But infidelity claims all this as an inherent attribute of all men, and maintains that the victory over death is the inevitable and immediate sequence of death itself. And here our poet ignorantly gives infidelity all that it can ask.

"This is the bud of being, the dim dawn,
The twilight of our day, the vestibule:
Life's theatre as yet is shut, and death,
Strong death alone, can heave the massy bar,
This gross impediment of clay remove,
And make us, embryos of existence, free.
From real life, but little more remote
Is he, not yet a candidate for light,
The future embryo slumbering in his sire.
Embryos we must be, till we burst the shell,
Yon ambient azure shell, and spring to life,
The life of gods, oh transport! and of man."
* * * * * * * * *
"Life makes the soul dependent on the dust;
Death gives her wings to mount above the spheres.
Through chinks, styled organs, dim lifepeeps at light:
Death bursts th' involving cloud, and all is day;
All eye, all ear, the disembodied power.
Death has feign'd evils, nature shall not feel;
Life, ills substantial, wisdom cannot shun.
Is not the mighty mind, that son of heaven!
By tyrant life detroned, imprison'd, pain'd?
By death enlarged, ennobled, deified?
Death but entombs the body; life the soul."

The step, so often referred to, from the sublime to the ridiculous, is taken in the next paragraph of our poet's preface.

"The heathen world confessed, that they rather hoped than firmly believed immortality; and how many heathens have we still amongst us? The sacred page assures us, that life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel: but by how many is the Gospel rejected or overlooked!"

It is a sublime thing to affirm immortality of any one, much more of man in general; but it is ridiculous to add—"life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel." Why bring such an immortality to light? And what kind of an immortality is it which after having universally reigned four thousand years needs to be brought to light? Well may it be exclaimed, "By how many is the Gospel overlooked!" The poet was one of the "many." If he had but asked himself—How are life and immortality brought light by the Gospel?—he might have perceived that the immortality of the soul is nowhere recognized in the Scriptures. If the Gospel came to "awaken in the minds of men" a perception of their own immortality, it took a very strange path to accomplish the object. We defy any one to state a single teaching on principle of the Gospel that hints at such a thing. No; the direct contrary is stated. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, thot whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." It strikes us that "everlasting life" would be a thankless gift to a being already deathless. And how can an immortal being "perish"? Our Heavenly Father never insulted our reason by establishing such contradictions. "Life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel." Man is perishable, the Gospel comes to give him life and immortality if he will accept, not otherwise. God "will render to them who, by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honor and incorruption, eternal life." Rom. ii. 6, 7. And the whole plan was illustrated or brought to lightin the person of Jesus Christ "who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." Gal. vi. 7, 8. Our poet further says:

"I am satisfied, that men once thoroughly convinced of their immortality, are not far from being Christians. For it is hard to conceive, that a man fully conscious, eternal pain or happiness will certainly be his lot, should not earnestly and impartially inquire after the surest means of escaping the one, and securing the other."

If the poet lived in this day he would speedily be convinced of the fallacy in his argument. It may be safely said, that the most inveterate opponents of Christianity to-day are full believers in their own immortality. All the spiritualists answer to this statement. The immortality of the soul is the corner-stone and foundation of their whole system. The idea of "eternal pain" he would find to be obsolete; immortality is independent of pain. There can be no pain where death is banished, for pain is the premonition of death.

The Sixth Night of the considered poem opens the argument for natural immortality, the supposed proofs being drawn from Nature.

"Look nature through, 'tis revolution all,
All change; no death. Day follows night; and night
The dying day; stars rise, and set, and rise;
Earth takes th' example. See, the summer gay,
With her green chaplet, and ambrosial flowers,
Droops into pallid autumn: winter gray,
Horrid with frost and turbulent with storm,
Blows autumn, and his golden fruits, away;
Then melts into the spring: soft spring, with breath
Favonian, from warm chambers of the south,
Recalls the first. All, to re-flourish, fades;
As in a wheel, all sinks, to re-ascend.
Emblems of man, who passes, not expires."
The world of matter, with its various forms,
All dies into new life. Life born from death
Rolls the vast mass and shall forever roll."

The foregoing is a good illustration of useless rhetoric. To prove that man is immortal, death itself is denied. We are told to look nature through, and "all change; no death." Whence then, did the idea come? Why use the word "death" at all? Scarcely have the words "no death" left his lips, when he declares that the multiform world of matter "all dies into new life," and that "life born from death rolls the vast mass, and shall for ever roll." This absurd statement is succeeded by a more absurd inference.

"What hence infers LORENZO? Can it be?
Matter immortal? and shall spirit die?
Above the nobler, shall less noble rise?
Shall man alone, for whom all else revives,
No resurrection know? shall man alone,
Imperial man! be sown in barren ground,
Less privileged than grain, on which he feeds?

If the poet's Night Thoughts ever converted an infidel, we are certain that the poet's logic had no hand in the work. Do the same "ambrosial flowers" that "droop into pallid autumn" "re-flourish" in the spring? If not, what hope can man get from the analogy? Where is the personality, the man, according to this argument? Lost in the undistinguishable mass of human decay, from which he can only arise by proxy. If we should attempt to draw inferences concerning theindividual man from the stated facts we should say: The change from night to day, and from day to night shows that life does not follow immediately on death, but that there is an interval of unconsciousness between. The rising, setting, and rising again of stars shows that man undergoes no change whatever—he is immortal from the hair of his head to his toe-nails—which would prove too much, for our poet is very strenuous concerning what no one ever thought of denying since the fact gave the lie to the serpent,—the death of the body. His next illustration suggests a very appropriate analogy. As the flowers of summer droop and die to live again no more except by the law of the reproduction of their kind, so man droops, dies, and lives no more except through his posterity. The poet's immortality, in fact, is a good deal like Plato's; it is virtual annihilation of the individual man, although it provides for the continuation of the species. And as far as the natural man is concerned this latter inference is correct. The Scriptures clearly show that there is no provision for any restoration of the mortal life to any dead man, and as no other life can be obtained except through a personal union with Christ, it inevitably follows that all others die to rise no more forever. The poet's vegetable illustration is Scriptural. "All flesh is grass." "When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever." Ps. xcii. 7. Amen. So let all thine enemies perish, O YAHVEH.

PRAYER.

1. In engaging in prayer, the mind should be occupied and controlled by a clearly defined desire and expectation of enjoying a mutual communion with God. The object is not, from a distance, to address the throne, but to draw near, and enter sensibly into the Divine presence; and whilst presenting our petitions and uttering our confessions, thanks, and praises, in each to look for, expect, and await a Divine response, imparted at once by the Comforter, on the Father's behalf. To this intent it is well that, at times, our own utterances should be entirely suspended, and the mind, unemployd in conceiving and uttering speech, be left entirely free to hear: "Commune with thine own heart, and be still." And, in such exercises, let it not be supposed that nothing is gained, because no more may be realized than a solemn awe in God's presence. Not only is that of itself an experience of the highest value, to be assiduously cherished, but it is furthermore undoubtedly true, that to the soul thus adoring before God's throne, the Holy Spirit, which helpeth our infirmities by intercessions and groanings that cannot be uttered, may and does bestow communications of grace to the spirit, whilst the understanding is unfrui ul. Compare Rom. viii. 26, with 1 Cor. xiv 14 and throughout the chapter.

2. It was not casually that, in instructing the disciples how to pray, the first words which our Saviour taught them to utter were the fraternal, filial cry, "Our Father"—recognizing in those two words the brotherhood of all saints, the sympathy of all the members in the one body, their common interest at the throne of grace, the paternal love and tenderness of God, and the filial confidence and fellowship thereby induced. Such are the feelings that Jesus designed to inculcate by the direction—"After this manner pray ye." Such are the feelings which should be diligently cherished and brought into exercise in all our approaches to the mercy-seat. If our Father, then may we come with confidence and boldness; then may we be assured that not only will he hear, but respond and bless.

3. The same general principles apply to the use of the name of Christ. Whilst some doubtless use that name as a mere form adapted to round off the closing period, and others as a sort of word of incantation, invested with some secret mystic power, and whilst the children of God too often seem to view it in no higher light than as a plea of justice satisfied for sin; a glance at the language of our Saviour on the subject, will evince that it has a much higher design. "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask anything in my name I will do it." John xiv. 13, 14. "Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full....And I say not that I will pray the Father for you; for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God." John xvi. 24–27. The name of Christ is the plea of love. It involves indeed a claim of justice satisfied, but to the Son, himself, upon the throne, it urges the Father's glory, "that the Father may be glorified in the Son," as well as the Son's own love to his redeemed. And to the Father, it is the plea of our love to his dear Son. Thus, its spirit and purpose is love; and its design is not a mere formal utterance of the name at the close of prayer, but faith and love to him, and to the Father in him, pervading it all. As we come, with the cry, our Father, the first words we utter, so should we come with the faith in Christ, and consequent union with him, which that cry implies. He who calls us to the fellowship of heaven, thus, in the God-man, reveals the way.

4. In order to the freest and highest enjoyment of the privilege of the mercy-seat, it is necessary that our views and wishes be in all respects conformed to those of God. To this end, the word of God is to be studied, with the constant object of moulding our thoughts and affections in accordance therewith; and in all our thoughts and meditations it should be our endeavor to strive to view things, not from the low and grovelling stand-point of our carnal aims and interests, but from that of the Divine honor and glory, and the vast dimensions of God's kingdom, and the depth and wisdom of his counsels.

5. That importunity and perseverance to which a gracious answer is pledged, does not consist in an occasional and impetuous urging of our plea at the mercy-seat, but in a calm, earnest, and persistent pressing of it, with humble consciousness and confession of unworthiness, filial confidence in God's infinite grace and love, and a confiding expectation of the blessing, looking and patiently waiting for it. The design of our being invited to exercise perseverance, being to induce us to keep near the mercy-seat, so as to learn the faithfulness and love of God, and to engage in communion with him, it is evident that he who most fully and heartily enters thus into the spirit of the exercise will soonest receive his request; whilst an occasional and impatient cry—since it implies unsubmissiveness under God's hand, distrust of his goodness and truth, and therefore ignorance of his true character, by reason of estrangement from his presence—precludes the blessing, the bestowal of which in such circumstances would be an encouragement to continuance in such a state of distance and ignorance.

6. Above all else, as being the means essential to all, is the aid of the Spirit to be sought, and his guidance followed with implicit acquiescence. How often do we grieve that agent of Divine grace, when present, and offering his aid, by listening to the suggestions of our own grovelling understandings and dictates of our carnal wills, rather than give heed to his invitations, which are calling us to the banquetting-house under the banner of perfect love. Would we offer acceptable petitions? They must be dictated by "the Spirit of grace and supplications." Would we conform them to the will and purpose of God? It is the Spirit that "maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God." The secret mystery of prayer, therefore, is to watch and set our sails so as to catch the softest breathing of the Spirit, and guide our bark thereby to the bosom of infinite Love;—a secret, this, which none but he himself can teach. But "if ye being parents know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." Ask, then, and it shall be given you.

DEFECTIVE NUTRITION.

From an article with this heading in the Scalpel, the medium through which the celebrated and profound Dr. Dixon instructs his fellow-men, we make a few extracts. We wish we could insert the whole.

"Air is the first and last want of our animal life;
Our first sigh and last gasp attest its power."

Man is born with a certain amount of life-force, or capacity to live; this he inherits from one or both of his parents, or from their parents. It often shows itself in early youth or manhood to be of a higher or lower type than that of either parent, when infancy gives no hint of its future degree. It will be found, however, that the bodily or mental condition of the mother during gestation has much to do with the bodily condition and constitutional or life-force of the child she brings forth..... The organic law continues its control while the mother is nourishing it with her blood; but the moment it is born, an entirely new and precarious condition surrounds it; all depends upon the humanity and intellect of its attendants. Its clothing, its food, its mental condition, every moment rests upon the intelligence of its mother; on her alone depends its existence, and, in a great degree, its constitutional or life force....

Medicine can never add material to the body. It cannot heal an ulcer in the lungs or spine; it cannot affect the absorption of the tubercles which cause it; it cannot straighten a curved spine or leg, or give blood to the feeble girl; nor can the most perfect mechanism impart strength or tone to the muscles that support the spine or move the limb. Medicines are generally inert, and too often injurious; they destroy appetite and digestion, which is the source of strength. Mechanical appliances are only useful adjuvants to take off the weight from the diseased part, and to aid the effect of a surgical operation, or, what is far better, to prevent its necessity.

There is no true tonic but pure air; there is no material of repair but blood. In all diseases originating in a low condition of the vital force, more air must be breathed, that more food may be consumed, or the red blood that makes and gives tone to the muscles that support the spine will not be supplied, the scrofulous tubercle will not be absorbed, nor will the ulcer heal....

Only see, reader, what a startling proof we derive of the cause of tubercular disease from the domestic animals; cows in confinement and fed upon poor and watery food, cats, dogs, confined pigeons, monkeys, and parrots, often die of tubercular or scrofulous consumption of the lungs and bowels; wild ones when not maimed so as to prevent free exercise and food—never. There is no such thing as tubercle ever found in the bodies of wild birds that are used for food. Their temperature is from four to six degrees hotter than the human body (they fly rapidly and they eat enormously of stimulating grains and animal food), and from ten to twenty above that of a feeble, pale girl! We always say, when speaking of such an one, "she is lymphatic;" the lymph (chyle) or albumen, predominates; she has cold hands and feet; eats little, and breathes rapidly with only a portion of her lungs.

City life fosters scrofulous complaints; in all classes of society, where large sleeping apartments, cheerful amusements and highly nutritious food cannot constantly be enjoyed, if scrofula be not born with the child and inherited either from parents or grandparents, or if it be not developed by a vicious system of education, the children will be found to enjoy a good prospect for life. It is to the melancholy emulation of our middle and lower classes of the vices of city society, and the hot-bed forcing of the female mind in our small villages and country towns, to secure the imaginary luxuries derivable from wealthy city alliances, that one half the scrofulous affections are due.

Scrofula may be educated and lived down; it is often done by the brother who is jostled and perhaps kicked about the world, while the sister dies—suffocated and starved by unhealthy blood at home. The precocious education of the passions by our vicious system of education, parental aspirations for premature marriages, the confined atmosphere of the chamber and school-room, late hours and badly compounded food taken at improper hours—witness that deadly institution the mid-day lunch ofcake and sweet meats—insufficient clothing toprotectthe half-blood nourished body—thin shoes—these are the causes of th terrible frequency of consumption and spinal complaints, in short of the "Early Decay of American Women."—[See No. 6, Scalpel.]...

There is a very fatal error in regard to exercise. It can never benefit when carried to the fatigue point in any young person. The laboring person endures it, but for the most part he dies in middle life and of congestive complaints; the young girl or school boy of healthy stock outgrows it; but the feeble and the precocious in brain and body, die of convulsions or tubercle, or dropsy of the head...

We may judge of the approach of tubercle in this way: The child or young girl is exhausted after the walk; they say they are tired, and lie down perhaps on the floor; then they say the hip, some part of the spine, or the knee "hurts them."

Flushing of the face, short breath and delayed menstruation, is evidence of starvation of red blood: tubercle threatens.

A child, or young girl or boy thus affected, should have their entire course of life changed; medicine can do no possible good. If you do not give more rest and less study, and place them under such circumstances that all the vital and organic forces can be raised, they will soon break somewhere....

Air and food produce heat; life is warm, death is cold. The seed germinates by sunlight, warmth, air, and moisture; then, if supplied with the necessary material elements, it selects its food, lives and becomes a healthy plant: it produces its fruit, pays its contingent to the earth in the fall of the leaf, and sleeps till the life-giving sun again asserts its power, and awakens the bud or the seed to its new round of life. Air is the first and last want of our bodies. Our first cry and last gasp attest its power. The lungs are the two fire places of the system; air is the fuel; the fire smoulders in the air-tight stove till the valve is raised, when it bursts into flame: air, food, sleep, and the cheerful emotions, are the only restoratives to exhausted nerves and blood-vessels.

The Spirit of the "Harlot"

The Freeman's Journal & Catholic Register of this city advertises a new book entitled "The History of Protestant Priestcraft in Europe and America." We quote from the prospectus.

"All should subscribe who wish to acquaint themselves with historical facts of the greatest value atthe present time, or to arm themselves with arguments to oppose Puritanic Priestcraft, which, in addition to all other curses it has inflicted on our country, has now involved us in the most terrible sectional war, and threatens to follow it with a sectarian crusade far more awful, unless arrested by the dissemination of documents exposing its character and objects, such as the author has sought to make this History useful in accomplishing. Priestcraft is therein proved to be alike antagonistic to the true Christian religion, popular liberty, and the public peace and prosperity; and the political clergy are also proven to be servants of Satan, instead of ministers of the Prince of Peace, and their influence "evil, and only evil continually." Patriots will find a perusal of its pages of great advantage in enabling them to fight the hydra-headed monster that must be slain before we can hope for peace and a restoration of civil and religious liberty in our country."

The Right Talk.

The Presbyterian (N. S.) General Assembly, which has just closed its ten days session in Brooklyn, has adopted a minute on the state of the Country, from which we extract these timely words:

"Let it not be said that, as a church, we have nothing to do with civil legislation. The day has gone by when an intelligent Christian will affirm the doctrine, that what is wrong in religion is right in politics. God has taught us, in this war, that the Church must conserve the State by instructing the people in the great principles of justice, and inspiring them to practice the same. Without the teaching and the inspiration of the Church, the patriotism of this nation would never have nerved itself for the permanent and heroic defense of freedom (and this is but another name for justice) which has crushed the treason that sought to assassinate the State. We wish all men to know that the members of our churches are bound to be Christians, in politics as well as in religion. God hath made us responsible according to our numbers and our intelligence, for the welfare and healthful legislation of the State. To meet this responsibility, our Christian patriots must exert themselves to influence the primary meetings for the nomination of fit men, to secure the election of good, pure men to office, and when nominated themselves to remember the duty of assisting their country, and illustrating both their piety and patriotism by consenting to serve her."

The Assembly also adopted the following resolution, which was adopted by the Presbyterian (O. S.) General Assembly at Pittsburg:

"Resolved, That a committee of four ministers and three laymen be appointed by this meeting to present this subject to the General Assembly, and to be associated with a similar committee to be appointed by that body, in devising plans by which a general and concerted movement of all the Protestant forces of the land may be brought about, and bold, continuous, and vigorous protest, by word and act, shall be enunciated against both infidelity and Roman Catholicism, the arch-enemies of truth in the midst of the professing Church of God, and arch-traitors to civil and religious freedom throughout the world."

Wasted Thoughts.

Few persons know how much it costs to write a good article for a good daily or weekly journal. Days and even weeks, of the very best talent, are sometimes spent upon a single column. Whole libraries are examined to illustrate or substantiate a single position. The light of ancient and modern days is concentrated upon it. This article is printed and sent into the world—a world of ignorance and suffering, where such articles are sometimes worth a thousand times their weight in gold. They are brought to men's doors, and thrown upon their tables. But alas! how few of the busy multitude read them! How many less reflect upon them, and still less understand and profit by them?

How often do we see the very best religious papers, after being skimmed over for a few items of news and anecdotes, thrown into the waste-drawer, used to do up ends of codfish or tobacco, or to light a cigar.

That immortal truth which costs so much to elaborate, and which so many are perishing for the want of, so far as thousands are concerned, has vanished in the air. Those very persons who least prized the truth, were those who most needed it.

Often have we thought, when reading some soul stirring article, what a pity that so few in the world will read and profit by this. Not one in twenty in the small circle will see it, and not more than give it a passing glance.

The world is rich in knowledge, yet the great mass are starving and dying for want of it. After it had been dug from the mine with hard toil, and prepared with wise discrimination, for their special benefit, they turn from it with utter neglect.—Congregationalist.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, MAY 31, 1865.

"Ask, and it shall be Given."

The more we consider the condition of God's dear children, the more do we realize the importance of having a spirit of entire dependence on him. We are apt to be led away by the pantheistic idea that God, being every where in general, and no where in particular, working every where in general, and no where in particular, is therefore so immeasurably removed from us as individuals, that it is useless for us to expect his especial notice. This idea is pernicious, and like a noxious weed, should be uprooted before it has acquired a hold that we can not overcome. What can God say more than he hath said to assure us of his especial love? "Like as a father pitieth his children, so YAHVEH pitieth them that fear him." "YAHVEH preserveth all them that love him." Many other quotations might be given to establish the clear preference given by the Almighty to them that love him. Now if he makes a distinction between the different classes of mankind, between those that love him and those who do not, we have the principle of partiality established, and there is nothing to prevent our carrying it out as far as we see to be consistent with the facts of revelation and of our common experience.

But some man will say,—"You are wrong, for 'God is no respecter of persons.'" We wish that men, professed Christians at least, would read the Bible enough to understand what they quote. It is not unqualifiedly true that God is no respecter of persons; on the contrary he is the most rigid respecter of persons in the Universe. He respects the good above the evil, the zealous above the lukewarm, the devoted above the careless, the reverential above the profane, and so on indefinitely. What is more, he respects the children for the fathers' sakes. He says so over and over again in his word. "I have never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread" was the testimony of the Psalmist. Because of his promise to Abraham he has blessed, doth bless, and will bless his natural seed with peculiar blessings. The idea that God is not partial is a mistaken one.

What then does Paul mean? Let us read the whole passage. "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons." Col. iii. 25. That is, God will punish the evil-doer, no matter what his position in life, for He does not respect persons as men often do. The Apostle is speaking of the relation of masters and servants, and would teach that God will punish a wicked master as readily as a wicked servant. In his epistle to the Romans, Paul also says that God does not respect persons; but there he is speaking of the great universal scheme of salvation which ultimately saves the worthy of all nations. But all this does not militate against the plain fact that God makes a difference between persons. And what are we that we should murmur?

Did not God respect his servant Daniel, and make communications to him of a peculiar and wonderful nature? Why? Because Daniel struggled in prayer and earnestly sought the Lord's face. On one occasion, spoken of in Daniel ix., Gabriel was sent with a message, and informed the prophet that "the commandment came forth at the beginning of his supplications." So anxious was the Almighty to honor his servant. Was there no respect of persons here? Hundreds of proofs might be adduced from the Scriptures, but enough has been said to enable us to consider our privileges. Let us learn to put entire and absolute dependence on God in every thing. "Let us come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need." "Draw nigh unto God, and he will draw nigh unto you." Come, Lord, drive out unbelief and doubt, and take full possession of our hearts. "Quicken us and we shall call upon thy name!" J. T. C.

The Poet "Young" on Immortality.

By referring to our outside, it will be seen that the following is an appendix. It completes the notice of Young's argument from nature; some other time we may consider his argument from man, which will be found as futile as its predecessor. The poet's first argument was based on the revolution in nature; let us now hear his next—on the gradation.

"If nature's revolution speaks aloud,
In her gradation hear her louder still.
Look nature through, 'tis neat gradation all.
By what minute degree her scale ascends!
Each middle nature join'd at each extreme,
To that above it join'd, to that beneath.
Parts, into parts reciprocally shot,
Abhor divorce: what love of union reigns!
Here dormant matter waits a call to life;
Half-life, half-death, join there: here, life and sense;
There, sense from reason steals a glimmering ray;
Reason shines out in man. But how preserved
The chain unbroken upward to the realms
Of incorporal life? those realms of bliss,
Where death has no dominion? Grant a make
Half-mortal, half-immortal; earthy, part,
And part ethereal; grant the soul of man
Eternal; or in man the series ends.
Wide yawns the gap; connection is no more:
Check'd reason halts; her next step wants support;
Striving to climb, she tumbles from her scheme;
A scheme, analogy pronounced so true;
"Analogy, man's surest guide below."

"Analogy" is an excellent thing, but like many other excellent things it may be carried too far. The foregoing description of the "gradation" in "nature" is fine, but the gradation may also be carried too far. Our poet is anxious to preserve "the chain unbroken upward to the realms of incorporeal life." But how does he know that such a chain exists? We consider the doctrine dangerous; for the supposition of a chain leading, link by link, from he lowest plane in nature up to God, would justify the supposition that the chain has always existed. To make the chain complete in the present we have to "grant a make half mortal, half immortal; earthy, part, and part ethereal." Must there not be the same link in the past? Hence this peculiar being called man must have always existed. But our poet did not believe this latter proposition. He said with us that man had a beginning. Where, then, was the chain of gradation before this essential link was made? If we do not grant it now, we know the consequences. "Wide yawns the gap." Without man there is a gap. Then before man was created there was a gap; and a gap in the past is just as incomprehensible as a gap in the present. If it was, it may be. Snap goes the chain of gradation and down "tumbles" the suspended "analogy"—not a very "sure guide" in this case. These analogies in nature are very pretty if we keep them within bounds; but the truth is, immortality is beyond nature. Immortality belongs to the God of Nature—"who only hath immortality;" 1 Tim. vi. 16. Let not "corruptible man" presume to link himself with the incorruptible God" lest he "worship and serve the creature rather than the Creator;" Rom. i. 23, 25. Let not "the truth of God"—immortality is the prerogative only of the Divine—be "changed into a lie"—immortality belongs to the human. If we ever become immortal it will be, not because of any gradation or revolution in nature, but because we are made "partakers of the divine nature;" 2 Pet. i. 4. The Holy Spirit the only link between God and man, and without that link, man must inevitably sink back to the black darkness of nonentity. "That which is begotten of the flesh is flesh; and that which is begotten of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that ye must be begotten from above." John iii. J. T. C.

Isaiah on American Slavery.

The great truth that the seed of the lost ten tribes are identical with the Teutonic race throws a light on the prophetic word that is truly startling. We are now satisfied that the fifty-eight chapter of Isaiah contains a prediction of the Anti-Slavery movement in these United States. "Cry aloud, spare not; lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sin." [not "sins"]. Here reference is made to some great national sin, which the context explains. It is the sin of oppression. The exhortation—"Cry aloud" has certainly been faithfully observed for the last thirty years. All history may be searched in vain for another such faithful crying out against national transgression. The command was not only to "cry aloud," but also, "Spare not." This immediately calls up the forms of the various uncompromising national scourgers, having their representative in Wendell Phillips, the utterer of more political truth than any man of his day. Surely the first verse of the chapter has been signally fulfilled.

"Yet they seek me daily, and delight to know my ways, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of their God: they ask of me the ordinances of justice; they take delight in approaching to God." This is a description of the abundance of religious pretension which co-existed with the oppression. The hypocrisy of Christians was evidenced in the well-known cards posted in the noon-day prayer meetings of 1857 prohibiting any reference to the great crime of the nation, in the action of the leading Church bodies, which set their faces like a flint against anti slavery agitation; in the wicked stifling of every sympathetic word for the bond-man by the American Tract Society and other religious corporations. The American church as a whole was dead while she lived, a whited sepulchre of religious profession without, but full of pro-slavery corruption within. God saw it all, and said:—"Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this"—and down came the red bolts of his indignation. The nation found itself in the coils of the serpent of rebellion. Battle after battle was fought, defeat and disgrace seemed to cling to the starry banner, and all was dark. Then we began to fast and pray. Still no relief. We were astonished. Then we said, in the language of the prophet:

"Wherefore have we fasted, and thou seest not? wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge?" And the answer came back, "Behold, in the day of your fast ye find pleasure, and exact all your labors." How exactly was this language fulfilled! Was ever pleasure-seeking carried to such an extent as since the beginning ofthe rebellion? Was it not the subject of particular remark by the newspapers of the day? and still we "exacted all our labors"—still the abomination that caused our troubles was permitted to exist, while Northern amusements went on as "merry as a marriage bell." And God further said: "Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the first of wickedness: ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high. Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a man to afflict his soul a day? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor tht are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?"

At length the voice of God became the voice of the people, and the emancipation of the negro was determined in the national councils. No sooner did we earnestly set ourselves to do justice than the flood tide of victory came in with steady volume, and peace came with unlooked for suddenness. This, too, was predicted by the prophet: "Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily; and thy righteousness shall go before thee: the glory of YAHVEH shall be thy rereward. Then shalt thou call, and YAHVEH shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am."

The work of righteous repentance is to be completed by the enfranchisement of the chattels, and the abolition of the vile spirit of caste. The negro will have his social equality fully recognized. This also is asserted by the prophet: "If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity [the use of disparaging and contemptous epithets, as for example, the word "nigger," which is often used by professed Christians—to their shame be it spoken]: and if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in darkness, and thy darkness be as the noon. And YAHVEH shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones; and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not."

The grand consequence of this national repentance is yet to be seen. This same nation that looses the bands of wickedness, and breaks every yoke will yet furnish instruments in God's hands to restore Palestine to her ancient splendor, for says the prophet: "And they that be of thee shall build the old waste places; thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in."

Isaiah is not the only prophet that speaks of our relation to the African. Zephaniah says: "From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering." Zeph. iii. 10. God's dispersed is Israel; who is the daughter of his dispersed? YAHVEH, through Micah (iv. 6, 7) said,—"In that day will I assemble her that halteth [Judah], and I will gather her that is driven out and her that I have afflicted [Israel]; and I will make her that halted a remnant [the Jews], and her that was cast far off A STRONG NATION" [the American nation]. The daughter of God's dispersed is evidently the American church—the "suppliants"—worshippers—of the nation. They will bring an "offering" to God "from beyond the rivers of Ethiopia"—the African church. Zephaniah points to the latter in the context (v. 12) "I will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of YAHVEH." Could a better description be given, and in fewer words? J. T. C.

Wanted---

By the Greek and Hebrew languages, decent treatment from Advent preachers. We wonder that the former language especially does not die of strangulation. Ignorance before pretension, say we. No one is to blame for being ignorant if he improves his opportunities. A man is accepted according to that he hath, not according to that he hath not. "I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue." Our remarks are suggested by the following, in an exchange: "The glorious doctrine of the resurrection to Zoen-life has been demonstrated. "What kind of a life is that? A life-life, a living-life, or a life alive—which? J. T. C.

The Time of the Second Advent.

It would be a singular fact, were not inconsistency so prominent in human affairs, that men who are first in predicting the time of the Second Advent are determined to remain in the dark with reference to the effect of that event on the race of mankind. They have a zeal, but not according to knowledge. The only idea they have is that Christ is coming in a year or two to burn the world, and to usher in the immortal age in completion. All the explicit declarations of God through the holy prophets, concerning the restoration of Israel, the re-constrction of David's throne, the distinction between the priest-kings of the coming age and the subjects of the kingdom, and the future blessing of "all the families of the earth" are ignored. Well, let them go on in their unhealthy agitation; we will do our humble part in protesting against it. The Voice of the West, May 16, ends a time article thus:

"The 1260 and the 1335 days, or years, begin together. This is a settled point among commentators. This being so, we can now answer the question, Where are we? The periods of 1260 and 1335 beginning in A. D. 533, the first must end with the sitting of the judgment in 1793, and the last will end with the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the just in 1868.

Dear reader, do not turn a deaf, or skeptical ear to this conclusion. Please look at the argument. Is it not only plausible, but also sound and true? Do we not stand on the threshold of the glorious kingdom of God? And please remember that while there are disputes about the chain events connected with the longer periods, there can be none in relation to these shorter ones. The light is clear on these, and no one has as yet ventured to criticise this argument."

The editor of the Herald of Life has repeatedly called attention to the fact that no evidence exists that the time of the Lord's coming is revealed. And with all necessary respect for the champions of time, we think that a principal leader in the original time movement, who has also been the means under God of opening the greatest truths to the people, and in the face of many who now despise his mature counsels, and who has given as much evidence at least of his fitness for teaching as any time theorist living, should be answered before the statement is made that "no one has as yet ventured to criticise this argument." It is by such wholesale neglect of facts that some people thrive.

The Voice speaks of the period of 1260 years. We answer that there is no mention made of any such period in God's book. Prove that there is such a period before you guess at its commencement. That "the time, times, and a half" of Daniel and Revelation are equal to 1260 years is pure assumption.

The 1335 days of Dan. xii. 12 are called years. Another assumption.

The assumed 1260 years and the assumed 1335 years are said to "begin together." Another assumption.

The assumed 1335 years are predicted to end with the coming of Christ in 1868. An assumption of assumptions.

After assuming every point, the Voice asks us to "look at the argument" and tells us that "the light is clear." Yes, "clear as mud." Every thing is clear to men who are satisfied with assumptions. The Voice tells us elsewhere in the same issue that the forty-ninth year was the year of Jubilee. Moses says: "Ye shall hallow the fiftieth year....it shall be a jubilee unto you....a jubilee [shall the fiftieth year be unto you." Lev. xxv. 10, 11. But to the Voice "there is nothing clearer" then "that Moses directly and explicitly teaches" that the jubilee was the forty-ninth year.

We refer to this subject of time to warn people against placing undue depedence on time theories. If they were held simply as theories that may or may not be correct we should not speak. We believe that it is right to proclaim the near approach of the Second Advent. But when men—who have before been mistaken on the subject—undertake to state as a certainty revealed from God that the Second Advent will take place in 1866, 1867, 1868, or any other specific time, we have no hesitation in pronouncing them wise in their own conceits and above what is written. "The secret things belong unto YAHVEH." Our own opinion, drawn from considerable study of the Scriptures, is that those who have part in the resurrection and translation at Christ's coming will have no other warning than that which is given by the signs of the times. If the Lord should come to-day he would not overtake as a thief those who believe that he is nigh even at the doors, to which number we claim to belong.

There is no room for any doubt on this subject if our Saviour's words in Matt. xxiv. have their application at his second coming. Let us heed "The shepherd of the sheep." "The sheep hear his voice: [the voice of "the West" to the contrary notwithstanding] and he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out....and the sheep follow him, for they know his voice. And a stranger [of the West] will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers." "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear"

THE VOICE OF JESUS. "Now learn a parable of the fig tree: When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these, know that He is near, at the doors....But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, uot the angels of heaven, but my Father only....Then shall two be in the field [evidently at their daily labor—Does not this imply that they will not foreknow the time?]; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have kept awake, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh. Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. Verily I say unto you, that he shall make him ruler over all his goods." J. T. C.

Murder.

When men stand up as teachers of the public, the very least that decency asks of them is that they make some endeavors to acquaint themselves with that which they profess to treat. This is especially required when religion is the subject. In his rich mercy, our Heavenly Father has bestowed upon us the Holy Scriptures not only to be read and studied, but also to be reverenced. No man has a right to make any critical or doctrinal statements unless he has made a reasonable effort to know whereof he affirms. There are many things in the Scriptures which may be fairiy understood by a plain reader, so that every one is justified in using his gift for general instruction in holy things; but there are some subjects that require a more special research, and therefore may not be carelessly treated by any but the presumptuous; who, being outside of the pale of law, may be expected to do about as they please.

Of all the themes that have been ill-treated by ignorant pretension and Uzzah-like irreverence in the name of Christianity, the Coming Kingdom of Jesus Christ appears to fare the worst. One reason is that a great many men and women are ready to swallow anything that is sugared over by their chosen incompetents. The latest pill of the kind that has come to our notice is done up in the editorial columns of the last Crisis. We would not call attention to it, did we not feel under solemn obligations to witness against the perversion of God's word. This, God being our helper, we will do as long as we live, "whether men will hear or whether they will forbear." The truth of God is everything to us, and as far as we are acquainted with it, we are determined to use it; as a light to guide the wayfarer, or as a sword to pierce the foe. The particular point we care nothing about, except to use it as an illustration.

"I would like to have you give in the Crisis all the light you have on Dan. viii. 4; especially on the term 'beasts,' for the benefit of the household of faith."

To which the Editor answers:

"The text reads as follows: 'I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great.'

"In the first place we will give the full definition (omitting the words in Hebrew type) of the word ghahy, rendered 'beasts' in the text, as found in the Hebrew lexicon of Gesenius, who is a standard author. In order that the reader, who may not have a Bible at hand, may fully understand the application and use of the word under consideration, we will quote the passage referred to by Gesenius."

Then follows a long quotation from Gesenius; after which comes the following:

"The foregoing is the full definition of the word ghahy, rendered 'beasts' in Dan. viii. 4. The word occurs 509 times in the Hebrew Scriptures, and is rendered "living," "life," "alive," etc., in harmony with the foregoing definition, 412 times; and might be thus rendered in all other places, and be in harmony with the context. It is not once used to represent a government, unless it is in the text under consideration; and if thus used there, it is contrary to the meaning of the word. We know of but one correct way to settle the meaning of a word, and that is, to examine all the passages where the word occurs; and after doing this, as in this case, and finding it never used symbolically to represent a political power, our own mind is fully settled that it is not used to denote governments in Dan. viii. 4, but people, properly represented by the word LIVING, as in Isa. xxxviii. 19, where the same word occurs as follows:—"The LIVING, the LIVING, he shall praise thee, as I do this day."

The best way to introduce the facts to the reader is to use an illustration. Every one knows that we have words in our language which have more than one meaning. Take the word "vessel" for instance. A tea-kettle is a vessel and a ship of war is a vessel. Hence when the word "vessel" is used, the connection must decide what kind of a vessel is meant. Now how ridiculous it would be to open Worcester to decide the meaning of "vessel" and merely take his first definition without going any farther. A friend says: "I saw a vessel coming up New York Bay." You immediately report that your friend saw a tea-kettle coming up New York Bay. Would you be competent to define English words? Well, you would be just as competent as the Editor of the Crisis is to define Hebrew, for he has made a like blunder. (Two years ago he did the same thing in the Grant and Curry discussion, in relation to the word Rephaim.) Can it be possible that the question in the Crisis was ironical? Was there anything meant by putting the "all" in italics? "I would like to have you give in the Crisis all the light you have." The worthy critic is accustomed to make "all" mean all creation when he reads John v. 28; but he will have to bring it down to nothing in this case. "If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness."

The word rendered "beasts" in Dan. viii. 4 is chayyoth. It is the plural of chayyah, which is the feminine of chay. Chay is sometimes used as an adjective, sometimes as a substantive. Our critic gives the quotations from Gesenius. Unfortunately for the light-bearer to the Crisis "household," he got hold of the wrong lesson. His object being to bolster up his time-pet, he thought it would not do to have cruel "beasts" in the way, for fear they might eat his pet. So he boldly affirms that the word "rendered 'beasts' in Dan. viii. 4 occurs 509 times in the Hebrew Scriptures, and is rendered 'living,' 'life,' 'alive,' etc. 412 times, and might be thus rendered in all other places, and be in harmony with the context." (The italics are ours.) If he had turned over one more leaf in Gesenius he might have seen a whole menagerie of beasts arrayed against his assertion. O, William Gesenius, you ought to be ashamed to expose such creatures to frighten our "hobby" of time! (Our Life Company must be amused to see those who have been crying "hobby" against us, now riding the sorriest kind of a "hobby.") It is now our turn to quote the great Hebraist.

"Chayyah . . pr. fem. of adj. chay, i. e. living, where see; then as subst. living thing, Hence

1. An animal, beast, e. g. chayyah ra-ah a ravenous beast Gen 37; 20, 33."

Let us try this "ravenous beast" and see if we can change him into an attribute of life for the accommodation of the Crisis "household of faith"! "Come now, therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit; and we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him. ....An evil beast hath devoured him."

We will not quote any more. One "evil beast" is enough for such a sickly theory as that of the Crisis. But if necessary Gesenius will supply a "crocodile," and "all kinds of beasts." Because a tea-kettle is a vessel, therefore the word vessel must always be rendered tea-kettle. That is Crisis logic.

The word "beast" occurs in the common

earth in the fall of the leaf, and sleeps till the life-giving sun again asserts its power, and awakens the bud or the seed to its new round of life. Air is the first and last want of our bodies. Our first cry and last gasp attest its power. The lungs are the two fire places of the system; air is the fuel; the fire smoulders in the air-tight stove till the valve is raised, when it bursts into flame: air, food, sleep, and the cheerful emotions, are the only restoratives to exhausted nerves and blood-vessels.

The Spirit of the "Harlot"

The Freeman's Journal & Catholic Register of this city advertises a new book entitled "The History of Protestant Priestcraft in Europe and America." We quote from the prospectus.

"All should subscribe who wish to acquaint themselves with historical facts of the greatest value atthe present time, or to arm themselves with arguments to oppose Puritanic Priestcraft, which, in addition to all other curses it has inflicted on our country, has now involved us in the most terrible sectional war, and threatens to follow it with a sectarian crusade far more awful, unless arrested by the dissemination of documents exposing its character and objects, such as the author has sought to make this History useful in accomplishing. Priestcraft is therein proved to be alike antagonistic to the true Christian religion, popular liberty, and the public peace and prosperity; and the political clergy are also proven to be servants of Satan, instead of ministers of the Prince of Peace, and their influence "evil, and only evil continually." Patriots will find a perusal of its pages of great advantage in enabling them to fight the hydra-headed monster that must be slain before we can hope for peace and a restoration of civil and religious liberty in our country."

The Right Talk.

The Presbyterian (N. S.) General Assembly, which has just closed its ten days session in Brooklyn, has adopted a minute on the state of the Country, from which we extract these timely words:

"Let it not be said that, as a church, we have nothing to do with civil legislation. The day has gone by when an intelligent Christian will affirm the doctrine, that what is wrong in religion is right in politics. God has taught us, in this war, that the Church must conserve the State by instructing the people in the great principles of justice, and inspiring them to practice the same. Without the teaching and the inspiration of the Church, the patriotism of this nation would never have nerved itself for the permanent and heroic defense of freedom (and this is but another name for justice) which has crushed the treason that sought to assassinate the State. We wish all men to know that the members of our churches are bound to be Christians, in politics as well as in religion. God hath made us responsible according to our numbers and our intelligence, for the welfare and healthful legislation of the State. To meet this responsibility, our Christian patriots must exert themselves to influence the primary meetings for the nomination of fit men, to secure the election of good, pure men to office, and when nominated themselves to remember the duty of assisting their country, and illustrating both their piety and patriotism by consenting to serve her."

The Assembly also adopted the following resolution, which was adopted by the Presbyterian (O. S.) General Assembly at Pittsburg:

"Resolved, That a committee of four ministers and three laymen be appointed by this meeting to present this subject to the General Assembly, and to be associated with a similar committee to be appointed by that body, in devising plans by which a general and concerted movement of all the Protestant forces of the land may be brought about, and bold, continuous, and vigorous protest, by word and act, shall be enunciated against both infidelity and Roman Catholicism, the arch-enemies of truth in the midst of the professing Church of God, and arch-traitors to civil and religious freedom throughout the world."

Wasted Thoughts.

Few persons know how much it costs to write a good article for a good daily or weekly journal. Days and even weeks, of the very best talent, are sometimes spent upon a single column. Whole libraries are examined to illustrate or substantiate a single position. The light of ancient and modern days is concentrated upon it. This article is printed and sent into the world—a world of ignorance and suffering, where such articles are sometimes worth a thousand times their weight in gold. They are brought to men's doors, and thrown upon their tables. But alas! how few of the busy multitude read them! How many less reflect upon them, and still less understand and profit by them?

How often do we see the very best religious papers, after being skimmed over for a few items of news and anecdotes, thrown into the waste-drawer, used to do up ends of codfish or tobacco, or to light a cigar.

That immortal truth which costs so much to elaborate, and which so many are perishing for the want of, so far as thousands are concerned, has vanished in the air. Those very persons who least prized the truth, were those who most needed it.

Often have we thought, when reading some soul stirring article, what a pity that so few in the world will read and profit by this. Not one in twenty in the small circle will see it, and not more than give it a passing glance.

The world is rich in knowledge, yet the great mass are starving and dying for want of it. After it had been dug from the mine with hard toil, and prepared with wise discrimination, for their special benefit, they turn from it with utter neglect.—Congregationalist.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, MAY 31, 1865.

"Ask, and it shall be Given."

The more we consider the condition of God's dear children, the more do we realize the importance of having a spirit of entire dependence on him. We are apt to be led away by the pantheistic idea that God, being every where in general, and no where in particular, working every where in general, and no where in particular, is therefore so immeasurably removed from us as individuals, that it is useless for us to expect his especial notice. This idea is pernicious, and like a noxious weed, should be uprooted before it has acquired a hold that we can not overcome. What can God say more than he hath said to assure us of his especial love? "Like as a father pitieth his children, so Yahveh pitieth them that fear him." "Yahveh preserveth all them that love him." Many other quotations might be given to establish the clear preference given by the Almighty to them that love him. Now if he makes a distinction between the different classes of mankind, between those that love him and those who do not, we have the principle of partiality established, and there is nothing to prevent our carrying it out as far as we see to be consistent with the facts of revelation and of our common experience.

But some man will say,—"You are wrong, for 'God is no respecter of persons.'" We wish that men, professed Christians at least, would read the Bible enough to understand what they quote. It is not unqualifiedly true that God is no respecter of persons; on the contrary he is the most rigid respecter of persons in the Universe. He respects the good above the evil, the zealous above the lukewarm, the devoted above the careless, the reverential above the profane, and so on indefinitely. What is more, he respects the children for the fathers' sakes. He says so over and over again in his word. "I have never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread" was the testimony of the Psalmist. Because of his promise to Abraham he has blessed, doth bless, and will bless his natural seed with peculiar blessings. The idea that God is not partial is a mistaken one.

What then does Paul mean? Let us read the whole passage. "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons." Col. iii. 25. That is, God will punish the evil-doer, no matter what his position in life, for He does not respect persons as men often do. The Apostle is speaking of the relation of masters and servants, and would teach that God will punish a wicked master as readily as a wicked servant. In his epistle to the Romans, Paul also says that God does not respect persons; but there he is speaking of the great universal scheme of salvation which ultimately saves the worthy of all nations. But all this does not militate against the plain fact that God makes a difference between persons. And what are we that we should murmur?

Did not God respect his servant Daniel, and make communications to him of a peculiar and wonderful nature? Why? Because Daniel struggled in prayer and earnestly sought the Lord's face. On one occasion, spoken of in Daniel ix., Gabriel was sent with a message, and informed the prophet that "the commandment came forth at the beginning of his supplications." So anxious was the Almighty to honor his servant. Was there no respect of persons here? Hundreds of proofs might be adduced from the Scriptures, but enough has been said to enable us to consider our privileges. Let us learn to put entire and absolute dependence on God in every thing. "Let us come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need." "Draw nigh unto God, and he will draw nigh unto you." Come, Lord, drive out unbelief and doubt, and take full possession of our hearts. "Quicken us and we shall call upon thy name!" J. T. C.

The Poet "Young" on Immortality.

By referring to our outside, it will be seen that the following is an appendix. It completes the notice of Young's argument from nature; some other time we may consider his argument from man, which will be found as futile as its predecessor. The poet's first argument was based on the revolution in nature; let us now hear his next—on the gradation.

"If nature's revolution speaks aloud,
In her gradation hear her louder still.
Look nature through, 'tis neat gradation all.
By what minute degree her scale ascends!
Each middle nature join'd at each extreme,
To that above it join'd, to that beneath.
Parts, into parts reciprocally shot,
Abhor divorce: what love of union reigns!
Here dormant matter waits a call to life;
Half-life, half-death, join there: here, life and sense;
There, sense from reason steals a glimmering ray;
Reason shines out in man. But how preserved
The chain unbroken upward to the realms
Of incorporal life? those realms of bliss,
Where death has no dominion? Grant a make
Half-mortal, half-immortal; earthy, part,
And part ethereal; grant the soul of man
Eternal; or in man the series ends.
Wide yawns the gap; connection is no more:
Check'd reason halts; her next step wants support;
Striving to climb, she tumbles from her scheme;
A scheme, analogy pronounced so true;
"Analogy, man's surest guide below."

"Analogy" is an excellent thing, but like many other excellent things it may be carried too far. The foregoing description of the "gradation" in "nature" is fine, but the gradation may also be carried too far. Our poet is anxious to preserve "the chain unbroken upward to the realms of incorporeal life." But how does he know that such a chain exists? We consider the doctrine dangerous; for the supposition of a chain leading, link by link, from he lowest plane in nature up to God, would justify the supposition that the chain has always existed. To make the chain complete in the present we have to "grant a make half mortal, half immortal; earthy, part, and part ethereal." Must there not be the same link in the past? Hence this peculiar being called man must have always existed. But our poet did not believe this latter proposition. He said with us that man had a beginning. Where, then, was the chain of gradation before this essential link was made? If we do not grant it now, we know the consequences. "Wide yawns the gap." Without man there is a gap. Then before man was created there was a gap; and a gap in the past is just as incomprehensible as a gap in the present. If it was, it may be. Snap goes the chain of gradation and down "tumbles" the suspended "analogy"—not a very "sure guide" in this case. These analogies in nature are very pretty if we keep them within bounds; but the truth is, immortality is beyond nature. Immortality belongs to the God of Nature—"who only hath immortality;" 1 Tim. vi. 16. Let not "corruptible man" presume to link himself with the incorruptible God" lest he "worship and serve the creature rather than the Creator;" Rom. i. 23, 25. Let not "the truth of God"—immortality is the prerogative only of the Divine—be "changed into a lie"—immortality belongs to the human. If we ever become immortal it will be, not because of any gradation or revolution in nature, but because we are made "partakers of the divine nature;" 2 Pet. i. 4. The Holy Spirit the only link between God and man, and without that link, man must inevitably sink back to the black darkness of nonentity. "That which is begotten of the flesh is flesh; and that which is begotten of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that ye must be begotten from above." John iii. J. T. C.

Isaiah on American Slavery.

The great truth that the seed of the lost ten tribes are identical with the Teutonic race throws a light on the prophetic word that is truly startling. We are now satisfied that the fifty-eight chapter of Isaiah contains a prediction of the Anti-Slavery movement in these United States. "Cry aloud, spare not; lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sin." [not "sins"]. Here reference is made to some great national sin, which the context explains. It is the sin of oppression. The exhortation—"Cry aloud" has certainly been faithfully observed for the last thirty years. All history may be searched in vain for another such faithful crying out against national transgression. The command was not only to "cry aloud," but also, "Spare not." This immediately calls up the forms of the various uncompromising national scourgers, having their representative in Wendell Phillips, the utterer of more political truth than any man of his day. Surely the first verse of the chapter has been signally fulfilled.

"Yet they seek me daily, and delight to know my ways, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of their God: they ask of me the ordinances of justice; they take delight in approaching to God." This is a description of the abundance of religious pretension which co-existed with the oppression. The hypocrisy of Christians was evidenced in the well-known cards posted in the noon-day prayer meetings of 1857 prohibiting any reference to the great crime of the nation, in the action of the leading Church bodies, which set their faces like a flint against anti slavery agitation; in the wicked stifling of every sympathetic word for the bond-man by the American Tract Society and other religious corporations. The American church as a whole was dead while she lived, a whited sepulchre of religious profession without, but full of pro-slavery corruption within. God saw it all, and said:—"Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this"—and down came the red bolts of his indignation. The nation found itself in the coils of the serpent of rebellion. Battle after battle was fought, defeat and disgrace seemed to cling to the starry banner, and all was dark. Then we began to fast and pray. Still no relief. We were astonished. Then we said, in the language of the prophet:

"Wherefore have we fasted, and thou seest not? wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge?" And the answer came back, "Behold, in the day of your fast ye find pleasure, and exact all your labors." How exactly was this language fulfilled! Was ever pleasure-seeking carried to such an extent as since the beginning ofthe rebellion? Was it not the subject of particular remark by the newspapers of the day? and still we "exacted all our labors"—still the abomination that caused our troubles was permitted to exist, while Northern amusements went on as "merry as a marriage bell." And God further said: "Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the first of wickedness: ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high. Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a man to afflict his soul a day? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor tht are cast out to thy house? when thou seet the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?"

At length the voice of God became the voice of the people, and the emancipation of the negro was determined in the national councils. No sooner did we earnestly set ourselves to do justice than the flood tide of victory came in with steady volume, and peace came with unlooked for suddenness. This, too, was predicted by the prophet: "Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily; and thy righteousness shall go before thee: the glory of Yahveh shall be thy rereward. Then shalt thou call, and Yahveh shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am."

The work of righteous repentance is to be completed by the enfranchisement of the chattels, and the abolition of the vile spirit of caste. The negro will have his social equality fully recognized. This also is asserted by the prophet: "If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity [the use of disparaging and contemptous epithets, as for example, the word "nigger," which is often used by professed Christians—to their shame be it spoken]: and if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in darkness, and thy darkness be as the noon. And Yahveh shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones: and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not."

The grand consequence of this national repentance is yet to be seen. This same nation that looses the bands of wickedness, and breaks every yoke will yet furnish instruments in God's hands to restore Palestine to her ancient splendor, for says the prophet: "And they that be of thee shall build the old waste places; thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in."

Isaiah is not the only prophet that speaks of our relation to the African. Zephaniah says: "From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering." Zeph. iii. 10. God's dispersed is Israel; who is the daughter of his dispersed? Yahveh, through Micah (iv. 6, 7) said,—"In that day will I assemble her that halteth [Judah], and I will gather her that is driven out and her that I have afflicted [Israel]; and I will make her that halted a remnant [the Jews], and her that was cast far off A STRONG NATION" [the American nation]. The daughter of God's dispersed is evidently the American church—the "suppliants"—worshippers—of the nation. They will bring an "offering" to God "from beyond the rivers of Ethiopia"—the African church. Zephaniah points to the latter in the context (v. 12) "I will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of Yahveh." Could a better description be given, and in fewer words? J. T. C.

Wanted---

By the Greek and Hebrew languages, decent treatment from Advent preachers. We wonder that the former language especially does not die of strangulation. Ignorance before pretension, say we. No one is to blame for being ignorant if he improves his opportunities. A man is accepted according to that he hath, not according to that he hath not. "I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue." Our remarks are suggested by the following, in an exchange: "The glorious doctrine of the resurrection to Zoen-life has been demonstrated. "What kind of a life is that? A life-life, a living-life, or a life alive—which? J. T. C.

The Time of the Second Advent.

It would be a singular fact, were not inconsistency so prominent in human affairs, that men who are first in predicting the time of the Second Advent are determined to remain in the dark with reference to the effect of that event on the race of mankind. They have a zeal, but not according to knowledge. The only idea they have is that Christ is coming in a year or two to burn the world, and to usher in the immortal age in completion. All the explicit declarations of God through the holy prophets, concerning the restoration of Israel, the re-constrction of David's throne, the distinction between the priest-kings of the coming age and the subjects of the kingdom, and the future blessing of "all the families of the earth" are ignored. Well, let them go on in their unhealthy agitation; we will do our humble part in protesting against it. The Voice of the West, May 16, ends a time article thus:

"The 1260 and the 1335 days, or years, begin together. This is a settled point among commentators. This being so, we can now answer the question, Where are we? The periods of 1260 and 1335 beginning in A. D. 533, the first must end with the sitting of the judgment in 1793, and the last will end with the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the just in 1868.

Dear reader, do not turn a deaf, or skeptical ear to this conclusion. Please look at the argument. Is it not only plausible, but also sound and true? Do we not stand on the threshold of the glorious kingdom of God? And please remember that while there are disputes about the chain events connected with the longer periods, there can be none in relation to these shorter ones. The light is clear on these, and no one has as yet ventured to criticise this argument."

The editor of the Herald of Life has repeatedly called attention to the fact that no evidence exists that the time of the Lord's coming is revealed. And with all necessary respect for the champions of time, we think that a principal leader in the original time movement, who has also been the means under God of opening the greatest truths to the people, and in the face of many who now despise his mature counsels, and who has given as much evidence at least of his fitness for teaching as any time theorist living, should be answered before the statement is made that "no one has as yet ventured to criticise this argument." It is by such wholesale neglect of facts that some people thrive.

The Voice speaks of the period of 1260 years. We answer that there is no mention made of any such period in God's book. Prove that there is such a period before you guess at its commencement. That "the time, times, and a half" of Daniel and Revelation are equal to 1260 years is pure assumption.

This assumed period of 1260 years is commenced A. D. 533. Here is another pure assumption.

The 1335 days of Dan. xii. 12 are called years. Another assumption.

The assumed 1260 years and the assumed 1335 years are said to "begin together." Another assumption.

The assumed 1335 years are predicted to end with the coming of Christ in 1868. An assumption of assumptions.

After assuming every point, the Voice asks us to "look at the argument" and tells us that "the light is clear." Yes, "clear as mud." Every thing is clear to men who are satisfied with assumptions. The Voice tells us elsewhere in the same issue that the forty-ninth year was the year of Jubilee. Moses says: "Ye shall hallow the fiftieth year....it shall be a jubilee unto you....a jubilee [shall the fiftieth year be unto you." Lev. xxv. 10, 11. But to the Voice "there is nothing clearer" then "that Moses directly and explicitly teaches" that the jubilee was the forty-ninth year.

We refer to this subject of time to warn people against placing undue depedence on time theories. If they were held simply as theories that may or may not be correct we should not speak. We believe that it is right to proclaim the near approach of the Second Advent. But when men—who have before been mistaken on the subject—undertake to state as a certainty revealed from God that the Second Advent will take place in 1866, 1867, 1868, or any other specific time, we have no hesitation in pronouncing them wise in their own conceits and above what is written. "The secret things belong unto Yahveh." Our own opinion, drawn from considerable study of the Scriptures, is that those who have part in the resurrection and translation at Christ's coming will have no other warning than that which is given by the signs of the times. If the Lord should come to-day he would not overtake as a thief those who believe that he is nigh even at the doors, to which number we claim to belong.

There is no room for any doubt on this subject if our Saviour's words in Matt. xxiv. have their application at his second coming. Let us heed "The shepherd of the sheep." "The sheep hear his voice: [the voice of "the West" to the contrary notwithstanding] and he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out....and the sheep follow him, for they know his voice. And a stranger]of the West] will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers." "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear"

The Voice of Jesus. "Now learn a parable of the fig tree: When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these, know that He is near, at the doors....But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, uot the angels of heaven, but my Father only....Then shall two be in the field [evidently at their daily labor—Does not this imply that they will not foreknow the time?]; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have kept awake, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh. Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. Verily I say unto you, that he shall make him ruler over all his goods." J. T. C.

Murder.

When men stand up as teachers of the public, the very least that decency asks of them is that they make some endeavors to acquaint themselves with that which they profess to treat. This is especially required when religion is the subject. In his rich mercy, our Heavenly Father has bestowed upon us the Holy Scriptures not only to be read and studied, but also to be reverenced. No man has a right to make any critical or doctrinal statements unless he has made a reasonable effort to know whereof he affirms. There are many things in the Scriptures which may be fairly understood by a plain reader, so that every one is justified in using his gift for general instruction in holy things; but there are some subjects that require a more special research, and therefore may not be carelessly treated by any but the presumptuous; who, being outside of the pale of law, may be expected to do about as they please.

Of all the themes that have been ill-treated by ignorant pretension and Uzzah-like irreverence in the name of Christianity, the Coming Kingdom of Jesus Christ appears to fare the worst. One reason is that a great many men and women are ready to swallow anything that is sugared over by their chosen incompetents. The latest pill of the kind that has come to our notice is done up in the editorial columns of the last Crisis. We would not call attention to it, did we not feel under solemn obligations to witness against the perversion of God's word. This, God being our helper, we will do as long as we live, "whether men will hear or whether they will forbear." The truth of God is everything to us, and as far as we are acquainted with it, we are determined to use it; as a light to guide the wayfarer, or as a sword to pierce the foe. The particular point we care nothing about, except to use it as an illustration.

"I would like to have you give in the Crisis all the light you have on Dan. viii. 4; especially on the term 'beasts,' for the benefit of the household of faith."

To which the Editor answers:

"The text reads as follows: 'I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great.'

"In the first place we will give the full definition (omitting the words in Hebrew type) of the word ghahy, rendered 'beasts' in the text, as found in the Hebrew lexicon of Gesenius, who is a standard author. In order that the reader, who may not have a Bible at hand, may fully understand the application and use of the word under consideration, we will quote the passage referred to by Gesenius."

Then follows a long quotation from Gesenius; after which comes the following:

"The foregoing is the full definition of the word ghahy, rendered 'beasts' in Dan. viii. 4. The word occurs 509 times in the Hebrew Scriptures, and is rendered "living," "life," "alive," etc., in harmony with the foregoing definition, 412 times; and might be thus rendered in all other places, and be in harmony with the context. It is not once used to represent a government, unless it is in the text under consideration; and if thus used there, it is contrary to the meaning of the word. We know of but one correct way to settle the meaning of a word, and that is, to examine all the passages where the word occurs; and after doing this, as in this case, and finding it never used symbolically to represent a political power, our own mind is fully settled that it is not used to denote governments in Dan. viii. 4, but people, properly represented by the word LIVING, as in Isa. xxxviii. 19, where the same word occurs as follows:—"The LIVING, the LIVING, he shall praise thee, as I do this day."

The best way to introduce the facts to the reader is to use an illustration. Every one knows that we have words in our language which have more than one meaning. Take the word "vessel" for instance. A tea-kettle is a vessel and a ship of war is a vessel. Hence when the word "vessel" is used, the connection must decide what kind of a vessel is meant. Now how ridiculous it would be to open Worcester to decide the meaning of "vessel" and merely take his first definition without going any farther. A friend says: "I saw a vessel coming up New York Bay." You immediately report that your friend saw a tea-kettle coming up New York Bay. Would you be competent to define English words? Well, you would be just as competent as the Editor of the Crisis is to define Hebrew, for he has made a like blunder. (Two years ago he did the same thing in the Grant and Curry discussion, in relation to the word Rephaim.) Can it be possible that the question in the Crisis was ironical? Was there anything meant by putting the "all" in italics? "I would like to have you give in the Crisis all the light you have." The worthy critic is accustomed to make "all" mean all creation when he reads John v. 28; but he will have to bring it down to nothing in this case. "If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness."

The word rendered "beasts" in Dan. viii. 4 is chayyoth. It is the plural of chayyah, which is the feminine of chay. Chay is sometimes used as an adjective, sometimes as a substantive. Our critic gives the quotations from Gesenius. Unfortunately for the light-bearer to the Crisis "household," he got hold of the wrong lesson. His object being to bolster up his time-pet, he thought it would not do to have cruel "beasts" in the way, for fear they might eat his pet. So he boldly affirms that the word "rendered 'beasts' in Dan. viii. 4 occurs 509 times in the Hebrew Scriptures, and is rendered 'living,' 'life,' 'alive,' etc. 412 times, and might be thus rendered in all other places, and be in harmony with the context." (The italics are ours.) If he had turned over one more leaf in Gesenius he might have seen a whole menagerie of beasts arrayed against his assertion. O, William Gesenius, you ought to be ashamed to expose such creatures to frighten our "hobby" of time! (Our Life Company must be amused to see those who have been crying "hobby" against us, now riding the sorriest kind of a "hobby.") It is now our turn to quote the great Hebraist.

"Chayyah . . pr. fem. of adj. chay, i. e. living, where see; then as subst. living thing, Hence 1. An animal, beast, e. g. chayyah ra-ah a ravenous beast Gen 37; 20, 33."

Let us try this "ravenous beast" and see if we can change him into an attribute of life for the accommodation of the Crisis "household of faith"! "Come now, therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit; and we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him. ....An evil beast hath devoured him."

We will not quote any more. One "evil beast" is enough for such a sickly theory as that of the Crisis. But if necessary Gesenius will supply a "crocodile," and "all kinds of beasts." Because a tea-kettle is a vessel, therefore the word vessel must always be rendered tea-kettle. That is Crisis logic.

The word "beast" occurs in the common version of the book of Daniel nineteen times, the word in the text referred to in the Crisis being the nineteenth instance and every time it comes from the Hebrew word aforesaid. The curious reader may endeavor to apply Eld. Grant's definition in these places, and observe its wonderful "harmony with the context."

But the worst feature of the matter is yet to be noticed. The great luminary says of the Hebrew word in question,—"It is not once used to represent a government, unless it is in the text under consideration; and if thus used there, it is contrary to the meaning of the word." To which we reply: This very word applies to governments in NINE of the nineteen instances aforesaid, before we come to the text in question, to wit: Dan. vii. 3, 5, 6, 7, twice, 11, 12, 17, 19, 23. When shall we have done with such wholesale murder of God's word? J. T. C.

Dr. Chalmers in the Pulpit.

We remember well our first hearing Dr. Chalmers. We were in a moorland district in Tweeddale, rejoicing in the country, after nine months in the High School. We heard that the famous preacher was to be at a neighboring parish church, and off we set, a cartful of irrepressible youngsters. "Calm was all nature as a resting wheel."

The crows, instead of making wing, were impudent and sat still; the cart horses were standing, knowing the day, at the field gates, gossiping and gazing, idle and happy; the moor was stretching away in the pale sunlight—vast, dim, melancholy, like a sea; everywhere were to be seen the gathering people, "sprinklings of blythe company;" the country side seemed moving to some center. As we entered the kirk we saw a notorious character, who had much of the brutal look of what he worked in, with the knowing eye of a man of the city, a sort of big Peter Bell—

He had a hardness in his eye,
He had a hardness in his cheek.

He was our terror, and we not only wondered, but we were afraid when we saw him going in. How different in looks to a brisk town congregation! There was a fine leisureliness and a vague stare; eyebrows raised and mouths open, as is the habit with those who speak little, and look much at far-off objects. The minister comes in, homely in the dress and gait, but having a great look about him, like a mountain among hills. The High School boys thought him like a "big one of ourselves." He looked vaguely round upon his audience, as if he saw in it one great object, not many. We shall never forget his smile! its general benignity; how he let the light of his countenance upon us. He read a few verses quietly; then prayed briefly, solemnly, with his eyes wide open all the time, but not seeing. Then he gave out his text; we forget it, but its subject was, "Death reigns." He stated slowly, calmly, the simple meaning of the words, what death was, and how and why it reigned; then suddenly he started, and looked like a man who had seen some great sight, and was breathless to declare it; he told us how Death reigned—everywhere, at all times, at all places; how we all know it; how we would yet know more of it. The drover who had sat down in the table seat opposite, was gazing up in a state of stupid excitement; he seemed restless; but never kept his eyes from the speaker. The tide set in—everything added to its power, deep called to deep, imagery and illustration poured in; and every now and then the theme—the simple, terrible statement, was repeated at some lucid interval.

After overwhelming us with proofs of the reign of Death, and transferring to us his intense urgency and emotion; and after shrieking as if in despair, these words, "Death is a tremendous necessity," he suddenly looked beyond us, as if into some distant region, and cried out, "Behold a mightier! who is this? He cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, glorious in his apparel, speaking in righteousness, traveling toward men in the greatness of his strength, mighty to save." Then, in a few plain sentences, he stated the truth as to sin entering, and death by sin, and death passing upon all. Then he took fire once more, and enforced, with redoubled energy and richness, the freeness, the simplicity, the security of the great method of justification. How astonished and impressed we all were! He was at the full thunder—the whole man was in an agony of earnestness. The drover was weeping like a child, the tears were running down his ruddy coarse cheeks; his face opened out and smoothed like an infant's; his whole body stirred with emotion. We all had insensibly been drawn out of our seats, and were converging toward the wonderful speaker. And when he sat down, after warning each one of us to remember who it was that followed death on his pale horse, and how alone we could escape, we all sunk back into our seats. How beautiful to our eyes did the thunderer look—exhausted, but sweet and pure. How he poured out his soul before his God, in giving thanks for sending the abolisher of Death! Then, a short psalm, and all was ended.—North British Review.

Unconsciousness of the Time of Conversion.

I could gladly, thou sayest, attend with patience upon the great and happy work of exciting grace, were I but sure that I had it—could I but be persuaded of the truth of my conversion. But it is my great misery, that here I am at a sad and uncomfortable loss; for I have been taught that every true convert can assign the time, the place, the means, the manner of his conversion; can show how near he was brought to the gates of death, how close to the very verge of hell, when God, by a mighty and outstretched arm, snatched him away, in his own sensible apprehension, from the pit, and suddenly rescued him from that destruction, and put him into a new state of spiritual life and undoubted salvation. All which I cannot do; not finding in myself any such sudden and vehement concussion and heart-breaking, any such forcible and irresistible operation of God's Spirit within me. I am not able to mention the sermon that converted me, or those particular approaches that my soul made toward a hardly-recovered desperation.

My son, it is not safe for any man to take upon him to set limits to the ways of the Almighty, or to prescribe certain rules to the proceedings of his infinite wisdom. That most free and all-wise agent will not be tied always to walk in one path, but varies his course according to the pleasure of his own will. One man he calls suddenly, another by leisure; one by a kind of holy violence, as he did Paul; another by sweet solicitations, as Philip, Nathaniel, Andrew, Peter, Matthew, and the rest of the apostles. One man he draws to heaven with gracious invitations; another he drives thither by a strong hand.

We have known those who, having misspent their early life in notoriously wicked courses, living as without God, and even against him, have been suddenly stricken with some powerful denunciation of judgment, which hath so wrought upon them as to bring them within sight of hell, who, after long and deep humiliation, have been raised up, through God's mercy, to a comfortable sense of the Divine favor, and have proceeded to a very high degree of regeneration, and lived and died saints. But this is not every man's case. Some have, from their infancy, been brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; have been trained up under a godly and conscientious ministry, where they have been continually plied with the effectual means of grace, precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little; and have insensibly received the gracious operations of the Spirit of God, though not without many inward strifes with temptations, and sad fits of humiliation for their particular failings, forming them, by degrees, to a state of holy obedience. These, therefore, cannot expect to find any sensible alteration in themselves. As well may the child know when he was born, as these know the instant of their spiritual regeneration; and as well may they see the grass to grow, as they can perceive their insensible increase of grace. It is enough that the child attaining to the use of reason now knows that he was born; and that, when we see the grass higher than we left it, we know that it has grown. Let it, then, suffice thee, my son, to know that the thing is done, though thou canst not define the time and manner of doing it. Be not curious about particular perceptions, while thou mayest be assured of the reality and truth of the grace wrought in thee. Thou seest the skillful surgeon, when he wants to make an issue in the body of his patient, can do it either by a sudden incision or a slow corrosive; both agree to one end, and equally tend toward health. Trust God with thyself, and let him alone with his own work. What is it to thee which way he thinks best to bring about thy salvation?—Bishop Hall.

Beginning Family Prayer.

The commencement of this sacred and delightful duty must often be attended by difficulties, where the head of the family has for years neglected it. "I have never done anything since I became a Christian," writes one, "which required so much self-denial, and which was so truly a bearing of the cross, as beginning family worship. I felt that it was a duty from the time I devoted myself to the service of Christ, but I shrunk from its performance so painfully, that day after day, and week after week, passed away without my attempting it. At length conscience remonstrated so loudly, and my conviction that it was a sin to neglect it was so strong, I determined to make the effort to perform it the ensuing morning, cost what it would. It occasioned me a wakeful night; again and again I implored strength from on high. I was constitutionally timid, and when the morning came, was much agitated.

"Before breakfast I said to my wife, 'I feel, C——, as if we ought to have prayer in the family. We have all souls to be saved, and need God's blessing. I am sure you will not object to it.' 'No,' she replied, but the tone in which she said it was not encouraging. When we arose from the breakfast table it seemed the children had never been so noisy before, and it required an effort to request them to keep silence, and be seated. They did so, but I felt that their eyes were fixed wonderingly upon me. I took the large Bible from the shelf, and sat down. I wished to preface the service with some remarks, but I could not trust my voice, and I opened the book and reap the first chapter that presented itself. I then knelt, and with faltering voice began to address the Creator. But my hesitation soon passed off. I knew not why it was, but during the performance of this service, my soul was so filled with the thoughts of God's great goodness in permitting me to approach him, and place myself and those dear to me under the shelter of his protecting love, that I forgot the presence of others, and poured out my heart in supplication for his blessing with as much fervor and freedom as I had ever done in secret. When I arose, I perceived my wife's eyes were moistened with tears.

"The conflict was over—the duty was entered on—and the peace which follows the consciousness of having done right came into my heart. Prayer with my beloved ones was no longer a burden, but a delightful privilege; and ere long I had the satisfaction of knowing that the heart of my companion ascended in full unison with my own to the throne of grace. I can now speak freely in my family of the value and sweetness of this service, and to many of them I believe the hour of prayer has become one of the most highly prized of all the day brings us."—Selected.

Paying an Old Debt.

A merchant very extensively engaged in commerce and located upon the Long Wharf, Boston, died intestate, February 18th, 1802, at the age of seventy-five. After his death, a package of very considerable size was found carefully tied up and labeled as follows:

"Notes, due-bills and accounts against sundry persons down along shore. Some of them may be got by suit and severe dunning. But the people are poor; most of them have had fisherman's luck. My children will do as they think best. Perhaps they will think, with me, that it is best to burn this package entire."

About a month after he died, the sons met together, when the elder brother, the administrator, produced the packet, and read the superscription, and asked what course should be taken in regard to it. Another brother, a few years younger than the eldest, a man of strong impulsive temperament, unable at that moment to express his feelings by words, while he brushed the tears from his eyes with one hand, by a spasmodic jerk of the other toward the fire-place, indicated his wish to have the packet put into the flames. It was suggested by another brother, that it might be well first to make a list of the debtors' names, and of the dates and amounts, that they be enabled as the intended discharge was for all, to inform such as might offer payment, that their debts were forgiven. On the following day they again assembled, and the list had been prepared, and all the notes, due-bills and accounts, which including interest, amounted to thirty thousand dollars, were committed to the flames.

It was about four months after our father's death, continued my informant, in the month of June, that I was sitting in my eldest brother's office, waiting for an opportunity to speak with him, when there came in a hard favored, little old man, who looked as if time and rough weather had been to the windward of him for seventy years. He asked if my brother was not the executor. My brother replied that he was administrator, as our father died intestate.

"Well," said the stranger, "I have come up from the Cape, to pay a debt I owed the old gentleman."

My brother requested him to take a seat, he being at the desk. The old man sat down, and putting on his glasses, drew out a very ancient pocket-book and began to count over his money. When he had finished, as he sat waiting his turn, slowly twirling his thumbs, with his old gray, meditative eyes upon the floor, he sighed, and I knew the money, as the phrase runs, came hard, and secretly wished that the old man's name might be found on the forgiven list. My brother was soon at leisure, and asked him the usual questions, his name, residence, &c. The original debt was four hundred and forty dollars. It had stood a long time, and with the interest, amounted to between seven and eight hundred dollars.—My brother went to his desk, and after examining the forgiven list attentively, a sudden smile lit upon his countenance, and told me the truth at a single glance. The old man's name was there! My brother quietly took a chair by his side, and conversation occurred between them which I shall never forget.

"Your note is outlawed," said he; "it was dated twelve years ago, payable in two years; there is no witness, and interest has never been paid; you are not bound to pay this note; we can never recover this amount."

"Sir," said the old man, "I wish to pay it. It is the only debt I have in the world. It may be outlawed here, but I have no child, and my old woman and I hope we have made our peace with God, and I wish to do so with man. I should like to pay it." And he laid the bank notes before my brother, requesting him to count them over.

"I cannot take the money," said my brother.

The old man became alarmed. "I have cast simple interest for twelve years, and counted it all over," said he. "I will pay you compound interest, if you require it. The debt ought to have been paid long ago; but your father was very indulgent,—he knew I'd been unlucky, and he told me not to worry about it."

My brother then set the matter before him, and taking the bank bills he returned them to the old man's pocket-book, telling him that, although our father left no formal will, he had recommended to his children to destroy certain notes, due-bills, and other evidences of debt, and release those who might be legally bound to pay them.

For a moment the worthy old man appeared to be stupefied. After he had collected himself, and wiping the tears from his eyes, he said: "From the time I heard of your father's death, I have raked and scraped, and pinched and spared, to get the money together for the debt. About ten days ago, I made up the sum within twenty-five dollars. My wife knew how much the payment of this debt lay on my spirits, and advised me to sell a cow and make up the difference, and get the heavy burden off my mind. I did so; and now what will my old woman say? I must go back to the Cape and tell her this good news. She'll probably repeat the very words she used when she put her hand on my shoulder as we parted—"I have never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."

Giving each of us a shake of the hand, and a blessing on our oldfather's memory, he went on his way rejoicing.

After a short silence, taking his pencil and making a cast—"There," said my brother, "your part of the amount would be so much. Contrive a plan to convey me your share of the pleasure derived from this operation, and the money is at your service."

Such is the simple tale, which I have told as it was told me. To add the evident moral, would be an insult to the reader.

Peace.

The surrender by their chief of all the Rebel forces westward of the Mississippi was consummated on Friday last at New Orleans, received by telegraph next day at Washington, and appropriately recognized by the President in an order through the War Department that all persons confined under sentences by Military tribunals of imprisonment during the War be at once discharged from custody. This is an official notification that the War is closed, that the authority of the Union is fully reestablished and respected from the St. John to the Rio Grande, and that the Great Rebellion is no more! Gen. Sheridan's Texas campaign is ended before it was fairly begun, and our armies can be reduced, so fast as the soldiers can be paid off, to a very moderate Peace establishment. So the day of national mourning for our lamented President Lincoln (Thursday, June 1) will be observed throughout nearly the whole extent of our vast country—in Little Rock and Montgomery, in Tallahassee and Galveston, as openly, as earnestly as in Boston and Chicago.

So ends the mightiest, grandest, bloodiest, most destructive, most momentous struggle in modern history, with the slave pens of Richmond and Charleston, the gin houses of Alabama, the cane mills of Louisiana and Texas; glowing in the light of the newly risen sun of Universal Freedom.—*N. A Horse in Spectacles.

"A well-known resident of the Twenty-second Ward has an old family horse, that for twenty years has done him service. The animal has always received the tenderest care—is in good condition and vigor, and can perform the duty required of him as well as many a roadster of but half his years. For some time past the quadruped evinced a tendency to stumble, and to strain his sight at objects close to him, in a manner that set the kind-hearted owner to devising a remedy. The gentleman judged the animal by his own case, and satisfied himself, that with a pair of spectacles, the horse would do as well as in his prime. An optican ground to order a pair of pebble glasses, about the size of the object glasses of a large-sized lorgnette. They were fixed in a frame over the horse's eyes. That animal is now a horse in spectacles, and not an elderly gentleman ever showed greater appreciation of the conveinence.—Philadelphia North American.

TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

New York & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union.

At the annual meeting of the members and friends of the New York and Brooklyn Life and Advent Union, held on the evening of February 4th, 1865, at 27 Cortland Street, New York, the following matters, relating to the interests and affairs of the Union, were attended to:—

Moved and adopted that the Treasurer's report as presented be accepted:

That the present fiscal year commence on the first of February 1865:

That the hiring of DODWORTH'S HALL, 806 Broadway, New York, for Sunday meetings be confirmed:

That we commence to hold meetings in Dodworth's Hall on Sunday, March 19, 1865:

That meetings be held the first Sunday, morning, afternoon, and evening; afterwards, morning and evening:

That the evening meetings in Dodworth's Hall may partake of the character of the Cooper Institute meetings:

That a Chairman be appointed for the evening meetings:

That LEONARD C. THORNE act as such chairman:

That the Cooper Institute meetings cease after commencing to occupy Dodworth's Hall:

That we very much desire that the third quarterly conference of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION," be held in New York, about the time of the Passover in April ensuing.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, it he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

THE SPIRIT OF POETRY.

"'Tis not the chime and flow of words, that move
In measured file, and metrical array;
'Tis not the union of returning sounds,
Nor all the pleasing artifice of rhyme,
And quantity, and accent, that can give
This all-pervading spirit to the ear,
Or blend it with the movings of the soul.
'Tis a mysterious feeling, which combines
Man with the world around him, in a chain
Woven of flowers, and dipped in sweetness till
He taste the high communion of his thoughts,
With all existences, in earth and heaven,
That meet him in the charm of grace and power.

"'Tis not the noisy babbler, who displays,
In studied phrase, and ornate epithet,
And rounded period, poor and vapid thoughts,
Which peep from out the cumbrous ornaments
That overload their littleness. Its words
Are few, but deep and solemn; and they break
Fresh from the fount of feeling, and are full
Of all that passion which on Carmel fired
The holy prophet,‡ when his lips were coals,
His language winged with terror, as when bolts
Leap from the brooding tempest, armed with wrath,
Commissioned to affright us and destroy."

‡ 1 Kings xviii. 21-40.

JAMES G. PERCIVAL.

THE MYSTERY OF IDENTITY.

The mind of man is a great mystery—almost as great as the existence of God. The philosophy of identity has never been mastered: we are half inclined to think that it is beyond our reach. The subject is rather metaphysical, than religious. Whatever may be the solution of the problem it cannot conflict with the great fundamentals of the Scriptures that man is mortal and incapable of thought when life is extinct; that he has no power of survivance in or revival from death; that future life is a gift of God through Christ, a resurrection life bestowed only upon those who go through a peculiar mysterious preparatory process in this life, the employed agent in which process is the Holy Spirit. Feeling perfectly assured on these points we are glad to witness the exchange of thought on the great mystery of identity.

We were much interested with an article in our Herald, May 3, by A. G. H. entitled "The Resurrection;" and again by an article, May 17, on "The Soul" by N. K. R. We heartily agree with the first writer in his conclusion "that the mind and character which has been formed in the natural body, will, at the coming of the LIFE-GIVER, be connected with a form like Christ's glorified body;" that "the LIFE-GIVER will remember, protect, and preserve what is essential in his children—that which eats and drinks of him, and will raise it up at the last day;" that "a spiritual body will be raised," for the excellent reason that "the Bible says so." "Thou sowest not that body that shall be....it is raised a spiritual body." 1 Cor. xv. We also agree with the last writer "that the man or the soul—the two being identical—is that which loves, hates, wishes, thinks, reasons." We do not assent to all that either writer affirms, but we are greatly interested in the main question, and welcome its candid and thoughtful investigation. The April Methodist Quarterly has a translation from a French Review against what is called "German Materialism." Those interested in the general subject of mind will be pleased to read some of it. J. T. C.

"We do not define personal identity, but we feel it. Each one of us knows that he continues to be himself at every moment of the duration which composes his being, and this is what we call identity. It manifests itself very clearly in three principal facts, thought, memory, and responsibility. The simplest fact of thought supposes that he who thinks abides the same at two different moments. All thought is successive; if this is questioned in judgment it will not be questioned in reasoning; if it is questioned in the simplest form of reasoning it will not be questioned in demonstration, which consists of a series of reasonings. We must admit that it is the same mind which continues through all the moments of a demonstration. Conceive three persons of whom one thinks a major, another a minor, the third a conclusion; will you have a common thought, a common demontration? No, the three elements must unite in one and the same mind. Memory brings us to the same conclusion. I remember only of myself, M. Royer Collard very justly said: exterior things and other persons enter into my memory only through having passed into my cognitive powers, and it is this cognition that I remember, not the thing itself. I could not, then, remember what another than I did, said or thought. Memory supposes a continued bond between the I of the past and the I of the present. Finally no one is responsible save for himself; if one is so for others it is only as he can act upon or by them. How could I answer for what another did before I was born? Thus thought, memory, responsibility are startling witnesses to our identity. That is one of the capital facts which characterize our mind. There is likewise in the human body a capital and characteristic fact, but it is the opposite of the preceding; this is what has been called the vital vortex, or the perpetual exchange of matter which goes on between living animals and the exterior world. We know that organized bodies have need of nutrition, that is, of borrowing from foreign bodies a certain quantity of matter to repair the losses that they continually suffer. If, indeed, living bodies preserved all acquired matter and incessantly introduced new, we ought to see their size constantly growing. This is what we do see up to a certain age; but this increase of size stops, and the body remains stationary in its dimensions. It is thereby evident that the body loses as much as it gains, and that life is a circulation. Further, the greatest naturalists have acknowledged the fact. I will above all cite the fine words of Cuvier. 'In living bodies,' says he, 'no particle keeps its place; all enter and depart in succession; life is a continual whirlpool, whose direction, all complicated as it is, remains constant, as well as the kind of particles which are drawn into it, but not the individual particles themselves. The present matter of the living body on the contrary, will soon be no longer in it, and yet it is the depository of a force which will constrain the future matter to move in the same path as itself. So the form of these bodies is more essential to them than their matter, since this constantly changes while that is preserved.'

Without insisting upon a fact whose confirmation will be found in all physiologists, let us say that the problem for materialists is to conciliate the personal identity of the mind with the perpetual mutability of the organized body. Now we must admit that materialists have not taken much pains to solve this problem, and Dr. Buechner does not even mention it. It does not depend upon him, however, that the identic should result from change, or unity from composition. If that is so, it must still be explained how it can be. The first explanation which might be given, is that indicated in the passage from Cuvier cited above. The vital whirlpool, it is said, has a constant direction; in the change of matter, there is alway something left, form. The materials are displaced and replaced, but always in the same order and in the same relations. Thus the features of the face remain ever nearly the same, despite the change of the parts; the scar always remains, though the wounded particles have long ago disappeared. The living body has a historic oneness, which results from the persistence of relations, and which is the foundation of the identity of the I.

Such an explanation, however, can only satisfy those who do not take good account of the conditions of the problem, for in supposing that we may explain this fixity of the type, whether individual or generic, by a simple play of matter, by chemical or mechanical action, it must not be forgotten that an identity so produced will ever be only an apparent and wholly external identity, like that of those petrifactions in which vegetable molecules have been gradually replaced by mineral molecules, without the form of the object's experiencing any change. I say that such an object is not really identical, and especially that it is not so to itself, and that in such a theory you will find no foundation for the consciousness and the memory of identity, for I demand, where will you place memory in this ever-moving object? Shall it be in the elements, in the molecules themselves? But as they disappear, those which enter cannot remember those that depart. Shall it be in the relation of the particles? It must be, for that is the only thing that truly continues; but what is a relation which itself thinks, remembers, and is responsible? These are so many unintelligible abstractions to which our readers are welcome.

One might turn to the following hypothesis. It might be said: In proportion as the molecules enter into the body, for instance into the brain, they place themselves where the preceding ones were; there they are found in the same relation with the neighboring particles, they are drawn into the same vortex as those they replace. Ah well? so, by hypothesis, thought is a vibration of the cerebral fibers; since to-day everything is explained by vibrations, each new molecule will come in its turn to vibrate exactly as the preceding; it will give the same note, and you will believe you hear the same sound; this then will be the same thought, though the molecule has changed. Having the same thought, the man will be the same individual. Such an explanation, however, is nowise satisfactory, for identity of persons is not attached to identity of thoughts. I may vacillate between the most opposite ideas and feelings without ceasing to be myself; two men thinking of the same thing at once, the series of numbers for example, will not therefore become one and the same man; several cords emitting the same sound are not one cord. Thus identity of vibrations no more than persistence in form, explains the consciousness of personal identity.

It may be rejoined: "You reason upon a false theory. You seem to believe that the human brain totally changes from moment to moment, from second to second. This is not so; the brain only changes in succession. On the other hand is the I then immobile? Does it not change also from moment to moment? Is the youth the same as the mature man, the mature as the aged man? So neither is change absolute in the body, nor immobility in the soul. Could we not come into harmony? The consciousness of identity in us would correspond to the durable part of the brain, the consciousness of change to the changing part. So that, in man, would be united, according to the expression of Plato, the one and the many, the same and another." That is, I think, the profoundest thing that can be said in favor of materialism; but I do not believe it has ever taken the trouble to go so far in its defense; we take pains to furnish it with arms. However that may be, this last turn no more satisfies me than the preceding. At the outset it is something strange that man should every moment lose a part of himself, and that he should recomplete himself every moment. At the end of a certain time I should have but three fourths of myself, then a half, then a fourth, then nothing. Is that a faithful picture of what we experience when we feel ourselves change? Phenomena change, but we attribute them always to the same individual; there are variations in the consciousness of this permanent I, overturnings, revolutions, a thousand accidents, but the being continues and recovers itself always after faintings, excitements, and troubles of every kind to which it is a prey.

And, moreover, these organic changes, though working more slowly, none the less produce in the end the same effects. After some years, a new I would have succeeded the preceding. Let us suppose the renewal to occur four times, corresponding to the four ages of life: there will then be an infant I, a youthful I, a mature I, an aged I! But these are four different men, who somehow are heirs one of another. How are they united to form one, and one possessing himself, and having a consciousness and memory of his identity? Still that will be only an apparent identity, like that of a public function filled successively by men following the same routine as their predecessors, but at bottom different from them."

WHAT A SAVIOUR!

What Christian has not sometimes given expression to the feelings of his heart in some such language as this, "What a Saviour!" That there should be to us, lost and ruined sinners, any Saviour, is marvelous mercy—is worthy of our highest admiration. But that there should be to us such a Saviour, is still more astonishing. I have thought that we might have had a Saviour, who should have been able to save us, and should have actually saved many, and yet not been such a Saviour as him we have. Less tender, less condescending, less forbearing, I have thought he might have been, and yet have been a Saviour. Perhaps I have thought wrong. But certainly there is in the character of the blessed Jesus, much to draw forth the exclamation, "What a Saviour!"

It seems as if Jesus had said more kind things, and done more kind acts, than were absolutely necessary to have been said and done by him. Need he have made that apology for his disciples—who could sleep when he was in his agony—"the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak?" I wonder how they could have slept in such an hour; but I wonder more at the apology their Master made for them. Need he have uttered that prayer on the cross, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do?" We don't expect such things from the innocent, when dying by the hand of violence. If he had maintained silence during these hours of inconceivable anguish, we should have been satisfied. But oh! think of his forgetting himself, and when they were deriding and in every way insulting him, hear him meekly addressing his Father on their behalf, asking him to forgive them, and pleading for them that they knew not what they did. It was not necessary that he should have paid any visible attention to the supplication of the thief. It could not have been expected of him. But that he should have turned his head and looked such forgiveness and love, while he said,—"This day thou shalt be with me in paradise," is a strange mystery of love.

How wonderful that he should not only have taken our nature, but come down to our condition, and surrounded himself with our circumstances,—become subject to such temptations as we are subject to: Oh! "What a Saviour?" Why, he knows from experience what pain is; he has had the trials I have; he has been through this vale of tears; he knows how I am tried; he remembers how he was tried. If he never smiled, yet he wept—even over the very city and people whose soil and hands were about to be stained with his blood.

I wonder I love him so little, I wonder he is not more precious to me; I wonder any should be offended in him. How can he appear a root out of a dry ground! Why do not all see his form and comeliness?—Nevins.

THE NEGRO PREACHER.

AN AFFECTING STORY.

In the Island of St. Thomas, in the West Indies, there was a negro named Cornelius: he was enlightened about fifty years ago, and soon began to preach to his countrymen. He was blessed with considerable talents, and was able to speak and write the Creole, Dutch, Danish, German, and English languages. Till 1767 he was a slave. He first purchased the freedom of his wife, and then labored hard to gain his own liberty; which at last he effected, after much entreaty, and the payment of a considerable sum.—By degrees, he was also enabled to purchase the emancipation of his six children. He learned the business of a mason so well, that he was appointed master mason to the royal buildings, and had the honor to lay the foundation stone of six Christian chapels for the use of the Moravian brethren. His gifts for preaching were good, and remarkably acceptable, not only to the negroes, but to many of the whites. He spent even whole nights in visiting the different plantations, yet was by no means puffed up, but ever retained the character of an humble servant of Christ. When death approached (which was in November, 1801,) he sent for his family. His children, and grandchildren assembled around the bed of the sick parent: he summoned up all his strength, sat up in bed, uncovered his venerable head, adorned with locks as white as snow, and addressed them thus:

"I rejoice exceedingly, my dear beloved children, to see you once more together before my departure; for I believe that my Lord and Saviour will soon come, and take your dear father home to himself. You know my dear children, what my chief concern has been respecting you, as long as I was with you; how frequently I have exhorted you with tears, not to neglect the day of grace, but surrender yourselves, soul and body, to your God and Redeemer; to follow him faithfully. Sometimes I have dealt strictly with you in matters which I believed would bring harm to your souls, and grieve the Spirit of God; and I have exerted my parental authority, to prevent mischief; but it was all done out of love to you.—However, it may happen that I have been sometimes too severe: if this has been the case, I beg you, my dear children, to forgive me. O, forgive your poor dying father!"

Here he was obliged to stop, most of the children weeping and sobbing aloud. At last, one of the daughters recovering herself, said, "We, dear father, we alone have cause to ask forgiveness; for we have often made your life heavy, and have been disobedient children." The rest joined in the same confession. The father then continued: "Well my dear children, if you have all forgiven me, then attend to my last wish and dying request· Love one another; do not suffer any quarrels and disputes to rise among you after my decease. No, my dear children," raising his voice, "love one another cordially: let each strive to show proofs of love to his brother or sister; nor suffer yourselves to be tempted by anything to become proud, for by that you may even miss of your soul's salvation; but pray our Saviour to grant you lowly minds and humble hearts. If you follow this advice of your father, my joy will be complete, when I once see you again in eternal bliss, and be able to say to our Saviour, 'Here, Lord, is thy poor unworthy Cornelius, and the children thou hast given me.' I am sure our Saviour will not forsake you; but, I beseech you, do not forsake him."

His two sons and four daughters are employed as assistants in the mission. By them, he lived to see twelve grand-children, and five great-grand-children; being about eighty-four years old. He was attended to his grave by a large company of negro brethren and sisters, who being all dressed in white, walked in solemn procession to the burial ground of New Herrnhut.

What Christian can peruse this affecting narrative without blessing God, who to our sable brethren hath vouchsafed this abundant grace; and who can refrain from blessing God, who excited the Moravian Church to those labors of love, and who so wonderfully succeeded their apostolic efforts! Who that hath tasted that the Lord is gracious will refuse the aid of his heart, his hand, his purse, in promoting missionary exertions, so honored of our God and Saviour!—Christian Statesman.

JOE BENTON'S COAL YARD.

Just imagine the loveliest May morning that ever was made; the sun so lately risen that his long golden hair still trailed on the hill-tops, and the robins singing such extravagant songs, that the violets opened their blue eyes as wide as possible, and asked a neighboring lilac-bush if he ever heard of any one getting drunk on sunshine. There must have been something very curious in the air that morning, for when little Joe Benton sprang out of the back door with hair as golden as the sun's and eyes as blue as the violet's, and voice almost as sweet as the robin's, he took one long breath, shouted a vigorous hurrah! but seeming to grow just as crazy as the birds, he didn't feel at all relieved till he had climbed a tree, turned three somersaults, and jumped over the garden fence.

"Saturday, too," he said to himself, as he rested upon the other side. "Was there ever anything so lucky? Now I'll just have time to run down to the broook before breakfast, and see if our boat is all right. Then I'll hurry home, and learn my lessons for Monday, for we boys are to meet and launch her at nine o'clock, and the captain ought to be up to time."

So Joe's small feet clattered vigorously down to the little cave where the precious boat was hidden. But as he neared the place, an exclamation of surprise escaped him; for there were signs of some intruder, and the big stone before the cave had been rolled away. Hastily drawing forth his treasure, he burst into loud cries of dismay, for there was the beautiful little boat which cousin Herbert had given him with its gay sails split in a hundred shreds, and a large hole bored in the bottom.

Joe stood for a moment, motionless with grief and surprise; then with a face as red as a peony, he burst forth,—"I know who did it, the mean scamp! It was Fritz Brown, and he was mad because I didn't ask him to come to the launch. But I'll pay him for this caper," said little Joe through his set teeth, and hastily pushing back the ruined boat, he hurried a little farther down the road, and fastening a piece of string across the footpath, a few inches from the ground, he carefully hid himself in the bushes.

Now the good honest sun was afraid something was going wrong, and he held a little cloud handkerchief over his eye, but Joe did not notice it. He only knew that he was very angry and miserable, and he wondered that he had ever thought it was a pleasant morning.

Presently a step was heard, and Joe eagerly peeped out. How provoking! instead of Fritz, it was cousin Herbert, the very last person he cared to see, and hastily unfastening his string, Joe tried to lie very quiet. But it was all in vain, for cousin Herbert's sharp eyes caught a curious moving in the bushes, and brushing them right and left he soon came upon little Joe. "How's this?" cried he, looking straight into the boy's blazing face; but Joe answered not a word. You're not ashamed to tell me what you were doing?"

"No, I'm not," said little Joe, sturdily, after a short pause; "I'll just tell you the whole story," and out it came, down to the closing threat, "and I mean to make Fritz smart for it."

"What do you mean to do?"

"Why, you see, Fritz carries a basket of eggs to market every morning, and I mean to trip him over this string, and smash 'em all."

Now Joe knew well enough that he was not showing the right spirit, and he muttered to himself, "Now for a good scolding," but to his great surprise cousin Herbert said quietly—

"Well, I think Fritz does need some punishment; but this string is an old trick, I can tell you something better than that."

"What?" cried Joe eagerly.

"How would you like to put a few coals of fire on his head?"

"What, and burn him?" said Joe, doubtfully. Cousin Herbert nodded with a queer smile. Joe clapped his hands. "Now that's just the thing, cousin Herbert. You see his hair is so thick he wouldn't get burned much before he'd have time to shake 'em off; but I'd just like to see him jump once. Now tell me how to do it, quick!"

"If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the Lord shall reward thee," said cousin Herbert, gravely; "and I think that's the best kind of punishment little Fritz could have."

Joe's face lengthened terribly. "Now I do say, cousin Herbert, that's a real take-in. That's just no punishment at all."

"Try it once," said cousin Herbert—"Treat Fritz kindly, and I'm certain he will feel so ashamed and unhappy, that he would far rather have you kick or beat him."

Joe was not really such a bad boy at heart, but he was now in a very ill-temper, and he said sullenly, "But you've told me a story, cousin Herbert. You said this kind of coals would burn, and they don't at all."

"You're mistaken about that," said his cousin, cheerily. "I've known such coals to burn up a great amount of rubbish,—malice, envy, ill-feeling, revenge, and I don't know how much more,—and then leave some very cold hearts feeling as warm and pleasast as possible."

Joe drew a long sigh. "Well, tell me a good coal to put on Fritz's head, and I'll see about it."

"You know," said cousin Herbert, smiling, "that Fritz is very poor, and can seldom buy himself a book, although he is extravagantly fond of reading, but you have quite a library. Now suppose,—ah, well, I won't suppose anything about it.—I'll just leave you to think over the matter, and find your own coal, and be sure and kindle it with love, for no other fire burns so brightly and so long," and with a cheery whistle cousin Herbert sprang over the fence and was gone.

Before Joe had time to collect his thot's, he saw Fritz coming down the lane, carrying a basket of eggs in one hand and a pail of milk in the other.

For one minute the thought crossed Joe's mind, "What a grand smash it would have been if Fritz had fallen over the string," and then again he blushed to his eyes, and was glad enough that the string was safe in his pocket.

Fritz started and looked very uncomfortable when he first caught sight of Joe, but the boy began abruptly, "Fritz, do you have much time to read now?"

"Sometimes" said Fritz, "when I've driven the cows home, and done all my chores, I have a little piece of daylight left; but the trouble is, I've read everything I could get hold of."

"How would you like to take my new book of travels?"

Fritz's eyes danced. "Oh, may I, may I? I'd be so careful of it."

"Yes," answered Joe, "and perhaps I've some others you'd like to read. And Fritz," he added, a little slyly, "I would ask you to come and help sail my boat to day, but some one has torn up the sails, and made a great hole in the bottom.—Who do you suppose did it?"

Fritz's head dropped upon his breast, but after a moment he looked up with a great effort and said—

"I did it, Joe; but I can't begin to tell you how sorry I am. You didn't know I was so mean, when you promised me the books."

"Well, I rather thought you did it," said Joe, slowly.

"And yet you didn't"—Fritz couldn't get any farther, for his cheeks were in a blaze, and he rushed off without another word.

"That coal does burn, and I know Fritz would rather I had smashed every egg in his basket, than offered to lend him that book. But I feel fine,"—and little Joe took three more somersaults, and went home with a light heart, and a grand appetite for breakfast.

When the captain and crew of the little vessel met at the appointed hour, they found Fritz there before them, eagerly trying to repair the injuries, and as soon as he saw Joe he hurried to present him with a beautiful little flag which he had bought for the boat with part of his egg-money that very morning. The boat was repaired, and made a grand trip, and everything turned out as cousin Herbert had said, for Joe's heart was so warm and full of kind thoughts that he never was more happy in all his life. And Joe found out afterwards that the more he used of this curious kind of coal, the larger supply he had on hand—kind thoughts, kind words, and kind actions. "I declare, cousin Herbert," said he, with a queer twinkle in his eye, "I think I shall have to set up a coal yard."

The little school boys, who saw that Joe was always happy, studied the secret too: and at last if any trouble or dispute arose, some one would say, "Let's try a few of Joe Benton's coals," and it was astonishing to see how soon all the evil passions were burned to ashes, and how quickly the young hearts grew warm towards each other. Come, little Tom, Dick and Harry, who have ever so much rubbish to be burned, and whose hearts are all in a shiver with the cold, unloving looks you gave each other this morning, won't you try, just for once, to find out the happy secret that lies in little Joe Benton's queer coal-yard?—Tract Journal.

THE BLESSED HOPE.

BY MISS FLORA LEONARD,

Lines dedicated to Mrs. Julia Fairbanks, on the death her two only children, who were both interred in on grave.

Beneath a sunny autumn sky,
A grassy mound appears,
Oft moistened by the dews of heaven,
Mixed with a mother's tears.

Within that darksome cell, so lone,
Her earthly joys are hid:
Her dearest treasures lie concealed
Beneath that coffin's lid.

'Twere hard to lay them there to sleep
Nor at the thought repine,
But from the heart to feel, and say,
"Thy will, O God; not mine."

You miss them now;—you'll miss them aye,
E'en till thy Lord shall come
And bring thy treasures back again
To their new Eden home.

A little while thy tears must fall
For Clara, who is gone;
And then with rapturous joy, you'll hail
The resurrection morn!

Although she sleeps—yet oe'r her dust
The Angel-watchers bend;
They'll not forget their sacred trust
When earthly scenes do end.

Another, then, at God's command,
Low bending from the skies,
Shall bind the monster Death in chains,
And bid thy Clara rise!

Her smiling face you may behold,
Her childish voice then hear,
And with thy arms once more, enfold
That form to you so dear.

Thy Willie too, whose cherub form
Bowed, 'neath that cruel hand,
Will come again from death's embrace
To join your little band.

Those smiling babes torn from your arms.
By death's relentless grasp,
Will, in God's kingdom, live again,
Thy arms will round them clasp.

Their sparkling eyes will ne'er grow dim,
Their smiles ne'er fade away;
Then Sister, dry those falling tears,
Nor weep thy life away.

Look forward to that endless rest
Beyond the deepening gloom,
And haste to greet thy treasures there,
All ransomed from the tomb.

Yea, quickly haste; thy Saviour calls,
Where sorrows come no more:
Those buds of promise, strive to meet,
On the Immortal shore.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Herald of Life

AND OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

TERMS:—Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar FOR SIX MONTHS; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York city, 48 cents additional. Persons sending five new subscribers, with advance pay, will be entitled to a sixth copy for their services.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, any where out of the United States. Anywhere in the United States, the subscriber may just as well pay the postage at his own Post Office, as to send the amount to us, and subject us to the trouble of doing it here. It is far less trouble to the subscriber than to us, and we must absolutely decline doing it for any within the States. Let this be remembered.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed—

"Geo. Storrs,
Box 4658,
NEW YORK."

Where a letter contains business matter and matter for the paper, or for private use, let it be so written that we can separate the two without infringing on either. This is essential to the business of the Office, and let none neglect it.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written with care, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also, in ordering papers sent, the name of the Post Office, County, and State must be given, and written plainly; and if change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

Poetry.

THE SPIRIT OF POETRY.

"'Tis not the chime and flow of words, that move
In measured file, and metrical array;
'Tis not the union of returning sounds,
Nor all the pleasing artifice of rhyme,
And quantity, and accent, that can give
This all-pervading spirit to the ear,
Or blend it with the movings of the soul.
'Tis a mysterious feeling, which combines
Man with the world around him, in a chain
Woven of flowers, and dipped in sweetness till
He taste the high communion of his thoughts,
With all existences, in earth and heaven,
That meet him in the charm of grace and power.

"'Tis not the noisy babbler, who displays,
In studied phrase, and ornate epithet,
And rounded period, poor and vapid thoughts,
Which peep from out the cumbrous ornaments
That overload their littleness. Its words
Are few, but deep and solemn; and they break
Fresh from the fount of feeling, and are full
Of all that passion which on Carmel, fired
The holy prophet,‡ when his lips were coals,
His language winged with terror, as when bolts
Leap from the brooding tempest, armed with wrath,
Commissioned to affright us and destroy."

‡ 1 Kings xviii. 21-40.

JAMES G. PERCIVAL.

THE MYSTERY OF IDENTITY.

The mind of man is a great mystery—almost as great as the existence of God. The philosophy of identity has never been mastered: we are half inclined to think that it is beyond our reach. The subject is rather metaphysical, than religious. Whatever may be the solution of the problem it cannot conflict with the great fundamentals of the Scriptures that man is mortal and incapable of thought when life is extinct; that he has no power of survivance in or revival from death; that future life is a gift of God through Christ, a resurrection life bestowed only upon those who go through a peculiar mysterious preparatory process in this life, the employed agent in which process is the Holy Spirit. Feeling perfectly assured on these points we are glad to witness the exchange of thought on the great mystery of identity.

We were much interested with an article in our Herald, May 3, by A. G. H. entitled "The Resurrection;" and again by an article, May 17, on "The Soul" by N. K. R. We heartily agree with the first writer in his conclusion "that the mind and character which has been formed in the natural body, will, at the coming of the LIFE-GIVER, be connected with a form like Christ's glorified body;" that "the LIFE-GIVER will remember, protect, and preserve what is essential in his children—that which eats and drinks of him; and will raise it up at the last day;" that "a spiritual body will be raised," for the excellent reason that "the Bible says so." "Thou sowest not that body that shall be....it is raised a spiritual body." 1 Cor. xv. We also agree with the last writer "that the man or the soul—the two being identical—is that which loves, hates, wishes, thinks, reasons." We do not assent to all that either writer affirms, but we are greatly interested in the main question, and welcome its candid and thoughtful investigation. The April Methodist Quarterly has a translation from a French Review against what is called "German Materialism." Those interested in the general subject of mind will be pleased to read some of it. J. T. C.

"We do not define personal identity, but we feel it. Each one of us knows that he continues to be himself at every moment of the duration which composes his being, and this is what we call identity. It manifests itself very clearly in three principal facts, thought, memory, and responsibility. The simplest fact of thought supposes that he who thinks abides the same at two different moments. All thought is successive; if this is questioned in judgment it will not be questioned in reasoning; if it is questioned in the simplest form of reasoning it will not be questioned in demonstration, which consists of a series of reasonings. We must admit that it is the same mind which continues through all the moments of a demonstration. Conceive three persons of whom one thinks a major, another a minor, the third a conclusion; will you have a common thought, a common demontration? No, the three elements must unite in one and the same mind. Memory brings us to the same conclusion. I remember only of myself, M. Royer Collard very justly said: exterior things and other persons enter into my memory only through having passed into my cognitive powers, and it is this cognition that I remember, not the thing itself. I could not, then, remember what another than I did, said or thought. Memory supposes a continued bond between the I of the past and the I of the present. Finally no one is responsible save for himself; if one is so for others it is only as he can act upon or by them. How could I answer for what another did before I was born? Thus thought, memory, responsibility are startling witnesses to our identity. That is one of the capital facts which characterize our mind. There is likewise in the human body a capital and characteristic fact, but it is the opposite of the preceding; this is what has been called the vital vortex, or the perpetual exchange of matter which goes on between living animals and the exterior world. We know that organized bodies have need of nutrition, that is, of borrowing from foreign bodies a certain quantity of matter to repair the losses that they continually suffer. If, indeed, living bodies preserved all acquired matter and incessantly introduced new, we ought to see their size constantly growing. This is what we do see up to a certain age; but this increase of size stops, and the body remains stationary in its dimensions. It is thereby evident that the body loses as much as it gains, and that life is a circulation. Further, the greatest naturalists have acknowledged the fact. I will above all cite the fine words of Cuvier. 'In living bodies,' says he, 'no particle keeps its place; all enter and depart in succession; life is a continual whirlpool, whose direction, all complicated as it is, remains constant, as well as the kind of particles which are drawn into it, but not the individual particles themselves. The present matter of the living body, on the contrary, will soon be no longer in it, and yet it is the depository of a force which will constrain the future matter to move in the same path as itself. So the form of these bodies is more essential to them than their matter, since this constantly changes while that is preserved.'

Without insisting upon a fact whose confirmation will be found in all physiologists, let us say that the problem for materialists is to conciliate the personal identity of the mind with the perpetual mutability of the organized body. Now we must admit that materialists have not taken much pains to solve this problem, and Dr. Buechner doesnot even mention it. It does not depend upon him, however, that the identic should result from change, or unity from composition. If that is so, it must still be explained how it can be. The first explanation which might be given, is that indicated in the passage from Cuvier cited above. The vital whirlpool, it is said, has a constant direction; in the change of matter, there is alway something left, form. The materials are displaced and replaced, but always in the same order and in the same relations. Thus the features of the face remain ever nearly the same, despite the change of the parts; the scar always remains, though the wounded particles have long ago disappeared. The living body has a historic oneness, which results from the persistence of relations, and which is the foundation of the identity of the I.

Such an explanation, however, can only satisfy those who do not take good account of the conditions of the problem, for in supposing that we may explain this fixity of the type, whether individual or generic, by a simple play of matter, by chemical or mechanical action, it must not be forgotten that an identity so produced will ever be only an apparent and wholly external identity, like that of those petrifactions in which vegetable molecules have been gradually replaced by mineral molecules, without the form of the object's experiencing any change. I say that such an object is not really identical, and especially that it is not so to itself, and that in such a theory you will find no foundation for the consciousness and the memory of identity, for I demand, where will you place memory in this ever-moving object? Shall it be in the elements, in the molecules themselves? But as they disappear, those which enter cannot remember those that depart. Shall it be in the relation of the particles? It must be, for that is the only thing that truly continues; but what is a relation which itself thinks, remembers, and is responsible? These are so many unintelligible abstractions to which our readers are welcome.

One might turn to the following hypothesis. It might be said: In proportion as the molecules enter into the body, for instance into the brain, they place themselves where the preceding ones were; there they are found in the same relation with the neighboring particles, they are drawn into the same vortex as those they replace. Ah well? so, by hypothesis, thought is a vibration of the cerebral fibers; since to-day everything is explained by vibrations, each new molecule will come in its turn to vibrate exactly as the preceding; it will give the same note, and you will believe you hear the same sound; this then will be the same thought, though the molecule has changed. Having the same thought, the man will be the same individual. Such an explanation, however, is nowise satisfactory, for identity of persons is not attached to identity of thoughts. I may vacillate between the most opposite ideas and feelings without ceasing to be myself; two men thinking of the same thing at once, the series of numbers for example, will not therefore become one and the same man; several cords emitting the same sound are not one cord. Thus identity of vibrations no more than persistence in form, explains the consciousness of personal identity.

It may be rejoined: "You reason upon a false theory. You seem to believe that the human brain totally changes from moment to moment, from second to second. This is not so; the brain only changes in succession. On the other hand is the I then immobile? Does it not change also from moment to moment? Is the youth the same as the mature man, the mature as the aged man? So neither is change absolute in the body, nor immobility in the soul. Could we not come into harmony? The consciousness of identity in us would correspond to the durable part of the brain, the consciousness of change to the changing part. So that, in man, would be united, according to the expression of Plato, the one and the many, the same and another." That is, I think, the profoundest thing that can be said in favor of materialism; but I do not believe it has ever taken the trouble to go so far in its defense; we take pains to furnish it with arms. However that may be, this last turn no more satisfies me than the preceding. At the outset it is something strange that man should every moment lose a part of himself, and that he should recomplete himself every moment. At the end of a certain time I should have but three fourths of myself, then a half, then a fourth, then nothing. Is that a faithful picture of what we experience when we feel ourselves change? Phenomena change, but we attribute them always to the same individual; there are variations in the consciousness of this permanent I, overturnings, revolutions, a thousand accidents, but the being continues and recovers itself always after faintings, excitements, and troubles of every kind to which it is a prey.

And, moreover, these organic changes, though working more slowly, none the less produce in the end the same effects. After some years, a new I would have succeeded the preceding. Let us suppose the renewal to occur four times, corresponding to the four ages of life: there will then be an infant I, a youthful I, a mature I, an aged I! But these are four different men, who somehow are heirs one of another. How are they united to form one, and one possessing himself, and having a consciousness and memory of his identity? Still that will be only an apparent identity, like that of a public function filled successively by men following the same routine as their predecessors, but at bottom different from them."

WHAT A SAVIOUR!

What Christian has not sometimes given expression to the feelings of his heart in some such language as this, "What a Saviour!" That there should be to us, lost and ruined sinners, any Saviour, is marvelous mercy—is worthy of our highest admiration. But that there should be to us such a Saviour, is still more astonishing. I have thought that we might have had a Saviour, who should have been able to save us, and should have actually saved many, and yet not been such a Saviour as him we have. Less tender, less condescending, less forbearing, I have thought he might have been, and yet have been a Saviour. Perhaps I have thought wrong. But certainly there is in the character of the blessed Jesus, much to draw forth the exclamation, "What a Saviour!"

It seems as if Jesus had said more kind things, and done more kind acts, than were absolutely necessary to have been said and done by him. Need he have made that apology for his disciples—who could sleep when he was in his agony—"the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak?" I wonder how they could have slept in such an hour; but I wonder more at the apology their Master made for them. Need he have uttered that prayer on the cross, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do?" We don't expect such things from the innocent, when dying by the hand of violence. If he had maintained silence during these hours of inconceivable anguish, we should have been satisfied. But oh! think of his forgetting himself, and when they were deriding and in every way insulting him, hear him meekly addressing his Father on their behalf, asking him to forgive them, and pleading for them that they knew not what they did. It was not necessary that he should have paid any visible attention to the supplication of the thief. It could not have been expected of him. But that he should have turned his head and looked such forgiveness and love, while he said,—"This day thou shalt be with me in paradise," is a strange mystery of love.

How wonderful that he should not only have taken our nature, but come down to our condition, and surrounded himself with our circumstances, — become sudject to such temptations as we are subject to: Oh! "What a Saviour?" Why, he knows from experience. what pain is; he has had the trials I have; he has been through this vale of tears; he knows how I am tried; he remembers how he was tried. If he never smiled, yet he wept—even over the very city and people whose soil and hands were about to be stained with his blood.

I wonder I love him so little, I wonder he is not more precious to me; I wonder any should be offended in him. How can he appear a root out of a dry ground! Why do not all see his form and comeliness?—Nevins.

THE NEGRO PREACHER.

AN AFFECTING STORY.

In the Island of St. Thomas, in the West Indies, there was a negro named Cornelius: he was enlightened about fifty years ago, and soon began to preach to his countrymen. He was blessed with considerable talents, and was able to speak and write the Creole, Dutch, Danish, German, and English languages. Till 1767 he was a slave. He first purchased the freedom of his wife, and then labored hard to gain his own liberty; which at last he effected, after much entreaty, and the payment of a considerable sum.—By degrees, he was also enabled to purchase the emancipation of his six children. He learned the business of a mason so well, that he was appointed master mason to the royal buildings, and had the honor to lay the foundation stone of six Christian chapels for the use of the Moravian brethren. His gifts for preaching were good, and remarkably acceptable, not only to the negroes, but to many of the whites. He spent even whole nights in visiting the different plantations, yet was by no means puffed up, but ever retained the character of an humble servant of Christ. When death approached (which was in November, 1801,) he sent for his family. His children, and grandchildren assembled around the bed of the sick parent; he summoned up all his strength, sat up in bed, uncovered his venerable head, adorned with locks as white as snow, and addressed them thus:

"I rejoice exceedingly, my dear beloved children, to see you once more together before my departure; for I believe that my Lord and Saviour will soon come, and take your dear father home to himself. You know my dear children, what my chief concern has been respecting you, as long as I was with you; how frequently I have exhorted you with tears, not to neglect the day of grace, but surrender yourselves, soul and body, to your God and Redeemer; to follow him faithfully. Sometimes I have dealt strictly with you in matters which I believed would bring harm to your souls, and grieve the Spirit of God; and I have exerted my parental authority, to prevent mischief; but it was all done out of love to you.—However, it may happen that I have been sometimes too severe: if this has been the case, I beg you, my dear children, to forgive me. O, forgive your poor dying father!"

Here he was obliged to stop, most of the children weeping and sobbing aloud. At last, one of the daughters recovering herself, said, "We, dear father, we alone have cause to ask forgiveness; for we have often made your life heavy, and have been disobedient children." The rest joined in the same con fession. The father then continued: "Well my dear children, if you have all forgiven me, then attend to my last wish and dying request· Love one another; do not suffer any quarrels and disputes to rise among you after my decease. No, my dear children," raising his voice, "love one another cordially: let each strive to show proofs of love to his brother or sister; nor suffer yourselves to be tempted by anything to become proud, for by that you may even miss of your soul's salvation; but pray our Saviour to grant you lowly minds and humble hearts. If you follow this advice of your father, my joy will be complete, when I once see you again in eternal bliss, and be able to say to our Saviour, 'Here, Lord, is thy poor unworthy Cornelius, and the children thou hast given me.' I am sure our Saviour will not forsake you; but, I beseech you, do not forsake him."

His two sons and four daughters are employed as assistants in the mission. By them, he lived to see twelve grand-children, and five great-grand-children; being about eighty-four years old. He was attended to his grave by a large company of negro brethren and sisters, who being all dressed in white, walked in solemn procession to the burial ground of New Herrnhut.

What Christian can peruse this affecting narrative without blessing God, who to our sable brethren hath vouchsafed this abundant grace; and who can refrain from blessing God, who excited the Moravian Church to those labors of love, and who so wonderfully succeeded their apostolic efforts! Who that hath tasted that the Lord is gracious will refuse the aid of his heart, his hand, his purse, in promoting missionary exertions, so honored of our God and Saviour!—Christian Statesman.

JOE BENTON'S COAL YARD.

Just imagine the loveliest May morning that ever was made; the sun so lately risen that his long golden hair still trailed on the hill-tops, and the robins singing such extravagant songs, that the violets opened their blue eyes as wide as possible, and asked a neighboring lilac-bush if he ever heard of any one getting drunk on sunshine. There must have been something very curious in the air that morning, for, when little Joe Benton sprang out of the back door with hair as golden as the sun's and eyes as blue as the violet's, and voice almost as sweet as the robin's, he took one long breath, shouted a vigorous hurrah! but seeming to grow just as crazy as the birds, he didn't feel at all relieved till he had climbed a tree, turned three somersaults, and jumped over the garden fence.

"Saturday, too," he said to himself, as he rested upon the other side. "Was there ever anything so lucky? Now I'll just have time to run down to the broook before breakfast, and see if our boat is all right. Then I'll hurry home, and learn my lessons for Monday, for we boys are to meet and launch her at nine o'clock, and the captain ought to be up to time."

So Joe's small feet clattered vigorously down to the little cave where the precious boat was hidden. But as he neared the place, an exclamation of surprise escaped him; for there were signs of some intruder, and the big stone before the cave had been rolled away. Hastily drawing forth his treasure, he burst into loud cries of dismay, for there was the beautiful little boat which cousin Herbert had given him with its gay sails split in a hundred shreds, and a large hole bored in the bottom.

Joe stood for a moment, motionless with grief and surprise; then with a face as red as a peony, he burst forth,—"I know who did it, the mean scamp! It was Fritz Brown, and he was mad because I didn't ask him to come to the launch. But I'll pay him for this caper," said little Joe through his set teeth, and hastily pushing back the ruined boat, he hurried a little farther down the road, and fastening a piece of string across the footpath, a few inches from the ground, he carefully hid himself in the bushes.

Now the good honest sun was afraid something was going wrong, and he held a little cloud handkerchief over his eye, but Joe did not notice it. He only knew that he was very angry and miserable, and he wondered that he had ever thought it was a pleasant morning.

Presently a step was heard, and Joe cagerly peeped out. How provoking! instead of Fritz, it was cousin Herbert, the very last person he cared to see, and hastily unfastening his string, Joe tried to lie very quiet. But it was all in vain, for cousin Herbert's sharp eyes caught a curious moving in the bushes, and brushing them right and left he soon came upon little Joe. "How's this?" cried he, looking straight into the boy's blazing face; but Joe answered not a word. You're not ashamed to tell me what you were doing?"

"No, I'm not," said little Joe, sturdily, after a short pause; "I'll just tell you the whole story," and out it came, down to the closing threat, "and I mean to make Fritz smart for it."

"What do you mean to do?"

"Why, you see, Fritz carries a basket of eggs to market every morning, and I mean to trip him over this string, and smash 'em all."

Now Joe knew well enough that he was not showing the right spirit, and he muttered to himself, "Now for a good scolding," but to his great surprise cousin Herbert said quietly—

"Well, I think Fritz does need some punishment; but this string is an old trick, I can tell you something better than that."

"What?" cried Joe eagerly.

"How would you like to put a few coals of fire on his head?"

"What, and burn him?" said Joe, doubtfully. Cousin Herbert nodded with a queer smile. Joe clapped his hands. "Now that's just the thing, cousin Herbert. You see his hair is so thick he wouldn't get burned much before he'd have time to shake 'em off; but I'd just like to see him jump once. Now tell me how to do it, quick!"

"If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the Lord shall reward thee," said cousin Herbert, gravely; "and I think that's the best kind of punishment little Fritz could have."

Joe's face lengthened terribly. "Now I do say, cousin Herbert, that's a real take-in. That's just no punishment at all."

"Try it once," said cousin Herbert—"Treat Fritz kindly, and I'm certain he will feel so ashamed and unhappy, that he would far rather have you kick or beat him."

Joe was not really such a bad boy at heart, but he was now in a very ill-temper, and he said sullenly, "But you've told me a story, cousin Herbert. You said this kind of coals would burn, and they don't at all."

"You're mistaken about that," said his cousin, cheerily. "I've known such coals to burn up a great amount of rubbish,—malice, envy, ill-feeling, revenge, and I don't know how much more,—and then leave some very cold hearts feeling as warm and pleasast as possible."

Joe drew a long sigh. "Well, tell me a good coal to put on Fritz's head, and I'll see about it."

"You know," said cousin Herbert, smiling, "that Fritz is very poor, and can seldom buy himself a book, although he is extravagantly fond of reading, but you have quite a library. Now suppose,—ah, well, I won't suppose anything about it.—I'll just leave you to think over the matter, and find your own coal, and be sure and kindle it with love, for no other fire burns so brightly and so long," and with a cheery whistle cousin Herbert sprang over the fence and was gone.

Before Joe had time to collect his thot's, he saw Fritz coming down the lane, carrying a basket of eggs in one hand and a pail of milk in the other.

For one minute the thought crossed Joe's mind, "What a grand smash it would have been if Fritz had fallen over the string," and then again he blushed to his eyes, and was glad enough that the string was safe in his pocket.

Fritz started and looked very uncomfortable when he first caught sight of Joe, but the boy began abruptly, "Fritz, do you have much time to read now?"

"Sometimes" said Fritz, "when I've driven the cows home, and done all my chores, I have a little piece of daylight left; but the trouble is, I've read everything I could get hold of."

"How would you like to take my new book of travels?"

Fritz's eyes danced. "Oh, may I, may I? I'd be so careful of it"

"Yes," answered Joe, "and perhaps I've some others you'd like to read. And Fritz," he added, a little slyly, "I would ask you to come and help sail my boat to day, but some one has torn up the sails, and made a great hole in the bottom.—Who do you suppose did it?"

Fritz's head dropped upon his breast, but after a moment he looked up with a great effort and said—

"I did it, Joe; but I can't begin to tell you how sorry I am. You didn't know I was so mean, when you promised me the books."

"Well, I rather thought you did it," said Joe, slowly.

"And yet you didn't"—Fritz couldn't get any farther, for his cheeks were in a blaze, and he rushed off without another word.

"That coal does burn, and I know Fritz would rather I had smashed every egg in his basket, than offered to lend him that book. But I feel fine,"—and little Joe took three more somersaults, and went home with a light heart, and a grand appetite for breakfast.

When the captain and crew of the little vessel met at the appointed hour, they found Fritz there before them, eagerly trying to repair the injuries, and as soon as he saw Joe he hurried to present him with a beautiful little flag which he had bought for the boat with part of his egg-money that very morning. The boat was repaired, and made a grand trip, and everything turned out as cousin Herbert had said, for Joe's heart was so warm and full of kind thoughts that he never was more happy in all his life. And Joe found out afterwards that the more he used of this curious kind of coal, the larger supply he had on hand—kind thoughts, kind words, and kind actions. "I declare, cousin Herbert," said he, with a queer twinkle in his eye, "I think I shall have to set up a coal yard."

The little school boys, who saw that Joe was always happy, studied the secret too: and at last if any trouble or dispute arose, some one would say, "Let's try a few of Joe Benton's coals," and it was astonishing to see how soon all the evil passions were burned to ashes, and how quickly the young hearts grew warm towards each other. Come, little Tom, Dick and Harry, who have ever so much rubbish to be burned, and whose hearts are all in a shiver with the cold, unloving looks you gave each other this morning, won't you try, just for once, to find out the happy secret that lies in little Joe Benton's queer coal-yard?—Tract Journal.

THE BLESSED HOPE.

BY MISS FLORA LEONARD,

Lines dedicated to Mrs. Julia Fairbanks, on the death her two only children, who were both interred in on grave.

Beneath a sunny autumn sky,
A grassy mound appears,
Oft moistened by the dews of heaven,
Mixed with a mother's tears.

Within that darksome cell, so lone,
Her earthly joys are hid:
Her dearest treasures lie concealed
Beneath that coffin's lid.

'Twere hard to lay them there to sleep
Nor at the thought repine,
But from the heart to feel, and say,
"Thy will, O God; not mine."

You miss them now;—you'll miss them aye,
E'en till thy Lord shall come
And bring thy treasures back again
To their new Eden home.

A little while thy tears must fall
For Clara, who is gone;
And then with rapturous joy, you'll hail
The resurrection morn!

Although she sleeps—yet oe'r her dust
The Angel-watchers bend;
They'll not forget their sacred trust
When earthly scenes do end.

Another, then, at God's command,
Low bending from the skies,
Shall bind the monster Death in chains,
And bid thy Clara rise!

Her smiling face you may behold,
Her childish voice then hear,
And with thy arms once more, enfold
That form to you so dear.

Thy Willie too, whose cherub form
Bowed, 'neath that cruel hand,
Will come again from death's embrace
To join your little band.

Those smiling babes torn from your arms.
By death's relentless grasp,
Will, in God's kingdom, live again,
Thy arms will round them clasp.

Their sparkling eyes will ne'er grow dim,
Their smiles ne'er fade away;
Then Sister, dry those falling tears,
Nor weep thy life away.

Look forward to that endless rest
Beyond the deepening gloom,
And haste to greet thy treasures there,
All ransomed from the tomb.

Yea, quickly haste; thy Saviour calls,
Where sorrows come no more:
Those buds of promise, strive to meet,
On the Immortal shore.

WHY SERVE THE LORD.

According to our observations, all, or nearly all the exhortations of professed "Adventists,"—who are definite time theorists—to saints and sinners, to serve God, are based upon this one thing—"Do it, for the Lord is coming—You will perish then if you do not serve him."

Such exhortations are proper enough in their place: but to make them the burden of our message to saints and sinners, in our judgment, is nothing more than an appeal to the selfishness of the human heart. It seems to say—If the Lord were not coming so soon, you need not be so particular to serve him!

Every child of man on earth is under just as much obligation to serve God, with all his heart, if Christ were not coming these hundred years, as if he were coming to-day. The obligation to serve God lies much higher than the mere fact that the day is most over. This appeal to any man will seldom, if ever, produce genuine preparation to meet God. The reaction which took place after the "time movements" of '43, '44, '47, and '54 was most disastrous to many, and should be a warning against another attempt to get up a time movement such as is now being attempted by some who ought to know better. Where are the great majority now of those who, in '43, '47, '54, were professedly "aroused to serve God" as they ought by the cry of time for the Lord's coming? And echo says—where? Scarcely one in ten of them are found walking so as to honor their Christian profession. Why not? They were stimulated by wrong motives Their selfishness was the principal thing appealed to and excited. They were just like the sinner who thinks himself nigh to death on a sick bed or in a storm at sea. If he must die, he will become a Christian. If he knew he was out of danger, he would be as indifferent as ever. Repentance under such circumstances is always of a doubtful character; and, where the person has survived, has almost invariable proved a delusion. Why is it so? Because their selfishness was all that was moved. There was no deep sorrow for the dishonor done to God by a life of sin; or abhorrence of sin on that account. No: if they could escape the dreadful consequences which they fear for their sins, no penitence would be seen in them; they would still "roll sin as a sweet morsel under their tongues." Just so the preaching of definite time for the advent, and urging sinners to get ready, because the Lord was coming so soon, and they would be destroyed it not ready, has been demonstrated, in general, to have had no other effect upon saint or sinner than to move their selfish feelings. The cause of excitement failing, they are the same careless souls as ever, or seeking new fancies to keep up their excited minds, which must result, if repeated disappointments occur, in deep disaster if not in ultimate ruin. Not a few have already passed into that state of mind that must, without an extraordinary exertion of the grace of God, land them in endless ruin.

For what are Christ's disciples left in this world? Is it just to get safe out of it? Or, is it to glorify God and the Lamb upon earth? Or, which is the same thing, it is, that they may be lights in the world: yea, "the light of the world"—that they may let their light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. Who has God to glorify him on earth? The Son of God is not here to do it. He was here, and said, when about to leave,—"I have finished the work Thou gavest me to do." He is not here now to glorify God before men. Angels cannot do that work on earth; wicked men will not do it. Who then shall do it? The followers of Christ. Are they under any more obligation to do it if their Lord is to return to-day than if he was not coming for a hundred years? Certainly not. To show a greater concern to do so on that account, manifests too much the spirit of an eye-servant. He thinks the master is soon coming—the day is nearly ended—he will be all engaged in the work just at that moment! He has been sluggish all the day—has taken little or no interest in his master's cause, and would have done nothing only he was "afraid." Efforts have been made to rouse him to his duty to his employer—all has been unavailing till he is told that his employer is coming: he is then aroused and outstrips all the other laborers in activity and zeal! Is it love to his employer and his service that has aroused him? Not at all. His course is perfectly hypocritical. He thinks to secure the master's favor by his present extraordinary exertions, and perhaps is ready to condemn those who have kept constantly engaged in their work all the day long, because they do not just now manifest the same zeal and activity that he does. He is now all activity, we repeat it, not from love to the work or master; but, the reckoning time is so near; and he has just cause to fear condemnation for his past neglect. Watch that man carefully. The report that the master was coming at that particular time proves to be erroneous, and it is now uncertain when he will come. What do we now see? Ten chances to one if you do not see that same zealous do-every-thing, when he thought the master was right upon him, now slack off—lay down—fall asleep, and perhaps never wake again till the cry—"The master is here."

Let us work while it is day—and all the day; and work too, because—We have a good Master, who has loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood. Let gratitude to him stimulate us to do all in our power to promote his honor or glory in the earth. Have we no concern for the glory of God and the Lamb? Have we any too much time to do this work in? Shall we wish, like the eye-servant, the day was gone? If so, do we not discover more concern for rest, or wages, than we do to have accomplished much for God and our Lord Jesus Christ? Should we not be as ready and cheerful to labor and suffer too, to promote the glory of God in a wicked world, as to reap the promised reward? And should we not rejoice, if we are accounted worthy to be continued longer in the field, that we may sow and reap a larger crop for our blessed, loving Lord and Master? Why this haste to have our labors and suffering for Christ ended? Should we not rather desire that we may be able to do and suffer much for him who hasdone and suffered so much for us? Oh, let us leave the "times and the seasons" for the coming of the Son of God where he has taught us to leave them, viz.. "in the Father's own power," Acts i. 6, 7, and go to our work in the love of it, that we may glorify God on the earth and finish the work he has given us to do; then we need have no fear but that when he comes, however sudden or unexpected it may be, he will give us the "crown of life." Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind, and strength, and thy neighbor as thyself, is just as obligatory, on us all, at any period of life, or any age of the world, as the day the Lord will come: and no period, or time of the world, can change, alter, abate, or increase that obligation. To suppose it can, it appears to us, is a delusion. The Bible injunction—"Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God," is unalterable, and depends not upon circumstances or times. Under this unalterable principle Enoch walked with God 300 years—Noah at least 120 years—Abraham many years—Samuel over 90 years: and many other worthies for long periods. It is our duty, as well as exalted calling, to begin our life in the the service of God, and spend all our days in this soul ennobling work of bringing glory to God and the Lamb in this benighted world. May the Lord forgive us all our sins and follies past, and give us grace for time to come: and may his glory, not our own, be the ruling principle of our minds.

YOUNGER BROTHER: ELDER BROTHER.

BY MRS E. B.

After an absence of many years, a younger brother was about to visit me. He was on his way from that far country whose seaward entrance is the "Golden Gate." Though I had reason to expect him soon, I did not know the month or week, much less the day and hour when he would appear, but went diligently to work to make ready to meet him, my heart meanwhile full of pleasant anticipations.

Upon his arrival, I felt that the preparations I had made were meagre enough, but how gladly did I welcome him! With what satisfaction did I look upon the face I had so often feared I should never see again. The yearnings of heart felt in his absence, turned to the repose of love in his presence; his words of sympathy lent buoyancy to my spirits; his generous and timely gifts encouraged me for many a day thereafter through a constantly recurring round of duties; I was glad that the links which bound us as kindred were not utterly rusted away, but even passibly bright, when I learned how gratified he felt to find us as a family loving one another.

Dear friends in Christ, I have made use of this item of personal experience, to illustrate the relation we sustain to that Elder Brother whom we are expecting from the far land of many golden gates. He has been a long time absent, indeed we have never seen his face, but he is dearer to us than all earthly kindred, for he spent for our sakes a life of self-denial, poverty and temptation, and finally yielded that life to secure for us eternal benefits. He has led us by his providence and Spirit through all the devious paths of our pilgrimage, and now gives us a title to "an inheritance" that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us."

We know not the day or hour of his advent, but we have sufficient indications of his near approach to be earnest and joyful in our preparations to meet him. You must not fear disappointment as when waiting for earthly friends, for his last revealed words assures us that he will come quickly. He does not require us to suspend our ordinary avocation while awaiting him, but to be diligent in business, and to occupy till he comes. We need not all spend the precious moments in ingenious calculations of the exact time of his coming, but we must all make due preparations, and faithfully perform each hour's duty, that we may welcome him with gladness, and "not be ashamed before him at his coming." And when at last that happy moment arrives, and we see those flaming chariot wheels whose sound we may even now hear in the distance, with what satisfaction shall we look upon the face we have so often longed to see. As in the care of our younger brother, heart yearnings will turn to the repose of love in his presence; but how much more emphatically so, for "in His presence is fulness of joy." His sympathising words will he never more withhold. His rewards will he bring with him, which will amply repay us for every act of self-denial practised for his sake; every duty performed, every gift bestowed upon the needy. His divine gift of immortality will fit us for the royal duties he improves, and to do his bidding we shall have power to "mount up on wings as eagles, to run and not be weary, walk and not faint."

Then with what satisfaction will our Elder Brother look upon those of his family who were found exercising fervent charity among themselves! How will he smile upon those who have obeyed his injunctions to "love one another."

And with what confidence will those greet him who have never smitten their fellow servants in word or deed, but who have encouraged them when desponding, who have lifted them out of temptations, or those even who have manifested sympathy, by rejoicing with those who rejoiced, and weeping with those who wept.

Allow me to refer again to my illustration. Through all the pleasure that younger brother's presence afforded me there was this vein of bitterness: he canot abide with me: the hour of parting approaches; the more enjoyment I find in his presence, the more burdensome will be the weight of loneliness in his inevitable absence; he will go away but I cannot follow him. Ah! friends, here my comparison turns to a contrast. When our Elder Brother comes, no parting hour evermore approaches. We shall ever be near him; for may we not "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth?" In that hour of rapture, no burden of loneliness will ever weigh down the heart again. The blossoms of love and joy rooted in our immortality will smile perennial in our lives. For there the royal brotherhood of Christ, now in exile, shall be gathered to share the honors of his throne and so be "forever with the Lord."

"O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" for "he that spared not his own Son," that Elder brother of whom we have been speaking, "how shall he not with him also freely give us all thing."

DANIEL XII. 2.

This passage has lately come up for thorough discussion, and I do not write because I think I can add any thing to the argument already advanced on our side, but it appears to me that its syntactical construction gives the key to its true interpretation. The mere English scholar can see that the expression is elliptical, and all will agree that upon a correct supplying of the ellipsis depends the true meaning of the passage. The figure of syntax employed is evidently a zeugma which is a subdivision of Ellipsis. "Zeugma" according to Andrews' and Stoddard's Latin Grammar "is the uniting of two nouns or two infinitives to a verb, which as to its meaning, is applicable to only one of them." This figure is of frequent occurrence in the Classics, and the verb to be supplied must correspond with the nature and requirements of the case. This might be abundantly illustrated, but I will give a single example only, taken from Luke i. 64. "And his mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue loosed." In the original we have the two nouns translated "mouth" and "tongue" connected with the verb translated "was opened." It is evident that the verb is applicable, in its meaning, to "mouth" only, and that another verb must be supplied to correspond with the function of the "tongue." No argument is required to prove that "loosed" is the proper word.

Let us now see whether it is correct to call the construction in Dan. xii. 2 a zeugma. We have one verb, "shall awake" and two pronouns "these" referring to the "righteous" and "those" referring to the "wicked," connected with it. Is the verb applicable in its meaning to both subjects? Clearly not, for then both the "righteous" and the "wicked" or all "of them that sleep in the dust of the earth," will awake, while the affirmation is that "many," or only a part of them shall rise. "Shall awake" then is applicable to the "righteous" only and we must supply a verb to express the condition or fate of the "wicked." For an appropriate verb we need not long hesitate, for He who has made such emphatic declarations as Psa. xlix; Prov. xxi. 16; Isa. xxvi. 14; and very many others, has not left us in uncertainty as to His will concerning those who have not merited "everlasting life." Yes, truly, "They are dead they shall not live, they are deceased they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them and caused all their memory to perish," and no torturing of Dan. xii. 2 can give them a resurrection.

A PROMISE HARD TO KEEP.

BR. STORRS:—In the HERALD OF LIFE, dated May 24, is an article with the above heading, written by Br. Wendell, relative to a "promise" we made in the Crisis, which he thinks is a "hard" one "to keep" and intimates that for this reason we have broken it. Will you do me the favor to let me extricate myself from the unpleasant position in which I am placed before your readers, by inserting the following brief note in the HERALD.

We are glad Br. Wendell has called our attention to the promise we made in the Crisis relative to the fact, that the information we received from Dr. Noot helped us to understand Acts xxiv. 15, "better than ever before." The reason we did not notice the point, was because it was entirely forgotten in our subsequent report of the discussion, and did not come to mind till mentioned by Br. Wendell. Our promise, we are now happy to fulfil; and instead of finding it "hard to keep," we find it directly the opposite,—very easy.

Previous to the time when we consulted Dr. Noot, who is a Jew, and holds to the same doctrine entertained by the Pharisees, on the subject of the resurrection, as he himself declared to us, we found an apparent difficulty in harmonizing Paul's statement in Acts xxiv. 15, with the following from Josephus:

"The Pharisees....believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards and punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter are to be detained in everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again."—Josephus Ant. b. 18, c. 1, s. 3.

Acts xxiv. 15 reads as follows:—"And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." It will be seen that there is an apparent contradiction between Paul's statement and that of Josephus, which was all harmonized by the information we received from the modern Pharisee, Dr. Noot. Paul declares that he believed in the "resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." No one, we think, who has carefully read the New Testament Scriptures, would dispute for a moment that the "unjust" are the wicked, in distinction from the righteous, and embrace all of mankind who are not saved.

The difficulty in our mind was to see how the Pharisees could deny the resurrection of the wicked and yet "allow," as Paul says, "that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." We turned to the commentary of Dr. Pearce on Acts xxiv. 15, and on the phrase "both of the just and unjust," found the following:—"This truth Paul had probably not learned till after his conversion; because he was a Pharisee, and the Pharisees believed that the just only would be raised."—Com. Vol. ii., p. 166. Dr. Noot informed us that the Pharisees believed that the "notoriously wicked would not be raised," but those who had been only moderately wicked would have a resurrection. This fact cleared up the whole difficulty. Paul declared his faith in the resurrection of all mankind by saying he believed in the resurrection "both of the just and unjust," which includes all, both good and bad; and then shows them that they really admit the same thing when they "allow" the resurrection of the "unjust," although they deny that the "notoriously wicked" will ever be raised.

Jesus has taught us to "beware of the.... doctrine of the Pharisees," as well as of the Sadducees. Let us heed his admonition.

THE YELLOW FEVER PLOT.

We contribute this morning one other chapter to the history of the rebellion. Four years ago the world might have refused to credit even this circumstantial and corroborated evidence of a deliberate plot to introduce the yellow fever into cities of the North, but we have since seen and heard the horrors of Libby prison and Andersonville, the conspiracies to murder women and children on railway trains, to fire crowed cities, and to assassinate the President and his counsellors. We know not whether to call this a more or less fiendish purpose than the others, but we cannot affect to doubt its existence merely because it implies that the men who serve the rebellion are devils.

The evidence shows clearly enough the main features of the plot, though the main actor in it, Dr, Blackburn, has escaped into "neutral" territory. During the recent yellow fever epidmic in Bermuda, this Dr. Blackburn took passage for that Island. He was a Southerner, formerly resident in Natchez, Miss. After his arrival, be attended several yellow fever patients at the Hamilton Hotel, and at a Mrs. Slater's. Some of them died under his care. He collected their bed-clothing—including a large quantity of woolen clothing which, in one case at least, he had ordered to be piled upon the patients in order to receive the infection,—packed it in trunks, and sent it to the house of Edward C. Swan, to be kept by him till an opportunity offered to send it North. Blackburn himself then left for Halifax.

It became known to the authorities of Hamilton that this infected clothing was in possession of Swan, and they caused his arrest. On the preliminary examination, the above facts appeared. It was shown also that the Health Officer found these trunks in Swan's possession, crammed full of clothes that had manifestly been used by yellow fever patients. Swan himself testified that Blackburn had delivered these trunks to him. Another witness swore that Swan had told him he received the trunks to be sent North, in order to communicate the yellow fever. Still another witness swore that Blackburn had told him he had delivered the trunks to Swan for that purpose, and the wages for the service were variously stated at $500 in the whole, and at $150 a month while Swan was engaged in the business. And Blackburn told Swan to call on the officers of the governmenment for money. One of the trunks was marked "St. Louis Hotel, Upper town, Quebec," and again, "Clifton House, Niagra Falls, Canada side."

But we need not recapitulate more of the evidence. Let it be read in full, and let each reader satisfy his own mind as to its completeness. The magistrates of Bermuda held Swan for trial. The whole world will try and condemn on the same evidence not merely Dr. Blackburn, but the rebellion and its leaders, of whom Blackburn was but one miserable and guilty tool.—Tribune, May 16.

THE HOPE OF THE FUTURE.

"Therefore we are always confident, knowing that while we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord; (for we walk by faith, not by sight:) we are confident, I say, and willing, rather to be absent from the body, and be present with the Lord."—2 Cor. v. 6, 8.

The author of our text, in an epistle to another church, enjoins the following admirable practice, as becoming the Christian intelligence and piety of all believers.—"Despise not prophesyings: prove all things: hold fast that which is good." But alas! the history of Christianity—the religion of liberty, the friend of free thought and free utterances—has presented the painful spectacle of a systematic prohibition of prophesyings, and a stereotyping of "all things," both bad and "good." Through long ages of spiritual darkness and despotism, the liberty of prophesying was, in the name of Christ and Christianity, denied to any but such as had received due authority from Pope or Parliment-made Bishops, which sacerdotal veto, indeed, like a mediæval curiosity, is still exercised, both by Romish and Reformed Papists. And while the Christian liberty of prophesying has been denied by an unchristian priesthood, so also has the duty of welcoming the pious teacher, and giving respectful heed to his "prophesyings," been supplanted by a suspicious distrust of all "prophesyings" which have not the accredited seal of conventional orthodoxy. The chief proportion of professing Christians in our times, in manifest violation of the apostle's command, despise "prophesying," as necessarily dangerous to the faith; "prove" nothing, instead of "all things;" and "hold fast" not only that which is good, but much that is false and mischievous. Now the Apostle Paul evidently believed that theology is not a fixed, but a progressive science,—and that faithful and spiritually minded teachers and students of God's word, as "scribes well instructed unto the kingdom, bring forth," occasionally from this "treasure, things new and old." He bids Christian disciples, therefore, not despise prophesying, for by so doing, they may be closing their eyes to the light of new truth: but "prove all things; and hold fast that which is good." But the modern church believes that its opinion about the teaching of the Bible cannot in any respect be wrong—although but two or three centuries ago its forefathers were slumbering, amid the superstitions, and bound by the spiritual slavery of Rome; and since the new light of the Reformation dawned, has scarcely made any progress in divine truth,—but is constantly going back to that twilight era, to learn its doctrines, and fix its faith.

Was then the Reformation so complete, that progress beyond that point was impossible? Can any be so infatuated as to suppose that the deep-rooted and wide-spread errors of Popery were so erradicated then as not to leave some corrupt germs in their full vitality and vigor? That, the Reformation should have been thus complete is not probable, for it would have been a remarkable exception to the universal experience of human progress.

Why, then should our faith in the orthodoxy of the living church be so implicit as to foreclose every devoutly independent inquiry into the teaching of the living word? The voice of God's word calls loudly for another and more advanced reformation. Let us heed its voice, as the supreme dictator in matters of faith and obedience. It bids us come yet farther away from the deadly superstitions of Papal and Pagan Rome. It tells the Protestant church that it is even yet occupying, to some considerable extent, a common platform with the great Papal apostacy. The Protestantant doctrine of the soul's human personality and capability of a separate state as an immortal being, is not of Scripture, but tradition—claiming its parentage in the heathen philosophy, and affording a broad foundation for many Popish errors. On this belief the church of Rome builds its worship of the Virgin Mary, its invocation of saints, its purgatory and indulgences. The Bible bids us give up this mere human conceit, and profess a more thorough Protestanism.

But this will be disputed: and the the text at the head of this article is the supposed grand authority for disputieg this assertion. I ask, then, the inquirer's candid attention to the exposition of this stronghold of the popular doctrine.

"Therefore, we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body we are absent from the Lord. We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and be present with the Lord."

It is readily allowed that this passage seems to teach the doctrine of the soul's separate state, and immediate felicity in that state. But this apparent instruction isto be attributed to the fact that such doctrines are so generally taught and accredited. Holding the traditional belief that the soul of man is his personality, and is capable of existing independently of the body, it is natural to put such a construction upon this text as that which it commonly obtains. But I cannot think that the believers in Corinth, who had read and understood the Apostle's first epistle, could have so understood the meaning. Such an interpretation would have been in direct contradiction to the very clear and cogent reasoning contained in the 15th chapter of their first epistle. Let the text under consideration be taken, not as is generally the practice, apart from, but in connection with its context. The intelligent inquirer will ask, "Of what is the Apostle discoursing in this part of his epistle? Is it his object to prove the separate state and immortality of the soul? Because, if this be not the subject of which he is treating, then, although his language may be made to express such a doctrine, such a construction cannot be fairly placed on his words."

In the chapter preceding that whence our text is taken, the apostle alludes to the perilous nature of his mission as a Christian preacher—"We are troubled," he says, "on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus [that is, always resigned, like Jesus, to dying, in the fulfilment of duty], that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body [or mortal life of probation]. For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh......Knowing that He which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you. .....For which cause we faint not."

It must be apparent that the Apostle is here speaking of the encouragement which the well grounded hope of a resurrection from the dead by Jesus Christ, gave him in the daily anticipation of losing his life in the preaching of the gospel. He knew that if his life were taken from him he should have another and more perfect life by means of resurrection. If it were not for this hope of rising from the dead, he would have no hope at all to sustain him in the prosecution of his perilous minstry. "Why stand we in jeopardy every hour," he asks this same church, in his first epistle, "if the dead rise not at all?" But he had this "living hope," and hence he commences the fifth chapter with a profession of strong faith in the survivance of mortality—not by living in a disembodied state, but by a resurrection from the dead in a new spiritual and immortal nature. "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven: if so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. Now he that hath wrought us for the self same thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit. Therefore we

WHY SERVE THE LORD.

According to our observations, all, or nearly all the exhortations of professed "Adventists,"—who are definite time theorists—to saints and sinners, to serve God, are based upon this one thing—"Do it, for the Lord is coming—You will perish then if you do not serve him."

Such exhortations are proper enough in their place: but to make them the burden of our message to saints and sinners, in our judgment, is nothing more than an appeal to the selfishness of the human heart. It seems to say—If the Lord were not coming so soon, you need not be so particular to serve him!

Every child of man on earth is under just as much obligation to serve God, with all his heart, if Christ were not coming these hundred years, as if he were coming to-day. The obligation to serve God lies much higher than the mere fact that the day is most over. This appeal to any man will seldom, if ever, produce genuine preparation to meet God. The reaction which took place after the "time movements" of '43, '44, '47, and '54 was most disastrous to many, and should be a warning against another attempt to get up a time movement such as is now being attempted by some who ought to know better. Where are the great majority now of those who, in '43, '47, '54, were professedly "aroused to serve God" as they ought by the cry of time for the Lord's coming? And echo says—where? Scarcely one in ten of them are found walking so as to honor their Christian profession. Why not? They were stimulated by wrong motives Their selfishness was the principal thing appealed to and excited. They were just like the sinner who thinks himself nigh to death on a sick bed or in a storm at sea. If he must die, he will become a Christian. If he knew he was out of danger, he would be as indifferent as ever. Repentance under such circumstances is always of a doubtful character; and, where the person has survived, has almost invariable proved a delusion. Why is it so? Because their selfishness was all that was moved. There was no deep sorrow for the dishonor done to God by a life of sin; or abhorrence of sin on that account. No: if they could escape the dreadful consequences which they fear for their sins, no penitence would be seen in them; they would still "roll sin as a sweet morsel under their tongues." Just so the preaching of definite time for the advent, and urging sinners to get ready, because the Lord was coming so soon, and they would be destroyed it not ready, has been demonstrated, in general, to have had no other effect upon saint or sinner than to move their selfish feelings. The cause of excitement failing, they are the same careless souls as ever, or seeking new fancies to keep up their excited minds, which must result, if repeated disappointments occur, in deep disaster if not in ultimate ruin. Not a few have already passed into that state of mind that must, without an extraordinary exertion of the grace of God, land them in endless ruin.

For what are Christ's disciples left in this world? Is it just to get safe out of it? Or, is it to glorify God and the Lamb upon earth? Or, which is the same thing, it is, that they may be lights in the world: yea, "the light of the world"—that they may let their light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. Who has God to glorify him on earth? The Son of God is not here to do it. He was here, and said, when about to leave,—"I have finished the work Thou gavest me to do." He is not here now to glorify God before men. Angels cannot do that work on earth; wicked men will not do it. Who then shall do it? The followers of Christ. Are they under any more obligation to do it if their Lord is to return to-day than if he was not coming for a hundred years? Certainly not. To show a greater concern to do so on that account, manifests too much the spirit of an eye-servant. He thinks the master is soon coming—the day is nearly ended—he will be all engaged in the work just at that moment! He has been sluggish all the day—has taken little or no interest in his master's cause, and would have done nothing only he was "afraid." Efforts have been made to rouse him to his duty to his employer—all has been unavailing till he is told that his employer is coming: he is then aroused and outstrips all the other laborers in activity and zeal! Is it love to his employer and his service that has aroused him? Not at all. His course is perfectly hypocritical. He thinks to secure the master's favor by his present extraordinary exertions, and perhaps is ready to condemn those who have kept constantly engaged in their work all the day long, because they do not just now manifest the same zeal and activity that he does. He is now all activity, we repeat it, not from love to the work or master; but, the reckoning time is so near; and he has just cause to fear condemnation for his past neglect. Watch that man carefully. The report that the master was coming at that particular time proves to be erroneous, and it is now uncertain when he will come. What do we now see? Ten chances to one if you do not see that same zealous do-every-thing, when he thought the master was right upon him, now slack off—lay down—fall asleep, and perhaps never wake again till the cry—"The master is here."

Let us work while it is day—and all the day; and work too, because—We have a good Master, who has loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood. Let gratitude to him stimulate us to do all in our power to promote his honor or glory in the earth. Have we no concern for the glory of God and the Lamb? Have we any too much time to do this work in? Shall we wish, like the eye-servant, the day was gone? If so, do we not discover more concern for rest, or wages, than we do to have accomplished much for God and our Lord Jesus Christ? Should we not be as ready and cheerful to labor and suffer too, to promote the glory of God in a wicked world, as to reap the promised reward? And should we not rejoice, if we are accounted worthy to be continued longer in the field, that we may sow and reap a larger crop for our blessed, loving Lord and Master? Why this haste to have our labors and suffering for Christ ended? Should we not rather desire that we may be able to do and suffer much for him who hasdone and suffered so much for us? Oh, let us leave the "times and the seasons" for the coming of the Son of God where he has taught us to leave them, viz.. "in the Father's own power," Acts i. 6, 7, and go to our work in the love of it, that we may glorify God on the earth and finish the work he has given us to do; then we need have no fear but that when he comes, however sudden or unexpected it may be, he will give us the "crown of life." Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind, and strength, and thy neighbor as thyself, is just as obligatory, on us all, at any period of life, or any age of the world, as the day the Lord will come: and no period, or time of the world, can change, alter, abate, or increase that obligation. To suppose it can, it appears to us, is a delusion. The Bible injunction—"Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God," is unalterable, and depends not upon circumstances or times. Under this unalterable principle Enoch walked with God 300 years—Noah at least 120 years—Abraham many years—Samuel over 90 years: and many other worthies for long periods. It is our duty, as well as exalted calling, to begin our life in the the service of God, and spend all our days in this soul ennobling work of bringing glory to God and the Lamb in this benighted world. May the Lord forgive us all our sins and follies past, and give us grace for time to come: and may his glory, not our own, be the ruling principle of our minds.

YOUNGER BROTHER: ELDER BROTHER.

BY MRS E. B.

After an absence of many years, a younger brother was about to visit me. He was on his way from that far country whose seaward entrance is the "Golden Gate." Though I had reason to expect him soon, I did not know the month or week, much less the day and hour when he would appear, but went diligently to work to make ready to meet him, my heart meanwhile full of pleasant anticipations.

Upon his arrival, I felt that the preparations I had made were meagre enough, but how gladly did I welcome him! With what satisfaction did I look upon the face I had so often feared I should never see again. The yearning of heart felt in his absence, turned to the repose of love in his presence; his words of sympathy lent buoyancy to my spirits; his generous and timely gifts encouraged me for many a day thereafter through a constantly recurring round of duties; I was glad that the links which bound us as kindred were not utterly rusted away, but even passibly bright, when I learned how gratified he felt to find us as a family loving one another.

Dear friends in Christ, I have made use of this item of personal experience, to illustrate the relation we sustain to that Elder Brother whom we are expecting from the far land of many golden gates. He has been a long time absent, indeed we have never seen his face, but he is dearer to us than all earthly kindred, for he spent for our sakes a life of self-denial, poverty and temptation, and finally yielded that life to secure for us eternal benefits. He has led us by his providence and Spirit through all the devious paths of our pilgrimage, and now gives us a title to "an inheritance" that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us."

We know not the day or hour of his advent, but we have sufficient indications of his near approach to be earnest and joyful in our preparations to meet him. You must not fear disappointment as when waiting for earthly friends, for his last revealed words assures us that he will come quickly. He does not require us to suspend our ordinary avocation while awaiting him, but to be diligent in business, and to occupy till he comes. We need not all spend the precious moments in ingenious calculations of the exact time of his coming, but we must all make due preparations, and faithfully perform each hour's duty, that we may welcome him with gladness, and "not be ashamed before him at his coming." And when at last that happy moment arrives, and we see those flaming chariot wheels whose sound we may even now hear in the distance, with what satisfaction shall we look upon the face we have so often longed to see. As in the care of our younger brother, heart yearnings will turn to the repose of love in his presence; but how much more emphatically so, for "in His presence is fulness of joy." His sympathising words will he never more withhold. His rewards will he bring with him, which will amply repay us for every act of self-denial practised for his sake; every duty performed, every gift bestowed upon the needy. His divine gift of immortality will fit us for the royal duties he improves, and to do his bidding we shall have power to "mount up on wings as eagles, to run and not be weary, walk and not faint."

Then with what satisfaction will our Elder Brother look upon those of his family who were found exercising fervent charity among themselves! How will he smile upon those who have obeyed his injunctions to "love one another."

And with what confidence will those greet him who have never smitten their fellow servants in word or deed, but who have encouraged them when desponding, who have lifted them out of temptations, or those even who have manifested sympathy, by rejoicing with those who rejoiced, and weeping with those who wept.

Allow me to refer again to my illustration. Through all the pleasure that younger brother's presence afforded me there was this vein of bitterness: he canot abide with me: the hour of parting approaches; the more enjoyment I find in his presence, the more burdensome will be the weight of loneliness in his inevitable absence; he will go away but I cannot follow him. Ah! friends, here my comparison turns to a contrast. When our Elder Brother comes, no parting hour evermore approaches. We shall ever be near him; for may we not "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth?" In that hour of rapture, no burden of loneliness will ever weigh down the heart again. The blossoms of love and joy rooted in our immortality will smile perennial in our lives. For there the royal brotherhood of Christ, now in exile, shall be gathered to share the honors of his throne and so be "forever with the Lord."

"O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" for "he that spared not his own Son," that Elder brother of whom we have been speaking, "how shall he not with him also freely give us all thing."

DANIEL XII. 2.

This passage has lately come up for thorough discussion, and I do not write because I think I can add any thing to the argument already advanced on our side, but it appears to me that its syntactical construction gives the key to its true interpretation. The mere English scholar can see that the expression is elliptical, and all will agree that upon a correct supplying of the ellipsis depends the true meaning of the passage. The figure of syntax employed is evidently a zeugma which is a subdivision of Ellipsis. "Zeugma" according to Andrews' and Stoddard's Latin Grammar "is the uniting of two nouns or two infinitives to a verb, which as to its meaning, is applicable to only one of them." This figure is of frequent occurrence in the Classics, and the verb to be supplied must correspond with the nature and requirements of the case. This might be abundantly illustrated, but I will give a single example only, taken from Luke i. 64. "And his mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue loosed." In the original we have the two nouns translated "mouth" and "tongue" connected with the verb translated "was opened." It is evident that the verb is applicable, in its meaning, to "mouth" only, and that another verb must be supplied to correspond with the function of the "tongue." No argument is required to prove that "loosed" is the proper word.

Let us now see whether it is correct to call the construction in Dan. xii. 2 a zeugma. We have one verb, "shall awake" and two pronouns "these" referring to the "righteous" and "those" referring to the "wicked," connected with it. Is the verb applicable in itsmeaning to both subjects? Clearly not, for then both the "righteous" and the "wicked" or all "of them that sleep in the dust of the earth," will awake, while the affirmation is that "many," or only a part of them shall rise. "Shall awake" then is applicable to the "righteous" only and we must supply a verb to express the condition or fate of the "wicked." For an appropriate verb we need not long hesitate, for He who has made such emphatic declarations as Psa. xlix; Prov. xxi. 16; Isa. xxvi. 14; and very many others, has not left us in uncertainty as to His will concerning those who have not merited "everlasting life." Yes, truly, "They are dead they shall not live, they are deceased they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them and caused all their memory to perish," and no torturing of Dan. xii. 2 can give them a resurrection.

A PROMISE HARD TO KEEP.

BR. STORRS:—In the HERALD OF LIFE, dated May 24, is an article with the above heading, written by Br. Wendell, relative to a "promise" we made in the Crisis, which he thinks is a "hard" one "to keep" and intimates that for this reason we have broken it. Will you do me the favor to let me extricate myself from the unpleasant position in which I am placed before your readers, by inserting the following brief note in the HERALD.

We are glad Br. Wendell has called our attention to the promise we made in the Crisis relative to the fact, that the information we received from Dr. Noot helped us to understand Acts xxiv. 15, "better than ever before." The reason we did not notice the point, was because it was entirely forgotten in our subsequent report of the discussion, and did not come to mind till mentioned by Br. Wendell. Our promise, we are now happy to fulfil; and instead of finding it "hard to keep," we find it directly the opposite,—very easy.

Previous to the time when we consulted Dr. Noot, who is a Jew, and holds to the same doctrine entertained by the Pharisees, on the subject of the resurrection, as he himself declared to us, we found an apparent difficulty in harmonizing Paul's statement in Acts xxiv. 15, with the following from Josephus:

> "The Pharisees....believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards and punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter are to be detained in everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again."—Josephus Ant. b. 18, c. 1, s. 3.

Acts xxiv. 15 reads as follows:—"And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." It will be seen that there is an apparent contradiction between Paul's statement and that of Josephus, which was all harmonized by the information we received from the modern Pharisee, Dr. Noot. Paul declares that he believed in the "resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." No one, we think, who has carefully read the New Testament Scriptures, would dispute for a moment that the "unjust" are the wicked, in distinction from the righteous, and embrace all of mankind who are not saved.

The difficulty in our mind was to see how the Pharisees could deny the resurrection of the wicked and yet "allow," as Paul says, "that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." We turned to the commentary of Dr. Pearce on Acts xxiv. 15, and on the phrase "both of the just and unjust," found the following:—"This truth Paul had probably not learned till after his conversion; because he was a Pharisee, and the Pharisees believed that the just only would be raised."—Com. Vol. ii., p. 166. Dr. Noot informed us that the Pharisees believed that the "notoriously wicked would not be raised," but those who had been only moderately wicked would have a resurrection. This fact cleared up the whole difficulty. Paul declared his faith in the resurrection of all mankind by saying he believed in the resurrection "both of the just and unjust," which includes all, both good and bad; and then shows them that they really admit the same thing when they "allow" the resurrection of the "unjust," although they deny that the "notoriously wicked" will ever be raised.

Jesus has taught us to "beware of the.... doctrine of the Pharisees," as well as of the Sadducees. Let us heed his admonition.

THE YELLOW FEVER PLOT.

We contribute this morning one other chapter to the history of the rebellion. Four years ago the world might have refused to credit even this circumstantial and corroborated evidence of a deliberate plot to introduce the yellow fever into cities of the North, but we have since seen and heard the horrors of Libby prison and Andersonville, the conspiracies to murder women and children on railway trains, to fire crowed cities, and to assassinate the President and his counsellors. We know not whether to call this a more or less fiendish purpose than the others, but we cannot affect to doubt its existence merely because it implies that the men who serve the rebellion are devils.

The evidence shows clearly enough the main features of the plot, though the main actor in it, Dr. Blackburn, has escaped into "neutral" territory. During the recent yellow fever epidmic in Bermuda, this Dr. Blackburn took passage for that Island. He was a Southerner, formerly resident in Natchez, Miss. After his arrival, he attended several yellow fever patients at the Hamilton Hotel, and at a Mrs. Slater's. Some of them died under his care. He collected their bed-clothing—including a large quantity of woolen clothing which, in one case at least, he had ordered to be piled upon the patients in order to receive the infection,—packed it in trunks, and sent it to the house of Edward C. Swan, to be kept by him till an opportunity offered to send it North. Blackburn himself then left for Halifax.

It became known to the authorities of Hamilton that this infected clothing was in possession of Swan, and they caused his arrest. On the preliminary examination, the above facts appeared. It was shown also that the Health Officer found these trunks in Swan's possession, crammed full of clothes that had manifestly been used by yellow fever patients. Swan himself testified that Blackburn had delivered these trunks to him. Another witness swore that Swan had told him he received the trunks to be sent North, in order to communicate the yellow fever. Still another witness swore that Blackburn had told him he had delivered the trunks to Swan for that purpose, and the wages for the service were variously stated at $500 in the whole, and at $150 a month while Swan was engaged in the business. And Blackburn told Swan to call on the officers of the governmenment for money. One of the trunks was marked "St. Louis Hotel, Upper town, Quebec," and again, "Clifton House, Niagra Falls, Canada side."

But we need not recapitulate more of the evidence. Let it be read in full, and let each reader satisfy his own mind as to its completeness. The magistrates of Bermuda held Swan for trial. The whole world will try and condemn on the same evidence not merely Dr. Blackburn, but the rebellion and its leaders, of whom Blackburn was but one miserable and guilty tool.—Tribune, May 16.

THE HOPE OF THE FUTURE.

> "Therefore we are always confident, knowing that while we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord; (for we walk by faith, not by sight:) we are confident, I say, and willing, rather to be absent from the body, and be present with the Lord."—2 Cor. v. 6, 8.

The author of our text, in an epistle to another church, enjoins the following admirable practice, as becoming the Christian intelligence and piety of all believers.—"Despise not prophesyings: prove all things: hold fast that which is good." But alas! the history of Christianity—the religion of liberty, the friend of free thought and free utterances—has presented the painful spectacle of a systematic prohibition of prophesyings, and a stereotyping of "all things," both bad and "good." Through long ages of spiritual darkness and despotism, the liberty of prophesying was, in the name of Christ and Christianity, denied to any but such as had received due authority from Pope or Parliment-made Bishops, which sacerdotal veto, indeed, like a mediæval curiosity, is still exercised, both by Romish and Reformed Papists. And while the Christian liberty of prophesying has been denied by an unchristian priesthood, so also has the duty of welcoming the pious teacher, and giving respectful heed to his "prophesyings," been supplanted by a suspicious distrust of all "prophesyings" which have not the accredited seal of conventional orthodoxy. The chief proportion of professing Christians in our times, in manifest violation of the apostle's command, despise "prophesying," as necessarily dangerous to the faith; "prove" nothing, instead of "all things;" and "hold fast" not only that which is good, but much that is false and mischievous. Now the Apostle Paul evidently believed that theology is not a fixed, but a progressive science,—and that faithful and spiritually minded teachers and students of God's word, as "scribes well instructed unto the kingdom, bring forth," occasionally from this "treasure, things new and old." He bids Christian disciples, therefore, not despise prophesying, for by so doing, they may be closing their eyes to the light of new truth: but "prove all things; and hold fast that which is good." But the modern church believes that its opinion about the teaching of the Bible cannot in any respect be wrong—although but two or three centuries ago its forefathers were slumbering, amid the superstitions, and bound by the spiritual slavery of Rome; and since the new light of the Reformation dawned, has scarcely made any progress in divine truth,—but is constantly going back to that twilight era, to learn its doctrines, and fix its faith.

Was then the Reformation so complete, that progress beyond that point was impossible? Can any be so infatuated as to suppose that the deep-rooted and wide-spread errors of Popery were so erradicated then as not to leave some corrupt germs in their full vitality and vigor? That, the Reformation should have been thus complete is not probable, for it would have been a remarkable exception to the universal experience of human progress.

Why, then should our faith in the orthodoxy of the living church be so implicit as to foreclose every devoutly independent inquiry into the teaching of the living word? The voice of God's word calls loudly for another and more advanced reformation. Let us heed its voice, as the supreme dictator in matters of faith and obedience. It bids us come yet farther away from the deadly superstitions of Papal and Pagan Rome. It tells the Protestant church that it is even yet occupying, to some considerable extent, a common platform with the great Papal apostacy. The Protestantant doctrine of the soul's human personality and capability of a separate state as an immortal being, is not of Scripture, but tradition—claiming its parentage in the heathen philosophy, and affording a broad foundation for many Popish errors. On this belief the church of Rome builds its worship of the Virgin Mary, its invocation of saints, its purgatory and indulgences. The Bible bids us give up this mere human conceit, and profess a more thorough Protestanism.

But this will be disputed: and the the text at the head of this article is the supposed grand authority for disputieg this assertion. I ask, then, the inquirer's candid attention to the exposition of this stronghold of the popular doctrine.

"Therefore, we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body we are absent from the Lord. We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and be present with the Lord."

It is readily allowed that this passage seems to teach the doctrine of the soul's separate state, and immediate felicity in that state. But this apparent instruction isto be attributed to the fact that such doctrines are so generally taught and accredited. Holding the traditional belief that the soul of man is his personality, and is capable of existing independently of the body, it is natural to put such a construction upon this text as that which it commonly obtains. But I cannot think that the believers in Corinth, who had read and understood the Apostle's first epistle, could have so understood the meaning. Such an interpretation would have been in direct contradiction to the very clear and cogent reasoning contained in the 15th chapter of their first epistle. Let the text under consideration be taken, not as is generally the practice, apart from, but in connection with its context. The intelligent inquirer will ask, "Of what is the Apostle discoursing in this part of his epistle? Is it his object to prove the separate state and immortality of the soul? Because, if this be not the subject of which he is treating, then, although his language may be made to express such a doctrine, such a construction cannot be fairly placed on his words."

In the chapter preceding that whence our text is taken, the apostle alludes to the perilous nature of his mission as a Christian preacher—"We are troubled," he says, "on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus [that is, always resigned, like Jesus, to dying, in the fulfilment of duty], that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body [or mortal life of probation]. For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh......Knowing that He which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you. .....For which cause we faint not."

It must be apparent that the Apostle is here speaking of the encouragement which the well grounded hope of a resurrection from the dead by Jesus Christ, gave him in the daily anticipation of losing his life in the preaching of the gospel. He knew that if his life were taken from him he should have another and more perfect life by means of resurrection. If it were not for this hope of rising from the dead, he would have no hope at all to sustain him in the prosecution of his perilous minstry. "Why stand we in jeopardy every hour," he asks this same church, in his first epistle, "if the dead rise not at all?" But he had this "living hope," and hence he commences the fifth chapter with a profession of strong faith in the survivance of mortality—not by living in a disembodied state, but by a resurrection from the dead in a new spiritual and immortal nature. "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven: if so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. Now he that hath wrought us for the self same thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit. Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord :(for we walk by faith, not by sight:) we are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord."

The imagery—for the language is obviously figurative—is that of an earthly house of this tabernacle, which is condemned to be dissolved, and which was the Apostle's appropriate image to describe the mortality of the creature man. Man, the one complex being, is compared to an earthly house, or tabernacle, which will be dissolved. Nothing is here said nor implied about an immortal and essentially permanent part of man, which in its own nature is independent of this general and complete dissolution, which is most unaccountable, as on the popular supposition this immortal part is the human personality. The believer is here taught that he himself, in his one totality, not a part of himself, must be dissolved. But he knows that if like an earthly house, he must crumble in dissolution, he will be restored again in the beauty and durability of a building of God, a house not made with hands, but one that is eternal in the heavens. Here the two states of the believer's existence are described by an earthly house, or tabernacle, which must dissolve, and a building of God, a house eternal in the heavens.

According to the popular interpretation of this text, Paul should have said, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved,—that is, if our body were to be put off in death,—we have yet within us an imperishable soul or spirit which cannot be dissolved." But he does not say this,—he does not say that we retain in ourselves anything which survives the dissolution of the earthly house of this tabernacle. What he says is, if this present nature dissolves in death, we know that God has provided another nature, even an incorruptible and imperishable one— a house eternal in the heavens—which he will bestow upon us when he recreates us by Christ Jesus at the resurrection.. "We know," says Paul, that "we have [not an immortal soul, but] a building of God; [not an eternal soul within, but] a house eternal in the heavens."

Paul is undoubtedly speaking of the two bodies, or conditions of human existence, to which he alludes in the 15th chapter of the first epistle,—"There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body ;" and hence he says in the second verse, "For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." As if he had said, "While our bodily nature is under the power of dissolution we have no nature or being,—we in fact cease to be, and therefore, in the view of this dissolution, we groan for our new immortal nature—our house from heaven." The Apostle evidently desired to be clothed upon with an eternal house, when this tabernacle or temporary house was destroyed. He makes not the faintest allusion to any survivance of mortality as a disembodied soul. He groans to be clothed upon, as he also says in another epistle, [Rom. viii. 23,] "Even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." "For we that are in this tabernacle [dwelling as mortal creatures] do groan being burdened, not for that we would be unclothed [we desire not to die,] but clothed upon [with our eternal house from heaven, which is our resurrection nature], that mortality might be swallowed up of life." "Therefore, we are always confident ;" for we know that if on the one hand, as mortal beings, we dissolve in death,—on the other hand, as beings upon whom God has conferred, through Christ, the gift of immortality, we shall, when we are raised from the dead and receive our spiritual natures, live again as immortal beings "eternal in the heavens." "We are always confident" of this, and know "that whilst we are at home in the body,"—that is, whilst we are existing as earthly tabernacles, mortal and perishable, "we are absent from the Lord," with whom we cannot be until we have put off our mortality —because "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God,"—and have assumed our immortality ; which will be when we are raised from the dead in our spiritual body,—our building of God,—our house which is eternal in the heavens. "We are confident," I say, of so glorious a re-creation in Christ Jesus awaiting us ; and are therefore, "willing rather to be absent from the body," that is from our natural body,—our present mortal and corruptible nature, which separates us from the Lord, and to be possessed of our spiritual body, our new incorruptible nature —in order that we may be present with the Lord, which cannot be until the resurrection, when mortality shall be swallowed up of life.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, JUNE 7, 1865.

Our Late Tour.

After an absence of ten days the Editor is again at his post editorial. His visit to New England was one of interest in several particulars. He met with a hearty reception in Boston, and preached at Kast Hall to good, attentive, and interested congregations, two Sabbaths. It was good and pleasant to be there ; and many were the greetings we received. Monday, after the first Sabbath in Boston, the Editor took the cars for Lebanon, N. H., one hundred and twenty miles from Boston. This was done in order to see, once more, an only brother, according to the flesh, who is now 77 years old. Only one interview had he had with this brother for twenty-one years previously ; and not expecting to meet him again in this our pilgrimage, we thought to improve this week of release from our office in making what we presumed would be a last visit to that brother. We found him with life more spent than we anticipated ; having been rapidly declining for some weeks previous, though unknown to us till our arrival at his house. He was unable to sit up or converse much ; and we hardly expected him to survive through the week ; but we left him much the same at the close of the week. The interview was one of interest to us both.

This brother and ourself are all that remain of a family of eight children : one daughter and seven sons, of whom the Editor was the youngest. Six of those children died between the ages of twenty and forty-five ; all of the consumption in some form ; but we two escaped it, and have survived the one who died last, thirty-three years. So hath God wrought with us.

This aged brother of ours, though nine years older than ourself did not devote himself to Christ till some two or three years after we did. At the age of nineteen we commenced speaking for our Lord and Redeemer in social meetings ; at one of those meetings this brother felt, as his younger brother had set out to serve the Lord, it was high time he should do the same, and thenceforward devoted himself to Christ. Many were the conferences and prayer-meetings we afterwards attended, together, praying with and exhorting the people ; always laboring together in the most perfect harmony and with comfort. At length, however, the younger was led to embrace a doctrine different from the Calvinistic, in which both of us had been educated, though in a somewhat modified form through the influence of our beloved Mother, who fell asleep in Jesus about twenty-seven years since. This theological difference did not divide us in affection, but it led the younger brother out, in a few months, from his native town, preaching the gospel as a Methodist traveling preacher. Our personal intercourse was, after that, much interrupted ; and we saw each other but seldom.

Twenty-five years since, we made a still further theological advance, and left the Methodist connection for the faith we now maintain; though at first we saw only the root of our present theological views, viz., that man was not possessed of inherent immortality, and that such an inheritance was a gift of God only to the righteous. Still, no alienation of affection was produced between these brothers, though the older one thought his "brother George" had fallen into a great error ; yet he fully believed he was "once in grace," and had no fears but what he would get safe through. After A. D. 1844 we saw him but once till our late interview ; and we parted with him now fully believing his heart is joined unto the Lord, and that he will sleep in Jesus and come from the dead to life eternal at the last day, when our Lord shall raise his sleeping saints.

While in Lebanon, we visited the graves of our father and mother, and of our brothers and sister, as also that of our first wife and only child by her ; all of whom, with the exception of one brother, sleep together there. Our thoughts and reflections while there are too private for public record. While we looked over the many tomb-stones and read the inscriptions of many names of those we knew in our youth and more advanced years, the inquiry arose, How many of these graves will be opened "at the last day"? We left the thought for a decision by Him who is "the resurrection and the life." Concerning some, however, we felt no doubt they would "come again from the land of the enemy."

At this visit to our native place we went to the spot where we were born, and asked permission to enter that house, which we had not before entered for twenty-one years. How changed was everything we beheld. The house and farm had passed out of our family connections years since; decay and desolation had come over all. The house, which was a two story one, with an extension of one story, had always, while in the hands of our father and family, been kept painted white, now had the appearance of almost utter desolation; and looked more like some old barn than the cheerful habitation of a once flourishing family and home; and all around it—outbuildings, fences, stone-walls, orchards, &c.,—carried the appearance of old age which it would be impossible to renew, except by that renewing power which shall "create all things new."

So passes life away; and all the charms of youth and the fond desires and anticipations of early life. Happy indeed is he who shall make it the first and chief end of this life to secure an inheritance in that blessed state where desolation never comes, nor changes are made except from glory to glory. Let us all, then, cease from those useless cares and anxieties which so disturb most of our fellow men. Soon, very soon, these cares and anxieties will come to an end. Have we secured the treasure that fadeth not away? If so, we have lived to purpose; if not, we have lived in vain, and spent our strength for naught.

P. S.—Since writing the foregoing we have received a note from a Niece in Lebanon, dated Saturday the 3rd inst., saying:—"Our dear father has just passed away at five minutes past ten o'clock this morning. He breathed out his life gently."

Thus "I am left alone" of a once large family. I have neither father, mother, brother or sister according to the flesh; and "yet I am not alone," for God has given me many brethren and sisters in Christ our elder Brother; and He ever liveth; because He liveth his friends shall live also.

The Western Mission.

At our third Quarterly Conference ; held in this City in April, it was resolved to do something for the West, and some $75 were pledged at the time for this purpose. Eld. W. S. Campbell will set out in a few days for Illinois, to attend a series of meetings to be held there. We wish not only that he should go, but that we may be able to send out at the same time, a quantity of tracts for gratuitous circulation. To this end, it is desirable that the money pledged for the mission should be now paid in, and that others who are able should contribute to the object. Will they not do so immediately? Eld. D. S Holt, also, of New Hampshire, we understand, is willing to go out West with his tent. We sincerely hope he may be enabled to do so. It is time for us to put forth an earnest effort for the west ; and especially as now many soldiers are returning home from the war. Numbers of these have heard of the life theme, and of our sympathy with them by means of tracts and papers we have sent there. That seed has not been lost. It has been sown not only in the army of the Potomac, but in the army which marched through Georgia. Let us now strive to continue the work. To this end it is essential that we send help to the West. If Br. Campbell and Holt could both be sustained in that field for months to come, it would, we think, be a blessing to them and to the cause. The first meeting to be held there is to commence on the 16th inst., in Fulton Co., and to hold three days. Who will help in this work? May the Lord open all our hearts to the importance of working while the day lasts.

The Harlot Woman.

We have long been of the opinion that such is the determination of the Roman Catholic power to crush out liberty, every where, that its harlot head would be so lifted up in this country that it would yet have to be crushed by some thing besides a mere moral power. If that necessity should arise, we have no fear for the result : that power must die : God has so decreed it : "Whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." The day of the destruction of the Harlot power is not far off ; and when the time comes, like the slaveholders' rebellion, its leaders and upholders will be given up in their madness to destroy their own system of wickedness in their attempt to subjugate others. Then comes its death struggle ; and, like slavery and its abettors, it will sink like "a great millstone cast into the sea, to rise no more at all." We have been led to these remarks by the following article which we take from The Methodist. Let it be pondered well.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

Recent numbers of the Canadian papers inform us that the Rev. Mr. Cameron, a Protestant clergyman, who has gained a certain notoriety by his zeal in behalf of the rebels, and who recently attracted general attention by openly expressing joy over the assassination of President Lincoln, has been received into the Roman Catholic Church. The same step, it is stated, has been taken by Dr. Blackburn, who is now on trial for conceiving the fiendish plan of importing, by means of infected rags, the Yellow fever into New York.

Lieutenant Young, also, the chief of the Vermont raiders and bank-robbers, has declared that he is utterly dissatisfied with Protestantism, and has a decided preference for Roman Catholicism.

Mrs. Surratt, whose house was the rendezvous of the assassinators of President Lincoln, and who swore when her house was searched that she did not know Payne, and had never seen him, while at the very moment he was within sight of her, and had been a regular visitor of the house since February, is a devout member of the Roman Catholic Church, who has been accustomed to go to confession every other week.

It is said that the majority of all the assassins are Roman Catholics.

The instigators of the bloody riots in New York, in 1863, were known to be so predominantly Roman Catholic, that the Archbishop of New York expected that his word would have a soothing influence upon them, and invited them to meet before his house and to hear an address from him.

While the entire Protestant press of all denominations has been almost a unit in loyally supporting the government, the great majority of the Roman Catholic periodicals have distinguished themselves by factious and violent opposition to the government, and open sympathy with the rebellion. The Herald and Visitor, of Philadelphia, used language so violent and abusive, that it was openly censured by some of the bishops, and had to be discontinued. The Monitor, of San Francisco, has recently been mobbed, being regarded as one of the most obnoxious rebel sheets. The Baltimore Mirror has always been in sympathy with the party who intended to carry Maryland over to the Southern Confederacy. In Missouri there is hardly a Roman Catholic in the party which, after so desperate a struggle, saved Missouri for the Union and freed it from the bane of slavery. The Catholic vote of the State was almost a unit against the measures looking toward emancipation. The only pro-slavery member in the next Congress from Missouri, is the publisher of the Catholic organ of the State. We need not again speak of the attitude of the Freeman's Journal and the Metropolitan Record, of this city. Whoever has read a few numbers of these periodicals, especially the latter, will have seen that if a paper here in the North wished the success of the rebels, the overthrow of the laws of the land, insurrection and revolution, and the removal by force of the President twice chosen by the people, it could not have spoken more to the point than these two did.

The Catholic organs of all the countries of Europe have been nearly unanimous in wishing success to the rebels. The Monde, in Paris, the leading ultramontane paper of the world, the Weekly Register of London, the Tablet, of Dublin, and nearly all the Catholic papers of Germany, have expressed about our war the same views which we used to find in the rebel journals of Richmond.

Of all the governments in the world, there is only one which has entered into a direct correspondence with the government of the rebel Confederacy, and which has given to Jefferson Davis the title of "most illustrious President." This only government is that of the Pope.

We naturally ask, What does all this mean? Some of the facts which we have mentioned in the first part of our article may be somewhat modified by latter reports. We have stated them as we find them floating in the papers, though we believe every one of them to be true. What we have said about the riots, the Catholic press, and the relations of the Pope to Jefferson Davis, are well-known facts of history. Can the Roman Catholics point us to any religious denomination—Christian or non-Christian—which has exhibited an equal amount of hostility to the United States, and which on this very ground has gained the friendship of all our deadly foes?

The Promise Redeemed.

My article of week before last has elicited a response from the Editor of the Crisis, in which entire forgetfulness of his promise is assigned as the reason why it was not kept ; and he adds that "it did not come to mind till mentioned by" myself. From this latter statement Br. G.'s readers will conclude that his first knowledge of his omission was derived from my published article. The fact, however, is that his attention was distinctly called to it, by me, on the 28th of April, in a personal interview at his office. He may have forgotten the occurrence, but the mention of it is necessary to explain why, in my article written nineteen days later, I should have felt justified in saying, "There is reason, however, for believing that the negative got his eyes open before he had completed his second article." If my brother did not forget having been reminded of his promise, the gladness he now expresses at having his attention called to it, is in a measure dimmed by his having suffered four May issues of his paper to appear without any attempt at explanation. He avows himself "happy to fulfil" his "promise"—says it is not "hard to keep," but "directly the opposite,—very easy."

I wish to express my thanks to Br. G. for giving his readers nearly the whole of my article. But while I do this, it must be said that his power to suppress a portion of what I wrote has been used in such a way to excite strong suspicion that he even yet does not think himself competent to confront the entire truth in respect to the belief of the Pharisees. The reader will understand this when I state, that the matter in my article which Br. G. leaves out in copying (in addition to my last paragraph of two sentences, the suppression of which is not indicated by any sign whatever) is what is contained in the unbracketed portion of the two following paragraphs :—

But since—according to Br. G. and the Pharisees—the "unjust" named in the passage in Acts, are better persons than the "notoriously wicked," the resurrection of the former class must, by every dictate of reason, be held to be not a curse, but a blessing. But if it be a blessing, it should secure salvation—eternal salvation; and that—according to the information derived by Br. G. from the Rabbi—is precisely what the Pharisees believed it would secure. The conclusion, therefore, of the whole matter is this: Br. Grant's "better" understanding of Acts xxiv. 15, results exclusively from his having discovered that the "notoriously wicked," are not in the passage at all, and that the "unjust," whom it does mention, are a class that are to be saved. This is the platform on which my brother's article places him. If he does not occupy it in fact, [let him tell his readers, if he can, in what way his conference with "the Jew" helped him to a better understanding than he previously had of "Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15."]

[My conviction is that the promise is one that cannot be fulfilled] inasmuch as what Br. G. learned from the Rabbi is not in favor of the revival and subsequent destruction of any of the dead, but utterly against that view.

Br. G., in introducing my article says : "As the article relates to the Editor of the Crisis, our readers may be interested to read an extract from it of some length." Yes, my brother; but you have, evidently of set purpose, refused to let me tell your "readers," or to tell them yourself, that—according to Dr. Noot and yourself—the Pharisees, though they "allowed" the resurrection of the "unjust," did not "allow" two things which you hold, and which you say Paul taught, viz., 1. That the "notoriously wicked" are included among the "unjust ;" and, 2. That the "unjust" who rise from the dead are to die afterwards. You know that I here faithfully represent what you believe in regard to the Pharisees. Why, then, conceal the facts from your readers, unless it be that you deem them seriously damaging to the resurrection doctrine which you suppose has so firm a foundation in Acts xxiv. 15? If you "are glad Br. Wendell has called" your "attention," in the foregoing, to points so manifestly important in their bearing on our difference of sentiment, be assured that he and others, will be happy to be informed how—if at all—you reconcile the agreement which you affirm existed between the Pharisees and Paul, in regard to the resurrection of the wicked, with your belief that the Pharisees held to the eternal salvation of all who are raised. You may set it down as quite certain, my brother, that, until you pay some kind of attention to this point, the readers of the Herald of Life will suspect you of being consciously in a very tight place. Do speak out, and don't wait till the matter is "entirely forgotten."

Br. Grant shall now tell our readers, as he has told his own, what assistance he obtained from the Jewish rabbi in understanding Acts xxiv. 15 "better than ever before." What he says on the subject, with nothing omitted, is as follows :—

Previous to the time when we consulted Dr. Noot, who is a Jew, and holds to the same doctrine entertained by the Pharisees, on the subject of the resurrection, as he himself declared to us, we found an apparent difficulty in harmonizing Paul's statement in Acts xxiv. 15, with the following from Josephus :

"The Pharisees....believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards and punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life ; and the latter are to be detained in everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again."—Josephus Ant. b. 18, c. 1, s. 3.

Acts xxiv. 15 reads as follows :—"And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." It will be seen that there is an apparent contradiction between Paul's statement and that of Josephus, which was all harmonized by the information we received from the modern Pharisee, Dr. Noot. Paul declares that he believed in the "resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." No one, we think, who has carefully read the New Testament Scriptures, would dispute for a moment that the "unjust" are the wicked, in distinction from the righteous, and embrace all of mankind who are not saved.

The difficulty in our mind was to see how the Pharisees could deny the resurrection of the wicked and yet "allow," as Paul says, "that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." We turned to the commentary of Dr. Pearce on Acts xxiv. 15, and on the phrase "both of the just and unjust," found the following :—"This truth Paul had probably not learned till after his conversion ; because he was a Pharisee, and the Pharisees believed that the just only would be raised."—Com. Vol. ii., p. 166. Dr. Noot informed us that the Pharisees believed that the "notoriously wicked would not be raised," but those who had been only moderately wicked would have a resurrection. This fact cleared up the whole difficulty. Paul declared his faith in the resurrection of all mankind by saying he believed in the resurrection "both of the just and unjust," which includes all, both good and bad ; and then shows them that they really admit the same thing when they "allow" the resurrection of the "unjust," although they deny that the "notoriously wicked" will ever be raised.

Jesus has taught us to "beware of the.... doctrine of the Pharisees," as well as of the Sadducees. Let us heed his admonition.

There, reader, is reasoning for you! Because the Pharisees believed the "moderately wicked" would be raised and saved, Paul claims them as indorsers of his "hope" (what a thing to hope for!) that all the "wicked" dead will be raised to a miserable temporary existence, and afterwards be burned to death! And thus has Br. G. "cleared up the whole difficulty" that existed in his mind at the time when Josephus and Dr. Pearce were his only sources of information respecting the belief of the Pharisees on the question of the resurrection. If my brother ever reaches the point where he can "allow" the doctrine of Life only in Christ, let us "hope" that the gap between him and believers in that precious truth may not be quite so broad as the one that he thinks separated Paul and the Pharisees.

Br. G.'s application of the Saviour's caution respecting the "doctrine of the Pharisees," is as wide of the mark as it possibly can be. This was shown in the debate, but need not be dwelt upon just now. The point will come up in its proper place.

The Two Forms of Life.

"For if ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live."—Rom. viii. 13.

In these words the Apostle presents to our view the two forms of human life, the fleshly and the spiritual, and their respective consequences, death and life eternal. Consider therefore,

1. What is the exact signification of the phrase "living after the flesh." We may be certain that there are two things which the Apostle does not mean. He does not intend by this phrase, the occasional sins, infirmities, and slips of good men.—No man in the estimation of God is thoroughly sinless ; yet in those who shall be saved, there is implanted a victorious principle of moral and spiritual excellence, which under favorable circumstances, would speedily develop itself as a divine nature triumphant over the last vestiges of evil in the human constitution. Neither does the Apostle intend by this expression "living after the flesh," the habit of attending to duties on earth which spring out of fleshly relationships. There are some persons who spend the first part of their lives as if there were no God ; and the second half as if there were no world. But the spirit of true religion displays itself, not in the affectations of asceticism, nor in the ambition to become an angel before the time. It is a family spirit. It is intended to make good husbands, good wives, good parents, good children, good masters, servants, good neighbors, good citizen ; and if it does not accomplish this, it accomplishes nothing. Men are to be judged according to the deeds done in the body.

"The flesh" is the scriptural term employed to designate the unreformed nature of man, in its totality. To walk after the flesh is to follow the course of a sinful world. It is to lead a life without God, without prayer, without truth, without self-restraint, without love, —a life of business without a religious aim, or a life of pleasure without any reference to principle,—a life which is a mere struggle for existence and amusement, without grace to ennoble it now, or glory to crown it hereafter. It is such a life as that which is lead by the overwhelming majority of our fellow-creatures ; whether we regard the victims of grossness and debauchery, or the more refined millions of triflers who people the civilized world.. The human natue was formed to be a temple of the Deity,—to enshrine the thought of God as the ruling power, as the Jewish temple contained the Shekinah at Jerusalem; and whensoever a human life is spent thus, "without God in the world," the residuum is "flesh," and its "end is to be burned."

2. The Apostle declares what shall be the proper penalty of such a career,—"If ye live after the flesh ye shall die." In the Greek the expression is peculiarly marked and emphatic,—"ye are about to die," or "ye are on the point of death." It is a phrase composed of two verbs ; which are thus translated in John iv. 47—"and besought Jesus to heal his son for he was at the point of death." Here the phrase is the same with that which in our text is translated, "ye shall die." All life around us is transitory, vegetable and animal. It passes away with the organism which it animated ; like the frost-work on our windows in winter when the sun appears. An animal life on the part of mankind—a life after the flesh, will result also in death, "ye shall die!" "The letter or law of God killeth." 2. Cor. 3. "Bring hither mine enemies and slay them before me!" "The world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Ye shall die! When the messengers of "Him that was dead and is alive again," declare that sinful persons shall die, it is not a far-fetched conclusion, but a reverential and honest inference from such a word, that they will literally perish, be slain, be killed with death, be destroyed body and soul : and it is in vain that men, in the face of such a threatening, flatter themselves with the possession of a natural immortality, or natural deathlessness. No ; the word of God will be fulfilled. The wicked are at the point of death. Christ comes quickly ; and when he shall appear, he will execute the judgments of God against an impenitent world,—"in flaming fire taking vengence against them that know not God and obey not the gospel of his Son." If fire be not an instrument of destruction, it must be a fire of a different nature from that well-known element so often spoken of in the Scriptures—"He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

Thus has God, the eternal being, duly warned mankind to improve wisely their span of life below. He offers us on one side, an existence in sin, which is, "but for a moment;" on the other, an existence in holy obedience, which is of everlasting duration. "Behold I set before you death and life, therefore choose life."

3. "If ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body." Man is helpless without the divine Life-giving spirit ; but the human agency works out salvation along with the Divine. The stately ship floats on the heaving ocean with her sails set. The winds of heaven supply the motive force ; but there is a voluntary navigation below and aloft which spreads the sails and guides the helm. Even thus the Spirit bloweth where it listeth and furnishes the motive force in the heavenly voyage of the soul ; but a voluntary intelligence spreads out the moral faculties to be filled with the Spirit, and yields itself to be impelled by the celestial gale.

The mortification of the animal nature, with its licentious and angry passions, is the great work of the Christian life. The power to accomplish this result must be derived from a positive, not a negative force. The monastic are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord :(for we walk by faith, not by sight:) we are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord."

The imagery—for the language is obviously figurative—is that of an earthly house of this tabernacle, which is condemned to be dissolved, and which was the Apostle's appropriate image to describe the mortality of the creature man. Man, the one complex being, is compared to an earthly house, or tabernacle, which will be dissolved. Nothing is here said nor implied about an immortal and essentially permanent part of man, which in its own nature is independent of this general and complete dissolution, which is most unaccountable, as on the popular supposition this immortal part is the human personality. The believer is here taught that he himself, in his one totality, not a part of himself, must be dissolved. But he knows that if like an earthly house, he must crumble in dissolution, he will be restored again in the beauty and durability of a building of God, a house not made with hands, but one that is eternal in the heavens. Here the two states of the believer's existence are described by an earthly house, or tabernacle, which must dissolve, and a building of God, a house eternal in the heavens.

According to the popular interpretation of this text, Paul should have said, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved,—that is, if our body were to be put off in death,—we have yet within us an imperishable soul or spirit which cannot be dissolved." But he does not say this,—he does not say that we retain in ourselves anything which survives the dissolution of the earthly house of this tabernacle. What he says is, if this present nature dissolves in death, we know that God has provided another nature, even an incorruptible and imperishable one— a house eternal in the heavens— which he will bestow upon us when he recreates us by Christ Jesus at the resurrection.. "We know," says Paul, that "we have [not an immortal soul, but] a building of God; [not an eternal soul within, but] a house eternal in the heavens."

Paul is undoubtedly speaking of the two bodies, or conditions of human existence, to which he alludes in the 15th chapter of the first epistle,—"There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body ;" and hence he says in the second verse, "For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." As if he had said, "While our bodily nature is under the power of dissolution we have no nature or being,—we in fact cease to be, and therefore, in the view of this dissolution, we groan for our new immortal nature—our house from heaven." The Apostle evidently desired to be clothed upon with an eternal house, when this tabernacle or temporary house was destroyed. He makes not the faintest allusion to any survivance of mortality as a disembodied soul. He groans to be clothed upon, as he also says in another epistle, [Rom. viii. 23,] "Even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." "For we that are in this tabernacle [dwelling as mortal creatures] do groan being burdened, not for that we would be unclothed [we desire not to die,] but clothed upon [with our eternal house from heaven, which is our resurrection nature], that mortality might be swallowed up of life." "Therefore, we are always confident ;" for we know that if on the one hand, as mortal beings, we dissolve in death,—on the other hand, as beings upon whom God has conferred, through Christ, the gift of immortality, we shall, when we are raised from the dead and receive our spiritual natures, live again as immortal beings "eternal in the heavens." "We are always confident" of this, and know "that whilst we are at home in the body,"—that is, whilst we are existing as earthly tabernacles, mortal and perishable, "we are absent from the Lord," with whom we cannot be until we have put off our mortality —because "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God,"—and have assumed our immortality ; which will be when we are raised from the dead in our spiritual body,—our building of God,—our house which is eternal in the heavens. "We are confident," I say, of so glorious a re-creation in Christ Jesus awaiting us ; and are therefore, "willing rather to be absent from the body," that is from our natural body,—our present mortal and corruptible nature, which separates us from the Lord, and to be possessed of our spiritual body, our new incorruptible nature —in order that we may be present with the Lord, which cannot be until the resurrection, when mortality shall be swallowed up of life. A FRIEND in Philadelphia sends us $5, to be applied in such manner as may best promote the cause of truth." The name of this friend we cannot decipher with certainty. The nearest we can come to it is, NANCY M. CHRIST ; though we are not sure that is it; but the $5 is just as acceptable, and we will apply it as a donation to the Herald of Life.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, JUNE 7, 1865.

Our Late Tour.

After an absence of ten days the EDITOR is again at his post editorial. His visit to New England was one of interest in several particulars. He met with a hearty reception in Boston, and preached at Kast Hall to good, attentive, and interested congregations, two Sabbaths. It was good and pleasant to be there ; and many were the greetings we received. Monday, after the first Sabbath in Boston, the Editor took the cars for Lebanon, N. H., one hundred and twenty miles from Boston. This was done in order to see, once more, an only brother, according to the flesh, who is now 77 years old. Only one interview had he had with this brother for twenty-one years previously ; and not expecting to meet him again in this our pilgrimage, we thought to improve this week of release from our office in making what we presumed would be a last visit to that brother. We found him with life more spent than we anticipated ; having been rapidly declining for some weeks previous, though unknown to us till our arrival at his house. He was unable to sit up or converse much ; and we hardly expected him to survive through the week ; but we left him much the same at the close of the week. The interview was one of interest to us both.

This brother and ourself are all that remain of a family of eight children : one daughter and seven sons, of whom the Editor was the youngest. Six of those children died between the ages of twenty and forty-five ; all of the consumption in some form ; but we two escaped it, and have survived the one who died last, thirty-three years. So hath God wrought with us.

This aged brother of ours, though nine years older than ourself did not devote himself to Christ till some two or three years after we did. At the age of nineteen we commenced speaking for our Lord and Redeemer in social meetings ; at one of those meetings this brother felt, as his younger brother had set out to serve the Lord, it was high time he should do the same, and thenceforward devoted himself to Christ. Many were the conferences and prayer-meetings we afterwards attended, together, praying with and exhorting the people ; always laboring together in the most perfect harmony and with comfort. At length, however, the younger was led to embrace a doctrine different from the Calvinistic, in which both of us had been educated, though in a somewhat modified form through the influence of our beloved Mother, who fell asleep in Jesus about twenty-seven years since. This theological difference did not divide us in affection, but it led the younger brother out, in a few months, from his native town, preaching the gospel as a Methodist traveling preacher. Our personal intercourse was, after that, much interrupted ; and we saw each other but seldom.

Twenty-five years since, we made a still further theological advance, and left the Methodist connection for the faith we now maintain; though at first we saw only the root of our present theological views, viz., that man was not possessed of inherent immortality, and that such an inheritance was a gift of God only to the righteous. Still, no alienation of affection was produced between these brothers, though the older one thought his "brother George" had fallen into a great error ; yet he fully believed he was "once in grace," and had no fears but what he would get safe through. After A. D. 1844 we saw him but once till our late interview ; and we parted with him now fully believing his heart is joined unto the Lord, and that he will sleep in Jesus and come from the dead to life eternal at the last day, when our Lord shall raise his sleeping saints.

While in Lebanon, we visited the graves of our father and mother, and of our brothers and sister, as also that of our first wife and only child by her ; all of whom, with the exception of one brother, sleep together there. Our thoughts and reflections while there are too private for public record. While we looked over the many tomb-stones and read the inscriptions of many names of those we knew in our youth and more advanced years, the inquiry arose, How many of these graves will be opened "at the last day"? We left the thought for a decision by Him who is "the resurrection and the life." Concerning some, however, we felt no doubt they would "come again from the land of the enemy."

At this visit to our native place we went to the spot where we were born, and asked permission to enter that house, which we had not before entered for twenty-one years. How changed was everything we beheld. The house and farm had passed out of our family connections years since; decay and desolation had come over all. The house, which was a two story one, with an extension of one story, had always, while in the hands of our father and family, been kept painted white, now had the appearance of almost utter desolation; and looked more like some old barn than the cheerful habitation of a once flourishing family and home; and all around it—outbuildings, fences, stone-walls, orchards, &c.,—carried the appearance of old age which it would be impossible to renew, except by that renewing power which shall "create all things new."

So passes life away; and all the charms of youth and the fond desires and anticipations of early life. Happy indeed is he who shall make it the first and chief end of this life to secure an inheritance in that blessed state where desolation never comes, nor changes are made except from glory to glory. Let us all, then, cease from those useless cares and anxieties which so disturb most of our fellow men. Soon, very soon, these cares and anxieties will come to an end. Have we secured the treasure that fadeth not away? If so, we have lived to purpose; if not, we have lived in vain, and spent our strength for naught.

P. S.—Since writing the foregoing we have received a note from a Niece in Lebanon, dated Saturday the 3rd inst., saying:—"Our dear father has just passed away at five minutes past ten o'clock this morning. He breathed out his life gently."

Thus "I am left alone" of a once large family. I have neither father, mother, brother or sister according to the flesh; and "yet I am not alone," for God has given me many brethren and sisters in Christ our elder Brother; and He ever liveth; because He liveth his friends shall live also.

The Western Mission.

At our third Quarterly Conference ; held in this City in April, it was resolved to do something for the West, and some $75 were pledged at the time for this purpose. Eld. W. S. CAMPBELL will set out in a few days for Illinois, to attend a series of meetings to be held there. We wish not only that he should go, but that we may be able to send out at the same time, a quantity of tracts for gratuitous circulation. To this end, it is desirable that the money pledged for the mission should be now paid in, and that others who are able should contribute to the object. Will they not do so immediately? Eld. D. S Holt, also, of New Hampshire, we understand, is willing to go out West with his tent. We sincerely hope he may be enabled to do so. It is time for us to put forth an earnest effort for the west ; and especially as now many soldiers are returning home from the war. Numbers of these have heard of the life theme, and of our sympathy with them by means of tracts and papers we have sent there. That seed has not been lost. It has been sown not only in the army of the Potomac, but in the army which marched through Georgia. Let us now strive to continue the work. To this end it is essential that we send help to the West. If Br. Campbell and Holt could both be sustained in that field for months to come, it would, we think, be a blessing to them and to the cause. The first meeting to be held there is to commence on the 16th inst., in Fulton Co., and to hold three days. Who will help in this work? May the Lord open all our hearts to the importance of working while the day lasts.

The Harlot Woman.

We have long been of the opinion that such is the determination of the Roman Catholic power to crush out liberty, every where, that its harlot head would be so lifted up in this country that it would yet have to be crushed by some thing besides a mere moral power. If that necessity should arise, we have no fear for the result : that power must die : God has so decreed it : "Whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." The day of the destruction of the Harlot power is not far off ; and when the time comes, like the slaveholders' rebellion, its leaders and upholders will be given up in their madness to destroy their own system of wickedness in their attempt to subjugate others. Then comes its death struggle ; and, like slavery and its abettors, it will sink like "a great millstone cast into the sea, to rise no more at all." We have been led to these remarks by the following article which we take from The Methodist. Let it be pondered well.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

Recent numbers of the Canadian papers inform us that the Rev. Mr. Cameron, a Protestant clergyman, who has gained a certain notoriety by his zeal in behalf of the rebels, and who recently attracted general attention by openly expressing joy over the assassination of President Lincoln, has been received into the Roman Catholic Church. The same step, it is stated, has been taken by Dr. Blackburn, who is now on trial for conceiving the fiendish plan of importing, by means of infected rags, the Yellow fever into New York.

Lieutenant Young, also, the chief of the Vermont raiders and bank-robbers, has declared that he is utterly dissatisfied with Protestantism, and has a decided preference for Roman Catholicism.

Mrs. Surratt, whose house was the rendezvous of the assassinators of President Lincoln, and who swore when her house was searched that she did not know Payne, and had never seen him, while at the very moment he was within sight of her, and had been a regular visitor of the house since February, is a devout member of the Roman Catholic Church, who has been accustomed to go to confession every other week.

It is said that the majority of all the assassins are Roman Catholics.

The instigators of the bloody riots in New York, in 1863, were known to be so predominantly Roman Catholic, that the Archbishop of New York expected that his word would have a soothing influence upon them, and invited them to meet before his house and to hear an address from him.

While the entire Protestant press of all denominations has been almost a unit in loyally supporting the government, the great majority of the Roman Catholic periodicals have distinguished themselves by factious and violent opposition to the government, and open sympathy with the rebellion. The Herald and Visitor, of Philadelphia, used language so violent and abusive, that it was openly censured by some of the bishops, and had to be discontinued. The Monitor, of San Francisco, has recently been mobbed, being regarded as one of the most obnoxious rebel sheets. The Baltimore Mirror has always been in sympathy with the party who intended to carry Maryland over to the Southern Confederacy. In Missouri there is hardly a Roman Catholic in the party which, after so desperate a struggle, saved Missouri for the Union and freed it from the bane of slavery. The Catholic vote of the State was almost a unit against the measures looking toward emancipation. The only pro-slavery member in the next Congress from Missouri, is the publisher of the Catholic organ of the State. We need not again speak of the attitude of the Freeman's Journal and the Metropolitan Record, of this city. Whoever has read a few numbers of these periodicals, especially the latter, will have seen that if a paper here in the North wished the success of the rebels, the overthrow of the laws of the land, insurrection and revolution, and the removal by force of the President twice chosen by the people, it could not have spoken more to the point than these two did.

The Catholic organs of all the countries of Europe have been nearly unanimous in wishing success to the rebels. The Monde, in Paris, the leading ultramontane paper of the world, the Weekly Register of London, the Tablet, of Dublin, and nearly all the Catholic papers of Germany, have expressed about our war the same views which we used to find in the rebel journals of Richmond.

Of all the governments in the world, there is only one which has entered into a direct correspondence with the government of the rebel Confederacy, and which has given to Jefferson Davis the title of "most illustrious President." This only government is that of the Pope.

We naturally ask, What does all this mean? Some of the facts which we have mentioned in the first part of our article may be somewhat modified by latter reports. We have stated them as we find them floating in the papers, though we believe every one of them to be true. What we have said about the riots, the Catholic press, and the relations of the Pope to Jefferson Davis, are well-known facts of history. Can the Roman Catholics point us to any religious denomination—Christian or non-Christian—which has exhibited an equal amount of hostility to the United States, and which on this very ground has gained the friendship of all our deadly foes?

The Promise Redeemed.

My article of week before last has elicited a response from the Editor of the Crisis, in which entire forgetfulness of his promise is assigned as the reason why it was not kept ; and he adds that "it did not come to mind till mentioned by" myself. From this latter statement Br. G.'s readers will conclude that his first knowledge of his omission was derived from my published article. The fact, however, is that his attention was distinctly called to it, by me, on the 28th of April, in a personal interview at his office. He may have forgotten the occurrence, but the mention of it is necessary to explain why, in my article written nineteen days later, I should have felt justified in saying, "There is reason, however, for believing that the negative got his eyes open before he had completed his second article." If my brother did not forget having been reminded of his promise, the gladness he now expresses at having his attention called to it, is in a measure dimmed by his having suffered four May issues of his paper to appear without any attempt at explanation. He avows himself "happy to fulfil" his "promise"—says it is not "hard to keep," but "directly the opposite,—very easy."

I wish to express my thanks to Br. G. for giving his readers nearly the whole of my article. But while I do this, it must be said that his power to suppress a portion of what I wrote has been used in such a way to excite strong suspicion that he even yet does not think himself competent to confront the entire truth in respect to the belief of the Pharisees. The reader will understand this when I state, that the matter in my article which Br. G. leaves out in copying (in addition to my last paragraph of two sentences, the suppression of which is not indicated by any sign whatever) is what is contained in the unbracketed portion of the two following paragraphs :—

But since—according to Br. G. and the Pharisees —the "unjust" named in the passage in Acts, are better persons than the "notoriously wicked," the resurrection of the former class must, by every dictate of reason, be held to be not a curse, but a blessing. But if it be a blessing, it should secure salvation—ETERNAL SALVATION; and that—according to the information derived by Br. G. from the Rabbi—is precisely what the Pharisees believed it would secure. The conclusion, therefore, of the whole matter is this: Br. Grant's "better" understanding of Acts xxiv. 15, results exclusively from his having discovered that the "notoriously wicked," are not in the passage at all, and that the "UNJUST," whom it does mention, are a class that are to be SAVED. This is the platform on which my brother's article places him. If he does not occupy it in fact, [let him tell his readers, if he can, in what way his conference with "the Jew" helped him to a better understanding than he previously had of "Paul's language in Acts xxiv. 15."]

[My conviction is that the promise is one that cannot be fulfilled] inasmuch as what Br. G. learned from the Rabbi is not in favor of the revival and subsequent destruction of any of the dead, but utterly against that view.

Br. G., in introducing my article says : "As the article relates to the Editor of the Crisis, our readers may be interested to read an extract from it of some length." Yes, my brother; but you have, evidently of set purpose, refused to let me tell your "readers," or to tell them yourself, that—according to Dr. Noot and yourself—the Pharisees, though they "allowed" the resurrection of the "unjust," did not "allow" two things which you hold, and which you say Paul taught, viz., 1. That the "notoriously wicked" are included among the "unjust ;" and, 2. That the "unjust" who rise from the dead are to die afterwards. You know that I here faithfully represent what you believe in regard to the Pharisees. Why, then, conceal the facts from your readers, unless it be that you deem them seriously damaging to the resurrection doctrine which you suppose has so firm a foundation in Acts xxiv. 15? If you "are glad Br. Wendell has called" your "attention," in the foregoing, to points so manifestly important in their bearing on our difference of sentiment, be assured that he and others, will be happy to be informed how—if at all—you reconcile the agreement which you affirm existed between the Pharisees and Paul, in regard to the resurrection of the wicked, with your belief that the Pharisees held to the eternal salvation of all who are raised. You may set it down as quite certain, my brother, that, until you pay some kind of attention to this point, the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE will suspect you of being consciously in a very tight place. Do speak out, and don't wait till the matter is "entirely forgotten."

Br. Grant shall now tell our readers, as he has told his own, what assistance he obtained from the Jewish rabbi in understanding Acts xxiv. 15 "better than ever before." What he says on the subject, with nothing omitted, is as follows :—

Previous to the time when we consulted Dr. Noot, who is a Jew, and holds to the same doctrine entertained by the Pharisees, on the subject of the resurrection, as he himself declared to us, we found an apparent difficulty in harmonizing Paul's statement in Acts xxiv. 15, with the following from Josephus :

"The Pharisees.... believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards and punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life ; and the latter are to be detained in everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again."—Josephus Ant. b. 18, c. 1, s. 3.

Acts xxiv. 15 reads as follows :—"And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." It will be seen that there is an apparent contradiction between Paul's statement and that of Josephus, which was all harmonized by the information we received from the modern Pharisee, Dr. Noot. Paul declares that he believed in the "resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." No one, we think, who has carefully read the New Testament Scriptures, would dispute for a moment that the "unjust" are the wicked, in distinction from the righteous, and embrace all of mankind who are not saved.

The difficulty in our mind was to see how the Pharisees could deny the resurrection of the wicked and yet "allow," as Paul says, "that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." We turned to the commentary of Dr. Pearce on Acts xxiv. 15, and on the phrase "both of the just and unjust," found the following:—"This truth Paul had probably not learned till after his conversion ; because he was a Pharisee, and the Pharisees believed that the just only would be raised."—Com. Vol. ii., p. 166. Dr. Noot informed us that the Pharisees believed that the "notoriously wicked would not be raised," but those who had been only moderately wicked would have a resurrection. This fact cleared up the whole difficulty. Paul declared his faith in the resurrection of all mankind by saying he believed in the resurrection "both of the just and unjust," which includes all, both good and bad ; and then shows them that they really admit the same thing when they "allow" the resurrection of the "unjust," although they deny that the "notoriously wicked" will ever be raised.

Jesus has taught us to "beware of the.... doctrine of the Pharisees," as well as of the Sadducees. Let us heed his admonition.

There, reader, is reasoning for you! Because the Pharisees believed the "moderately wicked" would be raised and SAVED, Paul claims them as indorsers of his "hope" (what a thing to hope for!) that all the "wicked" dead will be raised to a miserable temporary existence, and afterwards be burned to death! And thus has Br. G. "cleared up the whole difficulty" that existed in his mind at the time when Josephus and Dr. Pearce were his only sources of information respecting the belief of the Pharisees on the question of the resurrection. If my brother ever reaches the point where he can "allow" the doctrine of Life only in Christ, let us "hope" that the gap between him and believers in that precious truth may not be quite so broad as the one that he thinks separated Paul and the Pharisees.

Br. G.'s application of the Saviour's caution respecting the "doctrine of the Pharisees," is as wide of the mark as it possibly can be. This was shown in the debate, but need not be dwelt upon just now. The point will come up in its proper place. H. W.

The Two Forms of Life.

"For if ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live."—Rom. viii. 13.

In these words the Apostle presents to our view the two forms of human life, the fleshly and the spiritual, and their respective consequences, death and life eternal. Consider therefore,

1. What is the exact signification of the phrase "living after the flesh." We may be certain that there are two things which the Apostle does not mean. He does not intend by this phrase, the occasional sins, infirmities, and slips of good men.—No man in the estimation of God is thoroughly sinless ; yet in those who shall be saved, there is implanted a victorious principle of moral and spiritual excellence, which under favorable circumstances, would speedily develop itself as a divine nature triumphant over the last vestiges of evil in the human constitution. Neither does the Apostle intend by this expression "living after the flesh," the habit of attending to duties on earth which spring out of fleshly relationships. There are some persons who spend the first part of their lives as if there were no God ; and the second half as if there were no world. But the spirit of true religion displays itself, not in the affectatious of asceticism, nor in the ambition to become an angel before the time. It is a family spirit. It is intended to make good husbands, good wives, good parents, good children, good masters, servants, good neighbors, good citizen ; and if it does not accomplish this, it accomplishes nothing. Men are to be judged according to the deeds done in the body.

"The flesh" is the scriptural term employed to designate the unreformed nature of man, in its totality. To walk after the flesh is to follow the course of a sinful world. It is to lead a life without God, without prayer, without truth, without self-restraint, without love, —a life of business without a religious aim, or a life of pleasure without any reference to principle,—a life which is a mere struggle for existence and amusement, without grace to ennoble it now, or glory to crown it hereafter. It is such a life as that which is lead by the overwhelming majority of our fellow-creatures ; whether we regard the victims of grossness and debauchery, or the more refined millions of triflers who people the civilized world.. The human natue was formed to be a temple of the Deity,—to enshrine the thought of God as the ruling power, as the Jewish temple contained the Shekinah at Jerusalem; and whensoever a human life is spent thus, "without God in the world," the residuum is "flesh," and its "end is to be burned."

2. The Apostle declares what shall be the proper penalty of such a career,—"If ye live after the flesh ye shall die." In the Greek the expression is peculiarly marked and emphatic,—"ye are about to die," or "ye are on the point of death." It is a phrase composed of two verbs ; which are thus translated in John iv. 47—"and besought Jesus to heal his son for he was at the point of death." Here the phrase is the same with that which in our text is translated, "ye shall die." All life around us is transitory, vegetable and animal. It passes away with the organism which it animated ; like the frost-work on our windows in winter when the sun appears. An animal life on the part of mankind—a life after the flesh, will result also in death, "ye shall die !" "The letter or law of God killeth." 2. Cor. 3. "Bring hither mine enemies and slay them before me !" "The world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Ye shall die ! When the messengers of "Him that was dead and is alive again," declare that sinful persons shall die, it is not a far-fetched conclusion, but a reverential and honest inference from such a word, that they will literally perish, be slain, be killed with death, be destroyed body and soul : and it is in vain that men, in the face of such a threatening, flatter themselves with the possession of a natural immortality, or natural deathlessness. No ; the word of God will be fulfilled. The wicked are at the point of death. Christ comes quickly ; and when he shall appear, he will execute the judgments of God against an impenitent world,—"in flaming fire taking vengence against them that know not God and obey not the gospel of his Son." If fire be not an instrument of destruction, it must be a fire of a different nature from that well-known element so often spoken of in the Scriptures—"He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

Thus has God, the eternal being, duly warned mankind to improve wisely their span of life below. He offers us on one side, an existence in sin, which is, "but for a moment;" on the other, an existence in holy obedience, which is of everlasting duration. "Behold I set before you death and life, therefore choose life."

3. "If ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body." Man is helpless without the divine Life-giving spirit ; but the human agency works out salvation along with the Divine. The stately ship floats on the heaving ocean with her sails set. The winds of heaven supply the motive force ; but there is a voluntary navigation below and aloft which spreads the sails and guides the helm. Even thus the Spirit bloweth where it listeth and furnishes the motive force in the heavenly voyage of the soul ; but a voluntary intelligence spreads out the moral faculties to be filled with the Spirit, and yields itself to be impelled by the celestial gale.

The mortification of the animal nature, with its licentious and angry passions, is the great work of the Christian life. The power to accomplish this result must be derived from a positive, not a negative force. The monastic system of cheerless legality attempted this in the middle ages, and failed from want of a positive antagonist power. This supplied to us by that truth which the Spirit teaches concerning Jesus our Lord. Here is the expulsive power of a new affection. Love to God in Christ must cast out sin; and we love him, in consequence of having something to love him for—beause he hath first loved us—because he has visited us in our low estate of misery and degradation, with assurances of acceptance in the Beloved.

4. "Ye shall live." United to God by faith and love, the believer becomes as indestructible as God. The spirit of truth, of beauty, of holiness, of power, of life, dwelling in him, he cannot perish. His life is carried forward into eternity along with that of the necessary being. Amidst the changes of creation and the conflagration of the universe, the good man in Christ abides secure. His life is beyond the action of the elements, and is destined to the developement of an endless history. If all the beams darting from all suns through immensity, represented lines of figures denoting years or centuries or millenniums of glory, these amazing suns combined or multiplied would form not even a sufficient unit of the arithmetic by which to measure the believer's life. It is something divine—and since divine, incomprehensible to man. The Christian embodies in his own person all those mysteries of love and life which dwelt in God; and it will require eternity for him to understand himself.

Reader! art thou living after the flesh—a momentary, damnable life of sin—a sucidal life to be speedily swallowed up by the devouring fire of Law; or art thou through the Spirit mortifying the deeds of the body, that thou mayest live for ever. W. E.

"Can't Serve God alone."

When John Wesley first became a Christian he was inclined to morbid and mystical views, and spent much of his time in solitude. He longed to be a recluse, to cultivate a contemplative piety. An humble discipie, by wise fidelity, saved him from this great peril, and gave to the Christian world one of the most energetic workers it has ever known. This man said to Wesley, "Sir, you wish to serve God and go to heaven. Remember, you cannot serve him alone: you must, therefore find companions or make them The Bible knows nothing of solitary religion." That reproof opened the eyes of the young Christian. It led him to search the Bible to learn what were the fruits of genuine piety. It made him a life-long laborer, with a kindred zeal to that of the great apostle, willing to be all things to all men if by any means he might save some. Instead of shutting himself in a cell, thinking only of self and heedless of a lost world, he travelled through England and Scotland and Ireland and America, striving to win souls to Christ. What a different spirit would prevail in the Christian world, if every Christian convert was animated by the spirit of that humble disciple whose words roused Wesley to action! "Remember you cannot serve God alone: you must therefore find companions or make them. The Bible knows nothing of solitary religion."

Letters and Extracts.

Missionary Labor.

FROM THOMAS W. SMITH.

May 13 we left home for Point Pleasant, 15 miles distant, and expected to speak at South Fork in the evening, on our way. But they had not received the appointment; so we spent the evening in conversation on the life-theme with a gentleman who has read the S x Sermons, and believes the doctrine fully. Left him a copy of the Herald, and he will probably subscribe. Next morning we left for our appointment at Point Pleasant. Stopped on the way, and while there it commenced raining, and did not cease till it was too late to reach the Point. However no one was disappointed as they did not expect me after the weather proved so unfavorable; so we did not speak till Sunday at 11. We preached on the "Hope of the Gospel;" and at 3 P. M. on the "Faith of the Gospel." Had large and interesting audiences, and distributed a goodly number of tracts. After the 3 o'clock service, we rode five miles and preached at South Fork, where we had spoken before: Subject, the "Signs of the Times." We found the buggy useful in hauling some corn, kindly given by a friend.

May 20. Left home for Br. Martin's, 40 miles from here. Reached Wall Lake in the evening, and was requested to preach in the house of a friend; accepted the invitation and spoke on Life only in Christ; text, John v.–26. Sold copy of Six Sermons and one of Bible vs. Tradition; gave away tracts and Heralds. Next morning started for Br. Martin's. Arrived in the afternoon; disappointed in not finding an appointment for the evening. However, spent a pleasant time in conversing on Bible themes. Br. Martin has been a believer in the Life views for 20 years, and is well versed in the word of Life. On Sunday at 11 o'clock we spoke on the Atonement to show that life in the future is dependant on a union with Christ; at 3 P. M. on Life and immortality through Christ alone; and on the Christian's Hope at candle light. Much interest was manifested, and good done in the name of the Lord. Several were convinced that we had the truth. Tracts and papers were gladly received, and pamphlets purchased. We had truly a precious season. I was enabled to speak with much freedom. Pray that the seed sown may not be lost. I think the Lord has some people there. We left for Wall Lake; arrived about three o'clock. Preached at night on the "Blessed Hope." Reached home at noon to-day. Got a sack of corn, some butter, and 50 cents for the trip. The satisfaction of seeing some embrace the truth is pay enough. The Lord provides for us. Wall Lake is a sheet of water about three miles long and one wide, surrounded by a wall from three to six feet high; built it is thought by Indians. There is but little timber near it, and it is on the prairie and 13 miles from the nearest river. It is quite a curiosity and is visited by people from every quarter. Pray for me.

Alden, Iowa, May 23rd.

From David H. Baker.

ITALIA, Lyon Co., Kansas, May 12, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—I feel like telling you and our brethren that I, as well as the other readers of the "Herald of Life" in this far west part of the vineyard, am exceedingly glad to learn from Br. Smith, of Iowa, that he will give us a call some time this summer; probably in June, and preach for us the glad tidings of no life out of Christ. We hope and pray that it may be so, and his labors be attended with success. Let all the Br'n have the same in view when communing with our Father in heaven. But still our joy is not unmixed with despondency. We know that if Br. Smith comes here he will be attended with considerable expense: we know that he has a wife and child to leave behind him to be cared for; and it is natural for us to ask ourselves the question, how can the Br. provide for his family and himself and spend all his time in preaching and travelling? We all must see that his travelling and preaching must be attended with more expense than would the travelling and preaching of a sectarian. The sectarian can travel with his letters patent from town to town, from one neighborhood to another, and find some in every place to keep him without expense. Not so with our Br. who carries no letter patent of infalibility from any human organization; he may find none on his route to sympathise with him; none to entertain him free of expense and help him on his way; none to bid him "God's speed."

It has occurred to my mind that your subscription book would show whether any, if any, how many, and where on the rout readers of "Herald of Life" can be found. If you could find time to furnish our Br. with information it would be doing him a favor, and be a source of rejoicing to those whom our Br. would visit on his way. Neither yourself or the readers of the "Herald" need ask how it will be with Br. Smith while here; only let him come, with the Lord's help we will take care of him. This year we have been much slighted by sectarians; no one has seen fit to send us a preacher. Probably they think it useless to send a preacher where that "old infidel Baker" is. Our people are anxious to hear preaching; and it may be that the Lord has been preparing the way for Br. Smith; it looks so to me. The ground once broken here will yield abundantly. Last Sunday our community chose me for their Superintendent of S. Schools. I think if I had a few tracts I could use them to advantage. Our school is always well attended by the parents and children. I believe last summer over fifty children attended regularly. The rebellion is near its final; but there is another rebellion soon to be expected; i. e., the rebellion of God against the governments of this world; he soon will send his Son to take the kingdom. O God, hasten the day. Yours in the hope of the Gospel's great truth, no life out of Christ.
